P A R T VIII.

HENRY V. surnamed Of MONMOUTH, the second King of ENGLAND of the House of LANCASTER. A.D. 1413.

THE reader must now prepare himself for a scene of amazing revolutions, in which the wisdom of Providence, and the vanity of human precautions, will be alike conspicuous; teaching this necessary lesson to the great ones of the earth, that policy founded on injury, and power supported by injustice, however they may be for a while attended with success, will in the end prove shallow and precarious, and revert to the confusion of those who put their trust in them.

Henry of Monmouth was about twenty-five years of age when he succeeded to the crown of England, by the consent of the parliament, who made no difficulty of placing the royal diadem upon him, though he could not be supposed to possess a better title than his father, and though the earl of Marche, the lineal heir, was still living: in which the great assembly of the nation seems to have preferred the general happiness and welfare to any private consideration of hereditary right; a right which we have frequently seen rejected, to make place for the advantage of the whole body of the people.

Nor had Henry's subjects any reason, on this occasion, to repent their conduct, since their new sovereign succeeded to royalty with every merit that could adorn it. He began his reign on the twentieth of March, 1413; and on the twenty-fourth of the same month, both houses of parliament met, in pursuance of a summons under the late king, after several adjournments. The ceremony of young Henry's coronation was performed on the ninth of April following, by Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, with great solemnity, and amidst the unfeigned acclamations of all present.

The new king had no sooner assumed the reins of government, than he increased the good opinion the people already conceived of his reign, by many acts of justice and popularity. His first step was to publish a general amnesty or pardon for all crimes, rape and murder excepted: he dismissed all the old companions of his former irregularities: he chose a new council, composed of the wisest and best men of the kingdom: he shewed a resolution of restoring purity to the courts of justice, by displacing many judges, and others who had undeservedly held posts of power and profit under his father: he received all petitions, without exception of person, time, or place; and none departed from him without redress, or justice done them: and, as an earnest of the favour men of integrity might expect under his rule, even the chief-justice Gascoygne, who had committed him, when prince of Wales, to prison, and who, on that account, trembled to approach the royal presence, was received with the utmost cordiality and friendship; and Henry, instead of reproaching him with his past conduct, applauded his strict and impartial execution of the laws, and continued him in his post, with a strong exhortation that he would persevere in the same noble conduct. Farther to manifest to the world how superior he was to all party considerations, he caused the corpse of the unhappy Richard II. to be removed from Langley abbey, where it had been buried in an obscure manner, to Westminster, in which place it was re-interred near the remains of his queen, Anne of Luxembourg, with royal ceremony and generous donations, donations, after the manner of those times, for the honour and salvation of the deceased *.

But notwithstanding these endeavours of Henry to conciliate the affections of all his subjects to his government and person, there was still a party in the kingdom that could not behold with patient eyes any of the line of Lancaster in possession of the regal dignity. This party had abettors of very high distinction: Edmund, duke of York, the same who, in the time of king Richard the second, had been created duke of Albemarle, was still alive, had vast riches and influence, and was at this time constable of the Tower; not caring, however, to appear personally in rebellion against Henry, who had given several generous proofs of his friendship and confidence, he privately set to work one Wightlock to propagate a story that king Richard was still alive in Scotland. This fellow proved indefatigable in the business he was employed about, and papers were posted up on the gates of Westminster abbey, in several parts of London, and on the doors of several churches, in which it was affirmed, with the most dreadful asseverations, that Richard was still alive. Wightlock being in a short time seized, and committed to the Tower, the duke his patron favoured his escape, for which he was dismissed his place as constable, and one of the warders was tried and executed as a traitor for having contrived the criminal's escape: and thus this embryo of a conspiracy perished almost in its conception, without any cruel or rigorous examples being made, Henry treating the whole with a contempt that seemed superior to revenge.

Matters were in this situation when a new parliament met, on the fifteenth day of May. It was opened by a speech from the bishop of Winchester (Henry Beaufort), the king's uncle, who assured them of Henry's zeal to promote the interest of church and state. The commons having chosen a speaker, presented an address, desiring that the laws might be duly executed: then they petitioned his majesty that he would provide for the defence of Ireland, Wales, the Marches of Scotland, Calais, and Guienne: they complained loudly of the clergy's exacting pecuniary fines of the people, by way of commuting for the sins of the flesh; and several other abuses: all which the king promised to speak to the bishops to reform; and that if they neglected, he would take order to do it himself. Several statutes were enacted for the better preservation of the public peace, and the maintenance of the people's privileges; and one in particular for preventing frauds and false returns in the election of members for parliament.

While the parliament was thus providing for securing civil liberty, the clergy were as industrious in destroying religious. Notwithstanding all the severities against the Lollards, and notwithstanding all the power of the clergy, and their zeal to suppress them, they increased in such a manner as not only to threaten the destruction of the power of the church, as exercised in England under the bishop of Rome, but also, as the generality of these sectaries were hot and ignorant, the government began to grow apprehensive of disagreeable consequences to the state, from their frequent and numerous meetings: this, added to the necessity Henry found himself under of keeping well with the clergy, made him resolve to come into all their violent measures; and, on the twenty-first of August, he published a proclamation against the conventicles of the Lollards, forbidding such on pain of imprisonment, and inhibiting all persons from embracing their opinions, favouring their persons, or attending their preachings, without a licence from the bishop of the diocese.

The sect was highly irritated at this proclamation, and, in the heat of their blind resentment, went so far as to post up papers in several public places, threatening the government that they were ready to bring an hundred thousand men into the field, against any who should go about to persecute those who had embraced their faith. The chief of their party was sir John Oldcastle†, of Cowling, in Kent, styled, in right of his wife, lord Cobham: he was a man of eminent parts, courage, and experience in military affairs, which had recommended him to Henry's favour. Thomas Arundel, who was still archbishop of Canterbury, and was extremely incensed against the Lollards, thought that the surest method of suppressing the sect, was to attack their principal protector, and accordingly a process was ordered in convocation to be begun against him as an heretic; but as Oldcastle was, as we have observed, in favour with the king, it was thought that this method might give offence, unless the king was made acquainted with it before hand, and his leave desired to prosecute the heretical knight. The archbishop accordingly waited upon Henry, who then resided at Kennington, to inform him of the clergy's intention; but the affection Henry had for sir John, made him desire to have some conference with him before he gave leave to the convocation to proceed further against him. The knight was accordingly sent for, but Henry found him so firmly determined in his principles, that he gave leave for the clergy to proceed against him to the utmost extremity in their courts.

In consequence of this licence from the king, Oldcastle was cited to appear before the archbishop on the second of September; but contemning the citation, was excommunicated, and thereupon arrested by the civil power, and brought by the lieutenant of the Tower, on the twenty-third or twenty-fifth of that month, to give an account of his faith with regard to the sacraments. Being pressed too close upon the points of transubstantiation, the worship of the cross, and the authority of the bishop of Rome, he did not answer to the satisfaction of the archbishop and his three assistant suffragans, the bishops of London, Winchester, and St. David's, and they agreed to pronounce sentence upon him as an heretic convict, and to deliver him over to the secular arm. Forty or fifty days being generally allowed, according to the tenor of the law of England, for any person under ecclesiastical censures to repent and make satisfaction to the church, before the civil authority interposed with its coercive power, sir John was recommitted to the Tower, but made his escape before the term was expired. He was no sooner at liberty, than he sent for his friends to make ready for the field, and repair to the neighbourhood of London upon the first notice they should receive from him; and, from the concurrent testimony of all cotemporary writers, even Ball himself, the great favourer of this nobleman, it appears more than probable that the state as well as the church was threatened by these fanatics with some dreadful stroke, if it had not been averted by the king's great vigilance.

* He ordered that two tapers should stand burning day and night by his tomb, a dirge to be sung one day in the week, and the next morning a mass of Requiem; and when that was ended, eleven shillings and eight pence, to be given to the poor; and, lastly, upon the day of his anniversary, twenty pounds, in pence, to be distributed yearly for his soul.

Henry was then at Eltham, keeping his Christmas holidays; but upon receiving intelligence of the intended meeting of the Lollards, he hastened up to Westminster. The condemnation of so great a man as sir John Oldcastle gave the meaner sort to understand what they were to expect, if they should fall under the like censures; accordingly, upon the first summons from their favourite hero, they flocked from all parts of England, to the number of twenty thousand (as Oldcastle's indictment sets forth), scarce any knowing what they were to do, but all ready to obey his orders. The rendezvous was appointed, before day, on the sixth of January, 1414, in St. Giles's Fields, that had hitherto been the scene of their devotion when driven from the churches, but now destined to be the field of their rebellion. Henry, apprized of their design, had, with all possible privacy, got together a good number of troops, and taken possession of the ground soon after midnight. Sir John Oldcastle expected to be joined by great numbers of apprentices and servants from London, some say near fifty thousand; but the king, the noon of that evening the insurgents were to assemble, had ordered the gates of the city to be shut, and had posted guards at all the avenues, to intercept all assistance that might arrive: by this means the Lollards were caught in their own snare, being seized as fast as they came to the place of rendezvous, where they found enemies instead of the friends they expected, till the alarm being given, the rest shifted for themselves, and dispersed. Sir John Acton, one John Brown, an esquire, sir John Beverly, a preacher, with one Richard Marle, a rich brewer, of Dunstable, and the precentor of St. Alban's, who had headed these rabble, were, with six-and-thirty other persons of eminence, seized in the fields by the soldiery, and suffered death the next day, as traitors and heretics, being first hanged and then burnt, in St. Giles's Fields. Cobham got off at this time, and, though a proclamation was issued, with the promise of a reward of fifteen hundred marks, for taking him, his party secreted him so well, that he was not seized till about four years after, when he was drawn, hanged, and burnt as he hung, the last punishment being added because he had been declared an heretic: but we shall have occasion to canvass this affair more fully in the ecclesiastical part of this work. We must now turn to foreign affairs; but it will be necessary to explain the situation of the French court and kingdom, as an introduction to that war which continued so long, and was productive of so much mischief and calamity to both nations.

The accommodation between the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, of which we have given an account in the preceding reign, and in consequence of which the troops of England were dismissed from the service of the confederated princes of France, was but short-lived. The duke of Burgundy, who well knew that he had an inveterate enemy in the person of Lewis, the dauphin of France, resolved to make himself dreaded by that prince, by kindling up anew the flames of civil commotion in that kingdom: for this purpose he privately dealt with the Parisians, by whom he was adored, who suddenly took to arms, and assembling to the number of twelve thousand men in support of their favourite, they surrounded the Bastile, of which they quickly made themselves masters, and cut off the governor's head; after which they broke into the dauphin's apartments, seized the duke of Barr, with the principal officers of his household, many of whom they barbarously put to death; and forced the dauphin himself, with the dukes of Berry and Guienne, to wear white hoods, the badge of the faction. But their insolence was soon suppressed, for the king, Charles VI. relapsing into one of his lucid intervals, the duke of Burgundy was deprived of the advantage of acting under pretext of the royal authority; and the king, with the most considerable persons both in the court and city, resolved to send deputies to the duke of Orleans and the other princes of his party, who had retired from Paris; and a conference was held at Vernueil, where the princes assured the king of their services, and the dukes of Orleans, Berry, Bourbon, Alençon, the counts of Eu and Vendôme, hastened to Paris, in order to deliver their sovereign out of the hands of the Burgundian faction. The dauphin having gained over a great number of the Parisians to his interest, and finding himself likely to be powerfully supported by the confederate princes, sent private orders to his partisans to assemble, so that he at length found himself at the head of thirty thousand men: with these he scoured the streets of Paris, and struck such terror into the opposite faction, that they abandoned the Louvre, Hotel de Ville, and Bastile, without opposition; and the duke of Burgundy, finding himself unable to stop the progress of his enemies, and being, moreover, disappointed in a design he had formed of carrying off the king of France to Flanders, under pretence of an hunting-match, retired himself precipitately into that country, leaving his party exposed to all the rage and resentment of their adversaries.

The duke of Berry was again declared governor of Paris; and the court of France being thus remodelled, appointed commissioners to treat of a final and lasting peace with England; and, on the fourth of July, 1413, conferences were opened at Lellinghen, in Picardy, between the French and English commissaries, where it was immediately agreed, that the truce, at present subsisting, should be inviolably observed till the month of June, in the following year.

We have already shewn, that Henry IV. had carefully fomented the animosity between the two French parties, each of whom he had alternately furnished with assistance; and he would probably have endeavoured to avail himself farther of their dissensions, had not the unsettled state of his own affairs hindered him from carrying such a design into execution. Henry V. with even more ambition than his father, did not labour under the same disadvantages; he had ascended the throne without opposition, he possessed the good-will and affection of his subjects in general, and he was too sagacious not to perceive, and too prudent not to improve, the tempting prospect which the distracted state of the French monarchy presented to his view. Nevertheless, that he might conceal his ambition under the specious appearance of equity, he resolved to begin by the way of treaty and negotiation; and the duke of York was sent to Paris, with a splendid retinue, to demand the princess Catherine of France, a young lady of thirteen years of age, in marriage for the king of England.

Whilst this negotiation was on foot, Henry entered into another with the duke of Brittany, who had hitherto observed an exact neutrality between the courts of France and England; but the English had great cause of dissatisfaction with the Bretons, whose privateers had greatly distressed their trade, but all differences were now to be made up, and the duke, if possible, warmed into a steady ally. Accordingly, the latter having sent two commissioners on his part to London, conferences were opened on the first of February, 1414, in which a truce was concluded between the two powers, on the following terms:

“That it should continue ten years, and be exactly observed through all the dominions of both princes; that the duke should take care to restrict the inhabitants of St. Malo’s from all piracies and depredations: that no acts of hostility should be committed by any of the subjects of the two princes: that there should be a free and undisturbed trade and traffic between both nations, with payment of the usual customs; but yet that none of the subjects of king Henry, except merchants, shall enter into any city, towns, or forts of Brittany, without licence first obtained from the governors: that if, by attempts contrary to this truce, any person should be taken prisoner, or any depredations should be made, restitution and full satisfaction should be given, without any fraud or delay: that though such violences were acted, yet the truce should not be broken by them, nor any such pretences give occasion to begin a war; but the wrongs done should be repaired, and the persons offending suffer deserved punishment: that no man of war should go out of any port in Brittany, or in any of the duke’s dominions, without first having given good security that nothing should be attempted contrary to the truce: that all prizes taken should be brought into some port belonging to the duke, or to king Henry, unless, by storms, or the pursuit of some enemy, they be forced into other harbours; and if any man of war set out to sea, without having given the required security, it should be forfeited to the duke: that all ships bringing any prizes into the allowed ports, should be arrested by deputed officers, till sufficient enquiry be made whether the prize were lawful: that before such due examination, no prizes should be exposed to sale; and that, if the officers were negligent in making their enquiry, they should be bound to satisfy all the damages of the injured party: that during the truce, the duke of Brittany should not receive any traitors, pirates, fugitives, or exiles from England, nor afford them the least entertainment or relief, but should cause them to be apprehended and delivered up to the king of England, at his own proper expence, when he had sent the names of them, and required it: that the duke should not give reception to any of the king’s enemies, armed to make war against him, nor supply them with any provision or aids, nor permit any of his subjects to go out of his dominions to their assistance, nor to do any thing for their relief: that no prizes taken from the English by the king’s enemies should be admitted into the duke’s ports, nor sale of the goods be made within his territories, nor the duke’s subjects entertain or receive any who thus should infect the English by land or by sea; and if any were found faulty in so doing, they should be punished according to their desert: that the subjects of England should have free admission into the ports of Brittany with any prizes which they should take from the enemy; and if any of the duke’s subjects should make any false pretensions to these prizes and goods as their own, and this was clearly proved against them, they should for ever be excluded from all benefit of the truce*.”

We have given these terms at length, as they serve to shew us how well, even in those days, the principles of commerce and the law of nations were understood.

The next power with which Henry concluded a negotiation, was the crown of Castile: the English still bore in their remembrance the vast annoyance they had suffered from the shipping of that nation in the reign of Edward III. and it was therefore necessary to secure the friendship of that prince. This was the more practicable, as Henry had in his own dominions a powerful pretender to the crown of Castile in the person of the duke of York, by right of blood from his mother, the daughter of the late Peter the Cruel, and the only daughter who had left male issue: accordingly we find Dr. Henyngham appointed to treat with dom Juan Roderigo, the Castilian ambassador, and a truce concluded upon several excellent regulations, some of which are very singular.

It was to this effect: “That it should begin on the twenty-fifth of March following, and continue till sun-set of the twenty-fifth of March the next year: that it should be exactly observed by sea and land: that the subjects of both nations should abstain from all acts of war and violence: that no depredations should be made by land, nor piracies by sea, by the subjects of Castile upon those of England: that the English should be admitted to come and reside in any of the dominions of the king of Castile, with full liberty of trade in all lawful and unprohibited goods, paying the duties to the king and the usual customs: that if, during this truce, any thing should be acted, by the subjects of Castile, to the damage of the king of England, or his subjects, restitution should be made, free of all expences or charge, and the persons offending punished according to the nature of the offence: that though any such acts of violence should be done by the subjects of Castile, yet they should not be accounted violations of the truce, nor be pretended as occasions of beginning a war, but that full reparations be made of the injuries by the king of Castile, or his officers, and the offenders duly punished: that if any goods or merchandize were taken from the English, they should be presently seized by the king of Castile's officers, and put into safe hands, to be secured for the owners; to whom, upon complaint and proof made, they shall be restored, and all charges of the recovery be satisfied out of the goods of the person who took them, to secure the truce from being broken; and to prevent all attempts against it by any cruizers in the seas, it was also agreed, that if any of the king of Castile's subjects sent out such ships, security should be given that they might not be employed against the English, nor make depredations in the kingdom of England, duchy of Aquitaine, or any of king Henry's dominions: that the officers appointed should not suffer such ships to go out of port till they had given this requisite security, that all prizes which they took should be brought into the port whence the ship was sent out, and into no other, unless they were forced by pursuit of enemies, or driven by a tempest, but that, as soon as it ceased, they should bring the prize into the required port: that if the officers appointed by the king of Castile should neglect to take sufficient securities of the owners of those ships, those officers should repair all damages and mischiefs of depredations made by them: and for the speedier reparations of the losses which the subjects of both kingdoms had sustained, it was resolved, that the king of Castile should send his ambassadors to Fontarabia, a town in Guipuscoa, a province in Spain, on the frontiers of Aquitaine, in the beginning of the next July, to meet those sent from England; and that they should have full power to hear and decide all causes and controversies relating to piracies or depredations, made at land or sea, by the people of either nation, contrary to the truce concluded between the two crowns in the beginning of the reign of Henry, king of Castile, the father of the present king, who would give effectual orders, that what the ambassadors determined should be performed in all his dominions: but if any thing intervened, so that the king of Castile could not send his ambassadors to the appointed place at the assigned day, yet this should give no interruption to the truce: and in conclusion, Roderigo engaged, for the king his master, that he should send his letters patent, sealed with the great seal, in confirmation of this treaty, and of all the articles agreed in it §.

The late conspiracy and insurrection of the Lollards gave occasion to a severe statute being made against them in the parliament which met, on the thirtieth of April this year, at Leicester, by which statute they were subjected to the forfeiture of their goods and chattels, as also of the lands and tenements which they enjoyed in fee simple, at the time of their death, in the same manner as if they had been attainted of felony: it was also enacted, that none should, upon pain of life and limb, read the Scriptures in English; and that such persons should have no benefit of sanctuary*. A vast number afterwards suffered by this infamous act, which owed its rise to the bloody zeal of the clergy, and Henry's jealousy of the civil principles of this new sect. This persecution was chiefly carried on by the instigation of Henry Chicheley, late bishop of St. David's, but now promoted to the archbishopric of Canterbury, in the room of Thomas Arundel, who died on the twentieth of February before.

While these matters passed here, the court of France continued its prosecutions against the Burgundian faction with unremitting severity, and many of them fell by the hands of the common executioner; and the king, who at this time seemed to be fully restored to his reason, published so severe an ordinance against the duke, that the latter despaired of ever being able to compromise matters. In this desperate state of his affairs, he applied to the court of England for assistance; and Henry, following the example of his father's policy, in supporting the weaker side, resolved to espouse the duke's cause, as the most certain means to perpetuate the distraction of the French government. Though the dukes of Clarence, Gloucester, and York inclined towards the Orleans faction, an offer from the duke of Burgundy to do homage to Henry completed the matter in his favour, and the lord Scroope, with four other commissioners, were sent to receive that homage, and to promise the duke, in consideration thereof, a considerable aid. Henry, however, did not reap any great fruits from this manœuvre in politics; for Charles of France unhappily relapsing into his former insanity, the French government thought proper to agree to terms of accommodation with the duke of Burgundy, which the latter gladly received, though they were extremely hard: all of them, however, are foreign to this history, the third article only excepted, by which that prince was obliged to renounce his late alliance with the king of England.

At the very time that Henry was carrying on his negotiation with the duke of Burgundy, he entered into another with the court of France, from whence the archbishop of Bourges, the constable d'Albert, and Groutier Col, one of the king's secretaries, were sent to England, under pretence of settling the difficulties that remained unadjusted at the late conferences at Lelighen; but in reality to discover what Henry's intentions were: the king, who was not yet prepared for the great enterprize he meditated, amused them for some time with negotiations, but all that was done was to prolong the late truce to the second of February, 1415. Henry, to carry on his disguise, sent over a splendid embassy to France, proposing a perpetual alliance and peace between the two kingdoms, and demanding, in return, Catherine, the French king's daughter, in marriage; two millions of crowns, as her portion; the payment of one million six hundred thousand †, as the arrears of king John's ransom; the immediate possession and full sovereignty of Normandy, and the other provinces which Philip Augustus had wrested from the crown of England, together with the superiority of Brittany and Flanders ‡.

It is evident, from the exorbitant nature of these demands, that Henry was fully sensible of the distressed condition of the French monarchy; and the terms offered by that court, though greatly inferior, sufficiently shew their own consciousness of the same melancholy truth: they agreed to give him the princess in marriage, with a portion of eight hundred thousand crowns; to invest him with the entire sovereignty of Guienne, and to annex to that province the counties of Perigord, Rovergne, Xaintonge, Angoumois, and other territories ||.

As Henry was pretty certain that his own terms would not be granted, and was fully determined to accept of no other, he set about making great preparations, to be ready against a proper opportunity offered for carrying into execution the purpose which he seems to have formed from the first moment of his accession to the throne, agreeable to the dying advice of his father, not to suffer the English to continue long in a state of inactivity; and his parliament, who appear to have acted in concert with their sovereign on this occasion, without waiting for the event of the negotiations actually on foot, came to a resolution of addressing the king for a war with France; and Henry, with great seeming complacency, acquiesced in their desire, upon which the house voted him a very large supply.

In this parliament the commons likewise petitioned the king to seize the church-lands, and they supported their petition with such cogent reasons, founded on the immoderate wealth of the clergy, that this body, foreseeing their ruin inevitable, unless some remedy was found against the gathering storm, met to consult about means to avert, or at least weaken it as much as possible; and finding the king but too much inclined to comply with the request of the commons, they resolved to give up part of their wealth, in order to save the remainder: they offered, as a free gift, the whole riches and revenues of one hundred and ten monasteries, which depended upon capital abbeys in Normandy, and had been bequeathed to them when that province was united to England; and Chicheley, the new archbishop of Canterbury, made him a formal tender of the same, which the king accepted, rather than quarrel with the clergy, and these monasteries were appropriated to his use by act of parliament: and the business of the intended war with France being again artfully brought on the carpet by Chicheley, who made an elaborate speech on the occasion, stuffed with fulsome compliments to the king, the minds of the commons were called off from their first object, and the bill against the clergy fell of itself to the ground*.

All the rest of the year was spent in continual embassies to London and Paris; but nothing was concluded on. At length, the archbishop of Bourges, the bishop of Lisieux, the count of Vendosme, great-master of France, the baron of Ivry, the lord Briquemont, and Groutier Col, with other noblemen, and a train of three hundred horse, arrived at the English court, in order to bring Henry, if possible, to more moderate terms. They found him busied in his preparations to invade their country: Henry gave them audience on the sixteenth of April, 1415, at Winchester, in a very stately manner, sitting in his robes of gold, and attended by all the princes of the blood and the lords of his court. The archbishop of Bourges made a florid speech, in which he endeavoured to convince Henry of the unreasonableness of his demands, and to represent the princess Catherine, and her portion, as more than an equivalent for all that the English asked. Henry, however, treated this assertion with great disdain; and the bishop of Winchester, by the king's command, summed up the whole negotiations that had passed between England and France since Henry's accession to the crown; he accused the French of double-dealing and affected dilatoriness in all their proceedings; he reproached them with the breach of the treaty of Bretigny; and concluded with declaring, "that his master now appealed to the sword."

This thunder-clap for a while left the Frenchmen astounded and speechless; but at length the archbishop of Bourges, losing all patience, forgot what was due to his own character, and to the majesty of a great prince, and, with eyes sparkling with rage, made answer, "that he saw plainly that the king, not contented with a crown unjustly wrested from Richard II. by his father, wanted to usurp that of France also; but that he should find the enterprize more difficult than he imagined†." Henry and his court, however, made no other reply to the archbishop's imprudent (we wish truth would permit us to stigmatize it with the epithet of false) charge, than by a politic contempt.

All conferences thus breaking off, Henry redoubled his attention to warlike preparations; and having assembled a great armament at Southampton, he repaired thither, in order to embark on his expedition, and the beginning of August was fixed for his departure. The ardour of the nation to follow him to the field exceeded his most sanguine expectations, and rid him of all apprehensions of any defect in his finances to pay his troops, which would put a stop to an enterprize, from whence he promised himself so much glory. According to some historians‡, the earl of Northumberland levied forty men at arms, and one hundred and twenty archers; the earl of Westmoreland the same number; the earl of Warwick, twenty men at arms and forty archers; the earl of Suffolk, the lords Zouch, Berkeley, d'Arcy, Seymour, Ros, and Willoughby, each of them contributed half a ship, twenty men at arms, and forty archers; the lord Morley brought six men at arms, and twenty archers; and all the other nobility in proportion; the lords Scales and Randolph offered to serve without pay.

The next step was to provide for the government of the kingdom in the king's absence, and for the guard of the Marches of Scotland and Wales, and Calais. The duke of Bedford, the king's brother, was made lieutenant of England; and the following counsellors were assigned him, viz. the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of Winchester and Durham, the earl of Westmoreland, the prior of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, the lords Grey, Ruthyn, Berkeley, Powis, and Morley: the earl of Westmoreland, with the lords Morley and d'Acres, were constituted wardens of the Scottish Marches, with a command of two hundred lances and four hundred archers; a hundred lances and two hundred archers were appointed for the Marches of Wales; a hundred lances and three hundred archers were assigned for those of Calais; and as many for the sea-service: and Henry entered into indentures with his great men, for their own and their soldiers pay, during their service, viz. every duke was to have thirteen shillings and four pence per day, every earl six shillings and eight pence, every baron four shillings, every knight two shillings, every esquire or man at arms one shilling, and every archer six pence §.

Henry, by a precaution worthy a great and wise mind, resolved to endear his sway, and secure the peace of his government, during his absence, by a double act of justice and magnanimity; this was by restoring the young earl of Northumberland, son of the Hotspur Percy, to his blood and fortune, which he did this year before his departure; and, although he knew that Edmund, earl of Marche, had a right in the succession to the crown prior to his own, yet, out of his natural magnanimity, he freed him from his confinement, in which he had been kept during the whole of the preceding reign, and even treated him with such humanity and benevolence as entirely gained the affection of that young nobleman, who ever after continued to serve him with remarkable zeal and fidelity. About the same time he published certain proclamations in favour of the Lollards, so far as to prevent vexatious and arbitrary prosecutions of those unhappy people: he likewise gave security to all the private persons and corporations who had advanced him money, which they did in great sums*.

The king being ready to depart, wrote a kind of formal letter to his adversary of France, as he terms Charles VI. and to shew that he breathed nothing but war, he dates it from Southampton by the sea-side†. This letter was delivered to the French monarch by Cantelupe king at arms; and it is said that it was upon this occasion the dauphin of France sent Henry the famous ton of tennis-balls in derision, when our English monarch made this memorable answer, "that he would play such balls against Paris, as all her battlements should not rebound‡." This story has been very warmly supported and contradicted by different historians; but it is not worth our while to enter into the merits of its authenticity.

Most part of the English troops were now embarked, and nothing was wanting but a favourable gale to waft Henry to the scene of all his future glories, which he was waiting for with impatience, when he had notice of a dangerous conspiracy formed against his crown and life by those whom he thought he had least reason to suspect||.

The persons who were to execute this design were Richard, earl of Cambridge, younger brother to the duke of York, the lord Scroope of Masham, treasurer of England, and sir Thomas Grey, of Hedon, in Northumberland. The earl of Cambridge had married Anne Mortimer, daughter and heiress of Lionel, duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III. so that, in right of this lady, he was in blood nearer to the crown than Henry. This plot was, in all probability, owing rather to the ambition of the earl of Cambridge, than to any regard he had to the earl of Marche, his brother-in-law, who had no issue, and upon whose death he hoped that either himself or some of his children would succeed to the throne.

It appeared upon the trial, and by the confession of the earl himself, and his accomplices¶, that the plot was laid in this manner: that the conspirators should, while the army was embarking, make the best of their way, with the earl of Marche, into Wales, and there proclaim him king, in defiance of the usurper, Henry of Lancaster, as they termed him: that the earl of Cambridge should present this new king with a crown, which Henry had pawned in his hands for a sum of money, and that he should be proclaimed under a banner of the English arms; at the same time they proposed to raise an army in Scotland, under the ridiculous pretence of Richard's being still alive, and that those forces were to be headed by young Percy, who continued still in Scotland. It seems the conspirators had received some encouragement to propose this enterprize to the earl of Marche, by his having often told Cambridge in confidence, that every time he was confessed, his ghostly father made it a point of conscience with him that he should claim his right (meaning the crown of England.) This piece of intelligence, added to their knowledge of the weakness of his intellects, made them imagine it no difficult matter to persuade Mortimer to concur with them in an enterprize which promised to set a crown upon his head: accordingly, having bound him by an oath of secrecy, they acquainted him with the whole plot they had concerted in his favour; but fear got the better of ambition in the mind of the earl of Marche: he saw the precipice to which these pretended friends were leading him, and resolved to provide for his own safety; however, not to give them any cause of suspicion, he seemed highly thankful for the services they intended to do him, but begged he might have a few hours to consider of the matter; which being readily agreed to by the party, he made use of that interval to lay open the whole affair to Henry.

Orders were instantly issued for seizing the conspirators, and imprisoning them in the castle of Southampton, to the constable of which they confessed their guilt, and threw themselves on the king's mercy. Sir Thomas Grey was tried and condemned, on this evidence, by a common jury, of which it will not be easy to produce a precedent in any former reign; but the earl of Cambridge and lord Scroope pleading their peerage, a commission was issued on the fifth of August, by which Henry constituted his brother Thomas, duke of Clarence, "his lieutenant and vicegerent††," for trying the two noblemen by their peers. They pleaded guilty, and the earl of Cambridge sent a very penitent and pathetic letter to Henry, imploring his mercy and forgiveness; but this was a case in which the king could hardly shew his clemency, with any regard to his own safety, or the tranquility of the kingdom. The conspirators had engaged in this plot against him without the least shadow of provocation: and it was not improbable they might attempt the same again, if left at liberty so to do: the king was upon the eve of a great and, perhaps, tedious expedition, and it was natural to think that they would not let slip such a favourable opportunity of carrying their ambitious scheme into execution; he therefore found it necessary, for the good of the public, to allow the law to take its natural course. bridge and sir Thomas Grey were beheaded; but lord Scroope was hanged, drawn, and quartered as a traitor, his guilt being aggravated with the circumstance of ingratitude to Henry, who had distinguished him with many particular marks of favour and affection.

Thus ended a conspiracy, which has by many of our historians been attributed to the intrigues of the French court: it is very probable that they might have been made acquainted with the design, and have encouraged the conspirators; but, exclusive of their assistance, or interfering therein, the design seems sufficiently prompted by self-interest, especially if we reflect, that if the plot had succeeded, and the earl of Marche had been proclaimed king of England, while a sham Richard was trumped up in the North of England, the earl of Cambridge would have had a very fair handle to make use of this impostor's name for putting the earl of Marche to death; which done, all the right of the Mortimer family devolved upon the wife and son of the former. Be that as it might, this conspiracy seems to have been the first spark of that flame which consumed, in process of time, the two houses of Lancaster and York. But to return.

This affair detaining Henry at Southampton longer than he imagined, he could not sail till the fifteenth of August. His fleet consisted of fifteen hundred transports, in which were embarked six thousand men at arms, and twenty-four thousand archers, making in all an army of about fifty thousand men. He was attended by the earls of Dorset, Kent, Cornwall, Salisbury, Huntingdon, with many other nobles. After a pleasant passage, he landed, the evening of the day after that in which he left the English shore, at Caux, in Normandy, a small port in the mouth of the river Seine, about three leagues from Harfleur. According to Elmham, he had ordered his ambassadors, in their return from the court of France, to examine the state and situation of that place, under the pretence of embarking there for England, and upon their report formed his plan of operations. The lord of Ercouteville, governor of Harfleur, was at the head of a numerous garrison, and several experienced officers, and made a gallant defence for some time; but the walls being beaten down by the cannon of the besiegers, the ditch filled up, breaches made, and every thing prepared for giving a general assault, he thought it best to capitulate for the surrender of the place, on the twenty-second of September, if not relieved before. On that day thirty persons of the town or garrison, such as Henry should chuse, being left to his discretion, the rest were allowed to march out, and go wherever they pleased; and the inhabitants, either by force or inclination, taking the latter party, the place was repeopled by a colony from England, and the king made his uncle, Thomas Beaufort, earl of Dorset, governor.

If the arrival of Henry with so formidable an army, and so superior to those that had won the battles of Cressy and Poitiers, alarmed all France, his taking of Harfleur, one of the strongest places perhaps in that kingdom, did not a little increase this alarm; but while the progress of the English arms terrified the French, it roused them to a resolution of exerting all their efforts to stop it ere too late. Orders were immediately issued from the court to all the French nobility, for assisting the crown against the English invasion: the dauphin himself took the field with fourteen thousand men at arms, and was soon joined by the dukes of Berry, Orleans, Bourbon, Alençon, Barr, and Brabant, the constable d'Albret, the counts of Nevers, Vendôme, and Richemont, and all the flower of the nobility, and upwards of forty thousand other soldiers, all eager to signalize their loyalty to their king, and their valour against the invaders of their country.

Very different was the situation of Henry's affairs: it was now near the middle of October, and the English troops had suffered terribly during the siege by sickness, no less than two thousand common soldiers, besides many persons of quality, having been carried off by the bloody flux, and several others were obliged to return to England, in hopes of their recovery in their native climate. Henry was much mortified at this distress of his people, which was the more unlucky as he expected to be attacked by the French, who were now become very powerful in the field: these considerations would probably have determined Henry to have returned to England; but the English fleet, which had, during the siege, lain before Harfleur, had been dispersed by storms, so that there was not in the harbour a sufficient number of vessels to carry his troops back.

So situated, and finding it would be impracticable to winter at Harfleur, for want of provisions and forage, he, with the advice of his council, resolved to begin his march by land for Calais, and to pass the Somme at the place where it was forded by his great-grand-father, Edward III. Henry was not insensible of the difficulties and dangers that attended such a retreat by land; but, unused to consult with fear, he resolved to take this party. Accordingly, after a stay of about three weeks at Harfleur, leaving a garrison of two thousand men in the place, under the command of the earl of Dorset and his lieutenant, sir John Fastolf, and sending the sickly part of his troops home by sea in such vessels as yet remained unhurt by the late tempests, he began his march along the sea-coast, to Ville d'Eu, in order to reach the place where he proposed to cross the Somme.

In this march, however, he met with greater difficulties than he had even formed to himself: he found all the bridges over the Somme broke down, and the ford of Blanquetac, where Edward III. had formerly passed that river, two days before the battle of Cressy, was now rendered impassable by a great quantity of sharp stakes drove into the bed of the water, and the opposite bank strongly guarded by numerous detachments of the enemy. Upon this he found himself obliged to alter his course; and marching higher up the river, beyond Amiens and Corbie, he at last effected a passage near St. Quentin, and directed his route towards Blaguy; but he soon perceived that he had only escaped one danger to fall into another, for he saw the whole French army, amounting to upwards of one hundred thousand men, drawn up to oppose his farther progress. In this distress he sent a message to the constable d'Albret, offering to restore Harfleur, to repair all damages he had done to the French, and even to bind himself by an oath, that he would never again invade France, provided they would allow him to continue his march to Calais without molestation.

molestation. The constable was for accepting this offer, alleging, that the French government could not expect greater advantages from the most successful battle, than what were now proposed to them by the English monarch; but the young French generals, at the head of whom were the dukes of Alençon and Bourbon, were deaf to all considerations but that of fighting the English; they even refused to consent to wait for a large reinforcement, which were marching from all quarters, particularly from Brittany, to join their army, and all Henry's proposals were rejected with disdain; nay, they even added many acts of boyish insolence to their rash security, for, after having in vain endeavoured to provoke Henry, by repeated messages, to give them battle, they were insolent enough to propose the question to him, by a herald, how much he would give for his ransom?

Henry bore all these insults with a patient yet noble disdain; in return to their message, desiring him to fix the place and time of battle, he replied, "that, weakened and exhausted as his army now was, he would not seek an engagement; but, as he was resolved to pursue his route to Calais, they might attack him when and where they should think proper." On receiving this answer, the French took post between Rousseauville and a village called Agincourt. Both armies stood in order of battle from the twentieth to the twenty-fifth of October; at length the French sent him word, that they would give him battle on the last-mentioned day. Finding it impossible to avoid an action, he accepted the challenge, and presented the herald who brought it, with a rich robe and two hundred crowns. During the three days which intervened between the challenge and the battle, Henry employed every means which prudence could suggest, in order to prepare his men for the approaching combat, by recalling to their remembrance the glorious achievements of their forefathers, in the days of Cressy and Poitiers, against an infinite superiority of their enemies: in a word, by his example and his harangues he inspired his soldiers with so much valour, that they seemed to have lost all sense of distinction of numbers, and to wish for nothing so much as to signalize themselves in the presence of their beloved and heroic prince.

Far different from the prudent conduct of Henry was the arrogant behaviour of the French generals. Puffed up with their superiority of numbers, they looked upon the English army as already in their disposal, and were so foolishly confident of victory as to pass the evening preceding the battle in casting dice for the imaginary ransoms of their illustrious prisoners, and the spoils of the English camp; and, to complete the measure of their vanity, they sent orders to many of the adjacent villages to prepare lodgings for those strangers, and to provide for the celebration of a signal victory.

On the twenty-fifth of October, the day appointed for the battle, the two armies were marshalled as soon as it was light; but here the constable d'Albret is represented as having made an egregious blunder in the disposition of his army: he drew it up on a narrow piece of ground, flanked by a rivulet and a thick wood, and in such a manner that he could not extend his front line but a very little beyond that of the English; thus his superior numbers, instead of being of any real service, would only prove a burthen and encumbrance: but then he had two other lines, each of which formed an army more than double the number of the English. The first line was composed, besides other troops, of eight thousand gentlemen, commanded by the constable, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendosme, and Richemont, and the famous marshal Boucicaut, David Rambure great-master of the cross-bows, and several other officers of distinction. The second line was led by the duke of Alençon, assisted by the duke of Barr, the counts of Vaudemont, Nevers, Salines, Roussi, and Grand Pré. The third body was under the command of the counts of Marle, Dampmartin, Faquenbergh, and the sieur de Lannoy.

While the French officers were employed in drawing up their troops, Henry detached four hundred lances, to take post in a wood upon the right; and a party of two hundred and fifty archers, to lay in ambush on the left, in a low meadow covered with bushes. The files of the French were thirty-one deep, whereas the English were not above four; Henry having been obliged, in order to extend his front equal to that of the enemy, to form his little army into one front, though consisting, indeed, of three lines, one behind the other, the extremity of which was flanked by horse, in the manner of wings. The wing commanded by the duke of York, with the lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope, was posted to the right of the main body, and advanced somewhat before it: the centre was commanded by Henry in person, attended by his brother Humphrey, duke of Gloucester; John, lord Mowbray, earl-marshal; Richard de Vere, earl of Oxford; and Michael de la Pole, the young earl of Suffolk. The rear, or third line, consisting of archers and such as were armed with spears, halberts, and bills, was led by Thomas Beaufort, earl of Dorset. The king dressed himself, on this occasion, with all the magnificence of a warrior, and appeared at the head of his division mounted on a stately white steed, in shining armour, with a golden crown (made after the imperial fashion) on his helmet by way of crest, while four royal banners waved around him*. He was followed by a great number of led horses in rich caparisons, and attended by the chief officers of his court. Sir Thomas Erpyngham, an old and experienced general, acted that day, by Henry's orders, as field marshal; and le Fevre tells us, that the disposition of the English army was planned by him.

We are told by father Daniel†, that before the battle began, king Henry sent to make the French generals a second offer of accommodation; when the terms they insisted upon were, that Henry should renounce all pretensions to the crown of France, and restore Harfleur: Henry would have agreed to this proposal, on condition that Guienne and its appurtenances, together with the earldom of Ponthieu, should be restored to him; and that the princess Catherine should be given him in marriage, with eight hundred thousand crowns for her fortune.

* These were, first the standard of the Trinity: the second that of St. George: the third that of St. Edward: and on the fourth were displayed the arms of England.

† Hist. de France, tom. v. p. 542.

Henry, considering that the enemy was more powerful in horse, and that his foot, in which lay the chief strength of his army, would be exposed to the danger of being broken by the fury of the first charge, commanded the archers (a battalion of whom was placed in the wing under the command of the duke of York) to fix into the ground piles, or stakes, pointed with iron at both ends, and six or seven feet long, in their front and on their flanks or intervals between the horse and foot; within these pallisades, or piquets, his archers might retire, as within a little fortification, and from thence securely annoy the enemy, as these latter advanced.

Thus, differently arranged, the two armies stood facing one another a great part of the day, the English not caring to advance, lest they should lose something of the advantage they had in the ground; nor the French, for fear of being more straitened and crowded together than they were already. But as all delays were fatal to the former, who could not, in their circumstances, find means of subsistence, Henry at length advanced, at the head of his main division†, the two wings on each side moving at the same time (so as to preserve one wide-extended front), till he came within twenty paces of the village of Agincourt, when the French horse moved forwards to attack the English archers: upon this the English made an halt, and the foremost ranks fixed their stakes*, interweaving and bending them a little towards the enemy, and then retreating behind them, the bow-men began to let fly upon the enemy a shower of arrows, near four feet long, which being shot by men dexterous at that business, did incredible execution among the French, whose ranks were so close that they had hardly room to move; however, being pretty well thinned by the slaughter made amongst them, they advanced in a brisk pace to attack the archers and force their pallisades; mean while the two hundred bowmen, concealed in the meadow, issuing forth from their ambush, charged the French in flank with such irresistible fury, that they were obliged to give way; and the English archers, seeing their confusion, threw away their bows, and fell upon their enemies sword in hand.

The constable of France, perceiving the distress of his advanced party, moved forward to its assistance, but under terrible disadvantages; for the soil being wet and miry, and both horse and foot clad in a cumbersome lobster-like armour, and too closely wedged together, both men and beasts sunk up to the mid-leg in the ground, and continuing still to press upon each other, presented a defenceless body to the English archers, who made so good use of their missiles, that the whole of the first line was thrown into irretrievable disorder: in short, the business of our archers was that of executioners rather than of soldiers; for, rushing in amongst the disordered foe with their battle-axes and daggers, the field was quickly strewed with the killed, wounded, dismounted, and overthrown; and the constable, with a great number of the principal officers of the first line, being left dead upon the spot, the total rout of that corps was completed.

The second line of the French, under the duke of Alençon, stood firm in an adjoining field, and were eager to engage, hoping by their valour to repair the disgrace of their countrymen. Henry did not let them long expect him: he had all along kept close to his first line, moving forward as they advanced, in order to succour them upon occasion; but that body, having cleared itself from the enemy without his assistance, now opened to the right and left, in order to give passage to the king at the head of his second line, and to fall into the rear themselves, there to rally.

Alençon expected him with a gallant intrepidity; but, willing to take every advantage that contests of this kind allow, he gave orders to eighteen French knights to keep a strict eye upon the king of England, and to use all their efforts to slay or take him prisoner. This precaution had like to have proved fatal to England; but Henry's genius ruled that day superior: animated with the success of his first line, and burning with ardour to signalize himself by acts above the common level, as soon as he came within a proper distance of the French line, he alighted from his horse, and advancing at the head of his division with an heroic confidence that seemed to bespeak victory, he charged the enemy with a valour equal to that of the most renowned heroes in history; when the duke of Alençon, with a spirit worthy his high blood and rank, seemed to take courage from the noble adversary he had to encounter, and received the attack of the English with a firmness which deserved a better fate: while Henry, however, was exposing his person like the meanest soldier, fighting on foot at the head of his men, the French knights, who had never lost sight of him, cut a passage with their swords to the place where he fought; and rushing upon him all at once, would probably have made themselves masters of his life and person, had it not been for the bravery of David Gam, a Welsh captain, and two other officers of the same nation, who, seeing the peril that threatened their sovereign, flew to his assistance, and joining their arms to his, the eighteen assailants were stretched breathless on the field; but Gam and his two gallant comrades were likewise mortally wounded. Henry, recovering himself from the confusion this unexpected attack had thrown him into, beheld his loyal defenders stretched at his feet in the agonies of death. This was no time for unavailing expressions of pity; but, to demonstrate his gratitude, he knighted all three as they lay upon the field. This noble tribute paid, he darted into the hottest of the battle, to revenge the late attempt of the foe; and, forgetful of the danger he had lately been in, his ardour carried him on with such impetuosity, that he was again in the most imminent jeopardy. His brother Gloucester, who had fought by his side, was struck to the ground; the enemy pressed on in crowds, to avail themselves of this incident; Henry saw himself almost alone in the midst of an host of foes; but, wholly unappalled, he bestrode the body of his brother, covering him with his shield, and defending him with his sword. In this situation he received such a blow with a battle-axe on his helmet that made him stagger and fall on his knees: at that very instant fate directed the duke of York, with a stout body of the English, to the spot; upon whose appearance the enemy somewhat giving way, Henry and his brother had both time to recover themselves; and being soon after joined by another reinforcement, they fell upon the French in their turn with such fury, that they were no longer able to stand the shock of the English, now doubly enraged by the thoughts of their sovereign's danger.

The duke of Alençon, seeing the defeat of his division, which was the second, and fearing the third would have no better success, resolved to make one effort, in order to restore the battle, or spare himself the mortification of surviving the disgrace of his country: he put himself at the head of some chosen volunteers, and, cutting his way to the spot where Henry fought, he rushed upon the English monarch, killed the duke of York by his side, and cleft the crown on Henry's helmet with the first stroke of his sword; the latter was not slow in returning the salutation, and, calling all his strength to his aid, he discharged such a blow at Alençon with his faulchion as brought him to the ground, and with his own hand slew two of his followers, who endeavoured to cover their master's body. At length the duke called out that he was Alençon, and demanded quarter of the king, which Henry, admiring his courage, was ready to grant him, and had even stretched forth his hand to lift him from the earth; but the English soldiers, who now surrounded their king, were so exasperated at the Frenchman's attempt, that they dispatched him with their swords and spears before the king had time to restrain their brutal loyalty. The death of this general was attended with the total defeat of the line which he commanded.

The third line of the French, being still fresh and in good order, might have renewed the battle; but their hearts failing at the sight of the past and present slaughter, and observing that Henry had detached a body of English horse to charge them in the rear, while he advanced with a body of fresh troops to attack them in front, they retired from the field, without striking a blow.

In this battle, which was gained by the English with the loss only of the duke of York, the earl of Suffolk, and about a thousand men on their side, there were about ten thousand French slain in the field, among whom were the dukes of Brabant, Bar, and Alençon, Charles d'Albret, constable of France, and near eight thousand gentlemen; of prisoners there were taken fourteen thousand, and among these the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu and Vendosme, the marshal Boucicaut, and Arthur, brother to the duke of Brittany, with many other noblemen and gentlemen of distinction.

Hardly had Henry gained this signal victory, when he thought himself in danger of seeing it wrested from him. The troops of the French vanguard, or first line, that had been routed in the beginning of the battle, had rallied afterwards, and, being joined by others, drew up at some distance from the field, and appeared on an eminence like a new army disposed to try the fate of another engagement: there happened at the same time an alarm, that another party of the enemy were in his rear, and had already plundered his camp. These were only a company of runaways, headed by Robert de Bournonville, who, retiring early out of the fight, and knowing the English camp was but weakly guarded, had fallen upon and pillaged it, while the two second lines of the English and French were engaged. Before the truth of this affair could be rightly understood, the English, seeing the number of their prisoners exceeded that of their own forces, began to put some of them to death, in order to be disencumbered and at liberty for a renewal of the fight, which they now expected; but they were stopped in the midst of this bloody, though perhaps necessary, precaution by Henry's orders, who sent a herald to the body that appeared on the eminence to acquaint them, that, should they remain in that posture, or advance, or not disperse, he would put every prisoner he had in his power to the sword without mercy, and then march against themselves, who must expect the like treatment from him, if he overcame. Intimidated at this declaration, they instantly dispersed, and left him complete master of the field. He then marched towards the camp, in order to succour his people there; and, upon his approach, Bournonville with his party took to flight.

Nothing now remaining to oppose his victorious arms, Henry's first care was to offer his humble and grateful acknowledgements to Heaven for so signal and unexpected a victory, and public thanksgivings were accordingly ordered throughout his army. After this just and decent tribute, he sent for the French herald, named Montjoy (who was, with four more, come, in his master's name, to ask permission to bury the dead), and formally demanded of him, to whom he thought the victory belonged? the other replying, "to the English," the king next asked him the name of a neighbouring castle, to which he pointed with his sword, and being told it was called the castle of Agincourt, "henceforward then (said he), this action shall be known by the name of the Battle of Agincourt."

Notwithstanding this glorious victory, Henry, being in an enemy's country, ordered his soldiers to destroy the greatest part of the plunder, and to resume their march towards Calais the very next day. According to Monstrelet, the marshal de Louvigny, at the head of six hundred men at arms, and the duke of Brittany, with forces almost equal to those of the English, were come very near the field of battle, when they received the news of the defeat of the French: if the latter, adds my author, had led on his fresh troops against the wearied and wounded English, he might probably have recovered the victory; but he retired immediately into Brittany, where he remained neuter from that day. However this might be, it is certain that Henry brought his army to Calais by slow marches, without meeting with any obstructions on his way. Having staid about three weeks here, to recruit his troops, he embarked with them for England, on the sixteenth of November, and, after an easy passage, landed the same evening at Dover, from whence he set out in a day or two for London, where he was received by the citizens with all honours due to the glory and success of his military achievements.

After taking some repose from his late fatigues, Henry set himself to cultivate a good intelligence with foreign princes, in order that he might find no diversion for his arms so long as he continued the war with France. With this view he sent ambassadors to adjust some differences that had arisen, in point of trade, with the crown of Norway and the Hanse Towns: he also concluded a treaty with the king of Arragon, and even made some proposals of marriage between himself and that prince's daughter; and sent to require of the king of Castile, that, in consideration of the nearness of blood between them, he should renounce any alliance with the court of France, that might be prejudicial to the interests of England, or contrary to the treaties subsisting between the two nations.

The year 1416 opened in England by a parliament, which met at Westminster on the sixteenth of March, and voted the king a plentiful supply, with many expressions of gratitude for the hazards he had run in defence of the rights of the kingdom, in his last glorious campaign.

The emperor Sigismund had been for some time at the court of France, and had drawn up a plan of a truce, which he intended to communicate to Henry without loss of time. He accordingly came to Calais, where he was magnificently entertained by the earl of Warwick, the governor; and having received safe-conducts for himself and all his retinue*, he arrived in England in the beginning of April; and on the twenty-third of that month, being the feast of St. George, he was installed a knight of the Garter. His principal business was to settle a peace between France and England: William of Bavaria, earl of Holland and Zealand, who came over at the same time, and for the same purpose, joined his endeavours; but their negotiations came to nothing, either by the insincerity of the French in their manner of treating, or because the terms insisted on by the English were too unreasonable for the French princes, who were prisoners, and who were parties in the negotiation, to answer for their performance. What seems to countenance the charge of insincerity on the part of the French, was the preparations then making in France for invading England, and the actual blocking up Harfleur by a fleet of nine great carracks and a number of other vessels, in hopes of starving the garrison into a surrender; but that fleet being beaten and several of the ships sunk and taken, the place was relieved in the beginning of August, and supplied with all necessaries.

Sigismund seems to have been well satisfied with Henry's conduct in this negotiation; for he thought proper, on this occasion, to enter into an alliance with the English monarch, and both powers mutually agreed "to support each other against all others, the church and pope of Rome excepted." They likewise agreed, that neither of them should enter into any measures prejudicial to the honour or interest of the other: that their subjects should reciprocally enjoy a free and undisturbed trade. It was farther agreed, that the king of England might, by force of arms, endeavour the recovery of his rights, and the emperor do the same, against France, without the one contracting power obstructing the progress of the other. Lastly, that they should mutually assist each other, and mutually guarantee their acquisitions in case of a peace with France. This convention was signed at Canterbury, on the fifteenth of August this year†; and the emperor, in a few days after, took his leave, and passed over to France, in his way to Germany. But before we take our leave of this prince, we cannot forbear taking notice of the very extraordinary manner in which he was received upon his first coming over, and which we find thus related by the author who writes under the name of Titus Livius, by Walsingham, Goodwin, and other of our English historians.

While Sigismund was in France, he had been admitted to be present at a session of the parliament of Paris, in which, from a notion, perhaps, that emperors enjoy a power paramount to that of kings, he had exercised an act of sovereign jurisdiction. This coming to the ears of Henry and his nobility, they resolved to inform his imperial majesty, that the king and people of England knew no superior but God. The duke of Gloucester and other English noblemen were ordered by Henry to receive the emperor at his landing. He was brought over in a magnificent fleet of English ships, and approaching near the shore, he found the duke and his retinue first drawn up upon the strand, and then advancing towards the boat wherein he was, and which they stopped: this extraordinary proceeding was followed by a declaration from the duke of Clarence, in the name of the king and people of England, "That if his imperial majesty was to land as a friend, an ally, and a mediator of peace, he should meet with all the respect due to his high dignity; but that the crown and nation of England being free and independent, they were ready to oppose his landing if he claimed any power as a sovereign paramount." The emperor having, in reply, formally declared that he came with no such intent, but only as a friend, ally, and mediator of peace, he was received on shore with the most profound demonstrations of regard; and, after being highly entertained on the road, was met by Henry himself at Blackeath, and conducted in great pomp to London.

While these matters were transacting in England, the spirit of giddiness and inconstancy, which had seized the French nation as well as their king, did what the battle of Agincourt would never have effected alone. Two dauphins were already dead, and the third, who was afterwards Charles VII. and at that time only sixteen years of age, endeavoured to save the remains of this great wreck. Queen Isabella, of Bavaria, his mother, had extorted letters patent from her husband, by which she was entrusted with the reins of government. She was a covetous woman, and greatly addicted to gallantry, and was not a little suspected of carrying on a criminal correspondence with the lord of Bois Bourdon, a young and handsome nobleman of the court. The treasure of which she had plundered the kingdom, and her husband, she partly bestowed on this favourite, and carefully deposited the rest in several monasteries. The dauphin and the Armagnac faction, the count of which name had been lately made constable of France, upon the death of Albret, having discovered this hoard, had made use of it, for the pressing wants of the public. To this affront, which she received from her son, the king added another of a more sensible nature: one evening, as he was going to pay a visit to the queen in her own apartments he met the lord of Bois Bourdon coming out; he instantly ordered him to be apprehended and sent to the Chatelet, where he was put to the torture, and confessed his having, for some time, maintained a criminal intimacy with the queen, together with many other things laid to his charge; upon which he was ordered to be sewed up in a sack, and thrown into the river Seine. The queen was directly sent prisoner to Blois, and from thence to Tours, without being suffered to speak with the king. It was this accident, and not the battle of Agincourt, that placed the crown of France on our Henry's head. The queen, in this distress, implored the assistance of the duke of Burgundy, who gladly embraced this opportunity of establishing his own authority on these new distractions of his country.

Accordingly he raised a strong army; and, having entered France, he soon reduced Amiens, Abbeville, Dourlens, Mountrueil, and other towns in Picardy: Senlis, Rheims, Chalons, Troyes, and Auxerre declared themselves for his party. He made himself master of Beaumont, Pontoise, Vernon, and Meulant, towns in the neighbourhood of Paris; and, advancing westward, subdued Etampes, Chartres, and other fortresses; and at last was able to deliver the queen from her confinement, who repaired to Troye, and from thence published declarations against the Orleans and Armagnac factions, who, as she alleged, detained her husband in confinement. In the mean time the duke of Burgundy was not wanting in every measure that policy, or the present situation of his affairs, could dictate. He sent ambassadors to Henry, in the month of September this year; between whom it was agreed, that the king and he should meet at Calais, and the interview was fixed for the beginning of October: but this negotiation was carried on so secretly, that the French court of those days was intirely ignorant of its terms, which did not appear till a long time after, that the public records printed in England first discovered the secret.

On the day appointed this interview was held; and the duke then signed and sealed the following articles, which we shall give exactly as they are to be found in the ninth volume of the Collection of Public Acts.

"The king having acquainted the duke of Burgundy with his just claim to the crown of France, and his adversary's refusal to give him satisfaction, told him, that, by the help of God and St. George, he was resolved to obtain it by force of arms. Upon this declaration, the duke perceiving the justice of the king's title, and considering the great victories heaven had blessed him with, promises to send him his letters patent, containing what follows:

"That though, heretofore, for want of information, he had espoused the contrary party, believing it just; now that he is better informed, he promises firmly to adhere to the king of England, and his heirs and successors, as to those who are, and ever will be, the true and lawful kings of France, as much as if they were in actual possession of the crown.

"Though for the present the king has not desired the duke's homage, yet, as the duke owns it to be due, he promises, that as soon as the king of England shall be possessed of a considerable part of the realm of France, to pay him liege-homage, and swear fealty to him, as every vassal of the crown of France ought to do to the king of France his sovereign.

"Item, The duke of Burgundy promises to endeavour, by all known and unknown ways, to place the king of England on the throne of France.

"Item, Whilst the king shall be employed in pursuing his rights, the duke of Burgundy will make war with all his forces upon the king's enemies in France, namely, A. B. C. D. and upon all their dominions and adherents, refusing obedience to the king of England.

"Item, In all the alliances and letters patent made, or to be made, between the king and the duke, wherein the duke should except, or have excepted the king's adversary, or the son of his adversary, it is not his intention to do any thing contrary to what he promises by these presents, which he is to give the king, but will punctually perform it.

"That if, through dissimulation, the duke excepted the king's adversary, or the dauphin his son, for a greater good, and for the better accomplishing the intended project, his will and meaning is, that all such exceptions are void, and of no effect.

"And that all may know this proceeds from his own free consent, he will promise and swear by his faith and honour, to observe it without fraud or deceit. He will write all the articles with his own hand, sign them, and set his usual seal to them."

This treaty was the sole cause of the great revolution which happened in France; and it must be confessed, that the duke acted a detestable part, and such as cannot be approved by any honest man.

At the same time the duke made a treaty of a more public nature with the emperor, who was then at Calais (but entirely ignorant of what had passed between Henry and the duke), by which the former agreed to pay the emperor homage for the counties of Burgundy and Alost. This served as a pretext to cover the true reason of the duke's visit to Calais; and to complete the scene of double-dealing, Henry, feigning to let himself be persuaded by the instance of the emperor Sigismund (who, on this occasion acted the part of a great prince and a good Christian, by his unwearied endeavours to restore peace and public tranquillity), consented to a truce with France, which was to commence on the ninth of October, and hold to the second of February following: and then passed over to England, where a parliament was held, on the nineteenth of October, and the house was acquainted by the chancellor, that the king had found all his pacific inclinations frustrated by the obstinacy of an unjust enemy, and that the last appeal must be the sword; and concluded with desiring their advice and assistance. In consequence of which, they granted a handsome subsidy.

In this parliament the king created Thomas Beaufort, the earl of Dorset who was governor of Harfleur, duke of Exeter, with the usual pension of one thousand pounds per annum.

Henry

Henry employed all the remainder of this year, and great part of 1417, in making prodigious preparations for a second invasion of France, to which he was not a little excited by his knowledge of the distracted condition of affairs in that state, which prevented it from exerting any efforts of consequence for its own defence; for by this time the party of the duke of Burgundy and the queen carried every thing before them, and had found means to raise an insurrection in Paris, which was always attached to their interest. L'Isle Adam, one of the duke's captains, entered the city in the night, and put himself at the head of the insurgents, who soon encreased to such a number, that they bore down all opposition: the king himself was seized; the dauphin escaped with great difficulty; the chief partizans of the Armagnac faction were put to the sword; that nobleman himself, and several of his friends, were thrown into prison; murders were daily committed from private feuds, under pretence of public differences; and the enraged and desperate populace, not chusing to wait for the slow decision of law, burst open the prisons and butchered the count of Armagnac and all the other noblemen who had been there confined.

While France was thus distracted with civil commotions, Henry, having rendezvoused his army at Southampton, which, according to Goodwin, amounted to twenty-five thousand six hundred and twenty-eight fighting men, besides a thousand pioneers, and having appointed the duke of Bedford his lieutenant of England, he embarked at Portsmouth, on the twenty-third of July, 1417, with all his troops on board a fleet of fifteen hundred sail, and landed, on the first of August, at Beville, in Normandy, in sight of a great body of French troops, who were drawn up on the shore to oppose him. Upon his arrival he besieged the castle of Tongre, which surrendered on the ninth of August; and its fate was soon followed by that of Dambieres, a strong fortress, which capitulated to the earl of Salisbury. Those two important places being thus reduced, Henry next proceeded to lay siege to the city of Caen, the capital of Lower Normandy, which he invested on each side, and pushed his operations so vigorously, that the garrison, though numerous and provided with every thing suitable for a longer defence, thought proper to capitulate on the twentieth of September; when Henry, with a bloody policy, which we shall not attempt to defend, finding the place very populous, and fearing to be encumbered with prisoners, ordered a great number of the inhabitants to be put to the sword in cool blood. He then appointed sir Gilbert Umfreville governor of the place, and continuing the progress of his arms, made himself master of Bayeux, Lisieux, Courci, Argenton, the large city of Sees, the strong castle and town of Alençon, with the towns and castles of Boumolegas, de Rugles, and Vernueil. All this time the court of France continued in the greatest perplexity: the duke of Burgundy, at the gates of Paris, hindered the government from taking any steps for the defence of Normandy, which gave Henry such decisive advantages, that, before the end of the year, he brought the town and castle of Falaise, esteemed one of the strongest places in France, to surrender, though not till after an obstinate defence: the town capitulated on the twentieth of December, but the castle was not yielded up till the beginning of the February following.

Mean time the king of France, the constable, and the dauphin, who were shut up in Paris, thought their only refuge was to renew the negotiations with Henry. To that end they demanded a conference between ambassadors of the two crowns, to consult about means to conclude a peace. Plenipotentiaries were accordingly nominated, who met at Bernonville, in Normandy, in the latter end of November, where the lowest terms that Henry would condescend to accept were, "an acknowledgement of his right to the crown of France, which, however, he would allow Charles to enjoy for life, in case the following demands were granted, viz. the giving him in marriage the princess Catherine; the being declared regent of the realm during Charles's illness; and a solemn oath to be taken by the estates, and by all magistrates and officers, to obey him in this capacity, and maintain his succession after the decease of king Charles*." A compliance with these demands would have divested the Armagnac party immediately of all the power they had in the court of France; and they were, indeed, so exorbitant, that Henry could hardly have made them in any other juncture; it is no wonder, therefore, they were rejected; and the king of England did nothing in the way of treaty for the service of his affairs, besides concluding a truce with the duke of Brittany, and another with Yolante, or Violante, queen of Sicily, and her eldest son, Lewis, for the county of Maine and the duchy of Anjou.

The winter proved very sharp, and Henry staid at Falaise till he had taken possession of the castle, which, pursuant to the capitulation, was delivered to him on the sixteenth of February, 1418; and then he sent detachments of his army, under the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, to reduce the other places which as yet held out in Lower Normandy. The first of those generals took Courtonne, Cambreys, Tibouville, Harcourt, and Bec Halouin, as the latter did Vere, Hambie, Tournay, St. Lo, Homouil, Carentan, Pont Douve, St. Sauveur le Vicomte, Briquebec, Nehou, and at length the important fortress of Cherbourg, which, in hopes of succours, held out several months, but was at length forced to surrender in August, to avoid a more dismal fate by famine. The earls of Huntingdon and Warwick, who had been likewise sent, at the head of a third division, to reduce other places, made themselves masters of Coutances and Damfront; while Henry himself made preparations for the siege of Rouen, having sent for a reinforcement of fifteen thousand fresh men from England. He reduced Ivry and Evreux in May, and then marched, in the beginning of the next month, to Louviers, which he took in a fortnight after he invested it. He next led his victorious troops against Pont de l'Arche, which being a place of greater consequence, as commanding a passage over the Seine, this siege was a more difficult enterprize; but finding means to pass part of his forces over to the north side of the river, he obliged the garrison to capitulate for a surrender, if not relieved within a fortnight. The way being thus opened to Rouen, the capital of Upper Normandy, and the taking of which was to put Henry into possession of the whole of this province, he sat down before it on the twenty-ninth of July, and presently made himself master of the abbey and fort of St. Catherine, in the suburbs; but as the place was perfectly well supplied with four thousand fighting men, besides fifteen thousand inhabitants, all trained to war, Henry in vain exerted all his efforts to take it by force, and he was obliged to turn the siege into a blockade, in hopes of starving the garrison into a surrender.

It was during Henry's lying before this place, that the duke of Burgundy and the queen became possessed of Paris, and the person of the senseless king, in the manner we have already related; while the dauphin, who had made his escape from the general carnage which ensued, retired behind the Loire, and, assuming the title of Regent, threatened all who should obey the duke of Burgundy; while that prince, acting in concert with the queen, and having the king in his power, issued, in his name, such orders as they thought most conducive to their own interests.

Such was the desperate state of affairs in France, when the cardinal d'Ursini, who had been sent by Martin V. lately elected pope by the council of Constance, to France, to try to appease the troubles of that kingdom, and unite the two factions, arrived in Henry's camp, in order to pursue the same salutary work, and endeavour to persuade the king of England to moderate his terms, and agree to an equitable peace; but Henry's answer plainly shewed that he was fully determined to avail himself to the utmost of the distresses of his competitor; upon which the cardinal desisted from his mediation. Notwithstanding this declaration, Henry still continued his negotiations with the heads of both the French factions. To the dauphin he offered, that, on condition all the territories ceded to Edward III. by the treaty of Bretigny should be given up to him, with all those places in Normandy which he had not yet reduced, together with Guienne and the Marches of Calais; and that the count of Armagnac (son of him who had been murdered by the populace), and the lord d'Albret, would submit to his allegiance; and that the places so ceded might by him be held in full resort, and in full sovereignty; that then he (Henry), would march with his whole force, to deliver the king, the queen, and the princess Catherine out of the duke of Burgundy's hands: but that afterwards the dauphin should assist him in conquering Flanders from the duke of Burgundy, which was likewise to be given to the king of England in full sovereignty."

To the dauphin's immortal honour, he rejected these proposals, nobly declaring, that he never would gratify his private revenge at the expence of his country's dishonour, by aggrandizing the power of her most formidable enemy; and accordingly this treaty dropped to the ground.

During the dependence of this negotiation, which was held at Alençon in the month of November, the king of France, by Henry's own invitation to the duke of Burgundy, had nominated the bishop of Beauvais, Morvilliers, first president of his parliament, and others, as his commissioners for opening another congress at Pont de l'Arch, under the mediation of the cardinal d'Ursini; the negotiations were opened on the twenty-second of December; but were interrupted almost as soon as begun, by a frivolous punctilio. The plenipotentiaries of Charles (or rather of the duke of Burgundy, who managed all things) demanded that the writings should be engrossed in the French language, and the English refused to comply with the proposal: in vain did the legate recommend a medium, and advise that there should be two copies written, one in French, and the other in Latin; an expedient to which Henry consented: the duke of Burgundy was inflexible, and the end of the congress was frustrated. Nevertheless, it did not fail to alarm the dauphin, who, being ignorant of the particulars of the transactions, apprehended a peace between Henry and the duke of Burgundy, which could not but be to his prejudice; he therefore sent ambassadors to Henry, desiring him to appoint a place for renewing the negotiation begun at Alençon; and the king of England, finding his account in blowing the coals of dissention, agreed to a personal conference with the dauphin, on the twenty-sixth of March following, at Louviers. Henry came in time to the place of meeting, but the dauphin not keeping his word, it was so highly repented, that a stop was put to any farther treaty.

We are now come to the close of the year 1418, distinguished by bloodshed, conquest, calamity, and civil war. But before we enter upon that in which Henry, by unforeseen accidents, acquired more than he had by his most shining conquests, it will be necessary to take a view of what passed in England while its monarch was thus engaged on the continent.

Sir John Oldcastle, ever since the defeat of his conspiracy, already mentioned, had lurked from place to place, but chiefly on the borders of Wales; at last John Grey, lord Powis, hearing where the knight was, got together five or six thousand men, and took him, after a desperate resistance: Oldcastle was immediately brought to London, to the great joy of the clergy, who bore him an implacable hatred. No sooner had they got him in their power, than they were determined to sacrifice him for a terror to the rest of the Lollards, whom they had never ceased persecuting since Henry's accession to the throne; and, notwithstanding the birth and great military merit of Cobham, he was sentenced to be hung up by the middle with a chain, and burnt alive thus hanging; a fate which he suffered with great intrepidity. He was the first nobleman who suffered on account of religion. This execution was followed by several others of a like inhuman nature, and the whole nation was filled with scenes of persecution against the poor Lollards, whose utter extirpation seemed to be the darling purpose of the souls of the clergy.

The Scots, taking advantage of the absence of the king, and of the disturbances these persecutions raised in the kingdom, entered it with two armies, one of which, under the duke of Albany, laid siege to Berwick, as the other, under the earl of Douglas, did to Roxburgh. But the duke of Bedford, who had been left regent in Henry's absence, took such prompt and effectual measures for opposing the invaders, that they were forced to retire with the utmost precipitation; the earl of Northumberland pursuing those who had laid siege to Berwick several days marches into their own country; sir Robert Umfreville, warden of the eastern borders, doing the same by the army before Roxburgh: and for two years successively the English continued to make the severest reprisals on their country, wasting it with fire and sword for a great extent.

From Stowe, Walsingham, and Speed we learn, that, in this year, Joan of Brittany, widow of king Henry IV. and mother-in-law of the reigning king, was detected in conspiring with her confessor against the king: some add, she was condemned to a ten years imprisonment, and that her confessor was killed by the chaplain of the Tower, in a dispute upon that occasion. This is all we can say concerning that accusation, of which historians speak very confusedly. Let us now return to Normandy, where we left Henry before Rouen.

The various political measures in which he was engaged, did not at all affect his warlike operations: the siege of that capital had now lasted upwards of six months; and the besieged, after having made a noble defence, were reduced to the utmost extremity, having eaten up all their horses and domestic animals, including even rats, mice, and other vermin; the duke of Burgundy had amused the inhabitants, from time to time, with false hopes of relief; they had already seen above fifty thousand of their comrades perish amongst them, partly by famine, and partly by the chance of war, during the siege; and now, finding it impossible to hold out any longer and live, they treated, on the thirteenth of January, 1419, for a surrender. Henry, commiserating their hapless case, and reverencing valour and fidelity though in an enemy, granted them terms as favourable as they could expect in their situation, and after so obstinate a resistance; some few of the inhabitants were left to his mercy; but the rest, on paying a fine of three hundred thousand crowns, were pardoned and exempted from plunder and confiscation of their effects. The place was delivered up to the English on the nineteenth of January, and Henry's entrance into it was extremely magnificent. The surrender of Rouen was followed by that of Caudebec, Gaillon, la Roche d'Andilly, Mante, Ponte Audemer, Goulet, Honfleur, l'Islebonne, Feschamp, Montevilliers, Dieppe, Neufchatel, Eu, Gournay, and all the other strong fortresses in Upper Normandy; so great and universal was the terror with which all that province was struck by the reduction of its capital.

Henry now appeared publicly with all the distinctions of a duke of Normandy; and he settled such excellent regulations, not only in Rouen, but over all the duchy, that in a very short time the city, which had been reduced almost to desolation, recovered its former lustre; and the country grew rich, satisfied with the change of government, and full of those sentiments of respect, admiration, and affection to Henry, which a sense of the benefits they received from him, naturally inspired: and thus did all Normandy, a few castles excepted, fall again under the dominion of the kings of England, two hundred and fifteen years after it had been taken from them by Philip Augustus, in the reign of John Lackland. After the surrender of Rouen, Henry sent part of his army into Picardy, under the command of the duke of Exeter, who became master of Montrueil, and other strong places there. We must not forget to mention with honour some of the most eminent persons who died in the English army during the siege of Rouen: these were Henry Beaufort, earl of Somerset; Edmund Beaufort, earl of Montague; sir Gilbert Talbot, sir John Blunt, the prior of Kylmainham, in Ireland, and the lord of Castrylogne, in Gascony*.

Henry still continued his negotiations with both the parties in France; with the queen and the duke of Burgundy on one hand, who, being in possession of the king's person, enjoyed the appearance of legal authority; and with the dauphin on the other, who, as he was the undoubted heir of the crown, was strongly supported by all those who wished well to the interest of their country. These two factions likewise were perpetually engaged in mutual negotiations with each other, and the terms offered by all parties were constantly shifting, according to the different merits of the war, and the greater or less prevalence of the intrigues of the cabinet: but we shall pass over the ineffectual congresses, insincere professions, and unfulfilled promises on all sides, as having nothing in them material to our history. It is sufficient to say, that at length a meeting was proposed to be held between the two kings of England and France, at Meulan. Henry, upon this, removed with his court to Mante; and the dauphin left nothing unattempted to prevent the interview, but in vain, for it was held on the thirtieth of May, 1419, at the place appointed; but the queen of France attended for her husband, who had fallen ill on his journey.

The first day the queen of France brought with her the princess Catherine, her daughter, now in all the bloom of youth and beauty, and Henry was so struck with her appearance, that he could not conceal the emotions of his heart. The artful queen beheld the effects of her daughter's charms with a secret pleasure, and thought to inflame the desires of Henry by not letting the princess appear any more: but the warrior-lover soon perceived her design, and that the young lady had been introduced only as a decoy to ensnare him; therefore, to cut short all their expectations on that head, he told the duke of Burgundy, that he was determined not to lay down his arms till he had the king and princess in his power, and had expelled that man the kingdom who should dare to oppose it: a declaration more reconcileable to the extravagance of an enamorado in romance, than a great and wise king, such as Henry V. shewed himself to be. At this first meeting nothing was concluded on besides a truce for eight days, during which time the conferences were to be managed by commissioners.

These accordingly met on the second of June, and proceeded upon the business committed to their discussion. The particulars of the propositions made on each side, are thus handed down to us by Goodwin, a careful and accurate historian.

In this conference (says he) the king of England declared, "That he desired a firm peace and alliance with the king of France, if the following conditions might be granted, viz. That all the dominions which had been ceded to Edward III. by the great peace of Bretigny, should be delivered to him and his heirs: that the whole duchy of Normandy, with all the other places he had conquered in France, should be confirmed to him, with an absolute independent sovereignty over them: that the king of France, by a writing, should renounce all future right to those dominions, and transfer it entirely to him: that, since some of the demanded towns and territories were in the hands of the enemy, therefore, as by war and conquest he should gain them, so they should remain in his possession."

The demands made by the French were:

"That the king of England, for himself, his heirs, and successors, should renounce all right and claim which he or his predecessors had to the crown of France.

To which he consented, excepting only those dominions which were due to him by the peace concluded at Bretigny, and all other places which ought and should be delivered to him by the present treaty.

"That the king of England should disclaim all right and title to the duchies of Touraine, Anjou, and Brittany, and to the counties of Picardy and Maine.

This the king wholly rejected.

"That he should swear, for himself and successors, that he would never expect nor accept of any devolution of right to the crown of France, or any of its dominions, to be made to him by any person; but that he should renounce all such title as might, for the future, be transferred to him, those places which might be given in this treaty only excepted.

To which article answer was made, that the king was well satisfied with it, upon condition that the French king would, on his part, do the same.

"That all these acts of the king should be promised, sworn, ratified, and confirmed by the king's brothers, and the three states of the kingdom.

But this the king utterly refused.

They made also this proposal, "That their king should give an equivalent, on the frontiers of Aquitaine, for the county of Ponthieu, and other places, which the king of England claimed by Monstrueil.

But this likewise being disapproved:

"They demanded, that as the king by this present treaty, was to have the duchy of Normandy, in which some towns were yet unsubdued by him, so he should resign to the French king all the conquests he had made out of that duchy; and that all persons, ecclesiastical and civil, should enjoy peaceably their living and estates, and the universities of France have the same privileges which they had before the war.

This the king freely granted, only with an exclusion of the Scots, and those who were rebels.

The French farther asked, "That the king would repay six hundred thousand crowns in gold, which were given Richard II. in part of the English hundred thousand, the dowry promised with the princess Isabella, and all her jewels and furniture, which amounted to the value of four hundred thousand crowns, which Richard II. for himself and heirs, had promised should be restored, if his queen survived him; and John, duke of Lancaster, Edmund, duke of York, Thomas, duke of Gloucester, and many others, were sureties for the performance.

To which the king answered, that though this payment could not in justice be expected from him, yet it should be compensated by a sum equal to it, viz. that which was due for the ransom of king John of France: that as for the jewels and goods of the princess Isabella, he admired to hear them prized at the rate of four hundred thousand crowns, when it was well known they did not amount to a fourth part of that value.

When the French, to conclude all, required "That these articles might be drawn up in such words as their king and his council should advise.

The answer was, that he who had a right to ask it, should come and make the demand, and all reasonable satisfaction should be given him.

The French excepted against these answers to their demands, as expressed in too general terms, and having an obscure and uncertain meaning.

The English offered to remove all such ambiguities, and to give as plain and punctual a declaration of their sense as the French, with any reason, could desire.

But the French would not enter on such a debate, and refused to treat upon any other condition than that of the king of England's giving a direct and positive answer in concession to their articles.

It is easy to perceive, by the nature of these demands, that the difficulties on either side were not considerable enough to prevent the conclusion of a peace, had both parties been equally willing; but it is plain Henry had formed a resolution to be all or nothing; and this will appear still more evident from the minutes of a very serious debate, which was held in Henry's council, concerning the manner of proceeding, the particulars of which have been transmitted to us by the last-quoted author, and will be seen by the reader at large in the note*; as also by Henry's answer, when pressed to come to his lowest demand, which was, "That he would

* It was also debated, by the king's council, in what manner the treaty, at the interview, should be managed: whether the first demand should be made in general of the crown of France, and be insisted on till the French were brought to make such offers as might satisfy the king; or whether they should presently fall to particular and lower demands, as had been practised in other treaties: and it was determined to proceed in the way of a general demand, as Edward III. had done, because it was undoubtedly just; and they might afterwards moderate it, in reverence and condescension to the authority of the pope. It was also disputed, whether, if the demand of the crown should be refused, the king of France could transfer to the king of England any part of the dominions belonging to that crown; and it was judged, that he could not, because, as such a dismembering of the kingdom was prohibited by the fundamental laws of the government, so he was sworn to the contrary: to which were added two reasons more, viz. that his dissipated mind would make the act invalid; and that the greatest part of his nobles acknowledged no subjection to him. There was another doubt raised, whether a right of dominion could be conferred on the king of England over those subjects of France, who were not called to give their consent to it; which was resolved in the negative, upon this general reason, that acts adjudged against persons absent, did not oblige them. It was debated too, whether the king of France could abdicate his power of doing justice, in cases of appeal to him; and it was determined, that he could not; because an appeal being the last refuge of the oppressed for a remedy of their wrongs, it was contrary to the law of nature to deprive them of it. That which admitted another debate was, whether, when the general demand was made of the crown of France, the king should communicate to the cardinals des Ursins and St. Mark, the particular demands to which he meant to condescend; and it was advised, that since one of the cardinals embraced the French king's interest, it should not be done till that king, by the mediation of the cardinals, had made some considerable offers. make no peace, unless the sovereignty of the places ceded by the treaty of Bretigny, and of Normandy likewise, was yielded to him by the crown of France (a concession which his own council had declared a king of France could not make); and, lastly, that the princess Catherine should be given him in marriage." To this the queen and ministers of state objected, that it was not in their power to perform the treaty of Bretigny, because many of the cities mentioned in it, being possessed by the dauphin, were not at their disposal. Upon this answer Henry broke up the conferences, declaring that he would never sheathe the sword till he had brought his enemies to accept his terms.

On this occasion Henry seems to have outwitted himself by his exorbitant demands; and, by grasping at too much, to have endangered his losing all, by pushing the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy into one another's arms. The event appears to warrant the truth of this conjecture; for all France was alarmed at this interview at Meulant, because every one foresaw that no peace could be made at such a juncture, but what must prove of infinite prejudice to their country. Several of the principal nobility, therefore, instantly laboured to procure a reconciliation between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, or at least a suspension of animosity; and the young prince himself was so alarmed at the near prospect of a peace so disadvantageous to France, and prejudicial to his own interest, that he yielded to the remonstrances of the nobles, and consented to a reconciliation with the duke of Burgundy, as the only expedient that could prevent the calamity with which his country was threatened. The duke, on his side, having read all Henry's secret purposes in the manner of his proceeding, joined issue in this desirable end, and several private conferences were held between commissioners on both sides, which at length ended in a mutual agreement for a coalition. Henry seems to have discovered something of what was transacting, by the hasty manner in which he broke up the conference at Meulant; and, indeed, the treaty was so far advanced between the duke of Burgundy and the dauphin, that they had an interview at Pouilli, a fort about a league from Meulant, the eleventh of July, where all differences were made up between them with the most sincere marks of a cordial reconciliation; and they both signed an agreement, by which they engaged from henceforth to act vigorously against the English and all the enemies of France.

Thus did Henry, by his unaccountable obstinacy, effect what he had the greatest cause to dread, an union among his enemies: nevertheless, this apparent union, which seemed so prejudicial to his interest, was the very circumstance that contributed most to his success, and produced the most fatal effects to France, whose safety it was intended to have provided for. Henry, finding himself thus baffled, resolved to redouble his vigour, and in a short time found means to make himself master of Pontoise, a fortified town which lay within a few leagues only of Paris, whose inhabitants were now thrown into inexpressible consternation, which was still farther increased when the duke of Clarence, with the vanguard of the English army sat down before their very gates. However, the duke of Burgundy, being apprized of the danger of the capital, found means to throw in so strong a reinforcement, as to render the attacking that city an almost desperate undertaking, and to oblige Henry to recal the duke of Clarence, and make dispositions for reducing other places which lay on his back, in which he succeeded with amazing rapidity and success. By the surrender of Gisors and Meulant he found himself master of both the French and Norman Vexin; and the taking of Chateau Galliard and la Roche Guion, which happened somewhat later in the year, completed the conquest of Normandy. Proceeding still to farther enterprises, he reduced the castles of Montjoy and St. Germain en Laye. Upon this the duke of Burgundy, to gain time, sent ambassadors to renew the negotiations for peace; but Henry advancing to his former demands the cession of Ponthoise, and the country adjoining, the treaty came to nothing.

But an unexpected event, which now happened, did that in an instant for Henry, which would have required an age to have effected by arms. The reconciliation between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy was far from being sincere, at least on the part of the former, who could not be prevailed on by any intreaties to come to court, while the duke held the reins of power there, and even formed the cruel design of having him assassinated. This black project was to have been executed at Pouilli, but the duke having a great force with him, it was thought necessary to defer the attempt till a more convenient opportunity should offer. The dauphin having raised an army of twenty thousand men, advanced with it near Montereau sur Yonne, and sent Tanneguy de Chatel to desire a conference with the duke, upon the bridge between the town and the castle, in order to concert measures for the campaign against the English, and to settle some other matters of consequence*. The duke of Burgundy's distrust had, however, well nigh defeated the scheme; but the duke's evil genius, and the suggestions of his mistress, Giv'e, who privately corresponded with the dauphin, overcame all the reasonable apprehensions he entertained of putting himself in the power of a party, who had been his implacable enemies ever since the assassination of the duke of Orleans by his orders: he shut his eyes to danger, and rushed upon his fate, though not without taking all the expedients for security that could be devised.

On the day appointed for the interview, which was the thirtieth of September, the two princes repaired to Montereau; the duke took up his quarters in the castle, and the dauphin in the lower town, which was separated from the castle by the river Yonne: two rails were fixed upon the bridge which lay between them, and was to be the place of meeting; the gates on each side were to be guarded, the one by the officers of the dauphin, and the other by those of the duke; the princes were to meet in the middle of the bridge, attended each by ten persons; and, with all these symptoms of jealousy and distrust, to confirm and establish a mutual friendship.

But vain are all the precautions of human prudence, where laws have no place, and where all the principles of honour are abandoned. The as-assination committed by the duke of Burgundy, and, what was still more, his open avowal of the deed, and defence of the practice, tended to destroy all the ties of civil society; and even those who abhorred the example, might yet think it reasonable to make the author feel the natural consequences of his own doctrine. Tanneguy de Chatel, and others of the dauphin's attendants, were zealous friends of the house of Orleans, and gladly lent their aid to revenge the murder of the late duke by the death of the assassin. Burgundy began to have some bodings of the event, when he found the barriers shut and locked after him as he passed through them; and he was no sooner come into the presence of the dauphin, than, upon a concerted signal Tanneguy de Chatel first gave him a mortal wound in the face with his battle-axe, and the other attendants of the dauphin soon sheathed their swords in the bodies of the unfortunate duke and his ten followers.

Thus was the murder of the duke of Orleans revenged by another murder, which was so much the more detestable as being accompanied by violation of public faith: but one would be tempted to believe that this murder was not premeditated, so very badly had the authors taken their measures for supporting the consequences. Philip the Good, the new duke of Burgundy, who succeeded his father, became of course an enemy to the dauphin, through duty as well as politics. The queen, his mother, whom he had incensed, became as implacable as a step-mother; while the king of England, taking advantage of these horrid circumstances, proclaimed aloud that God led him by the hand to punish the iniquitous French †. The queen, and all the great men about court, sent to the duke of Burgundy, offering to join with him to revenge his father's murder, and a treaty was signed, on the seventeenth of October, at Arras for that purpose. The city of Paris sent deputies to desire of Henry a truce for the neighbourhood of that place till the twelfth of December, which was granted. And now the queen and the new duke of Burgundy, Philip, made overtures to Henry for a final peace, which proved more fatal to France than all the preceding wars had done; for they engaged that Henry should marry Catherine of France; that he should be declared regent of that kingdom, and govern the realm so long as Charles VI. lived, only permitting him and his queen to enjoy their royal dignity for life; and that, after the decease of Charles, the crown should descend to Henry and his heirs for ever; and that all the estates of the realm, the lords spiritual and temporal, the commons, cities, and corporations, should be sworn to maintain his regency and succession." These offers produced a general truce till Christmas-eve, and confirmed afterwards till its expiration should be declared ‡. Henry then acceded to a league between the king and queen of France and the duke of Burgundy, for revenging the late duke's death on the dauphin and his accomplices. These conventions served for the foundation of a perpetual peace between France and England; and a personal treaty was appointed between the two kings, to be held at Troye, on the twenty-first day of May the ensuing year.

We must make use of this interval of negotiating, to attend to the affairs of England.

On the sixteenth day of October, a parliament was held at Westminster, who granted the king one fifteenth and one tenth, and one half part of both. The chief public transaction of this parliament was, their passing an act for the consumption of home-manufactures, by providing, that all the English troops in France should be clothed and furnished with English commodities, manufactured in England.

In order to complete that extraordinary treaty, which was to transfer the crown of France to a stranger, Henry, attended by the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, repaired to Troye in the beginning of May, 1420. As king Charles was not fit to appear in public, the queen and the duke of Burgundy were empowered to swear to the peace in his name. The princess Catherine was also brought thither by her mother, and received from Henry a present of a ring of great value. Every thing being now ready, on the twenty-first of May the treaty was signed and sworn, with the usual formalities; and the same day Henry was affianced to the princess Catherine, but the marriage was not consummated till near a month after. The substance of this famous treaty was as follows:

TREATY of TROYE.

Whereas a final agreement and perpetual peace has been made and sworn, in the city of Troye, by us, Charles king of France, and our dearly and most beloved son Henry, king of England, constituted heir and regent of the crown of France, both by his marriage with the princess Catherine, our daughter, and by virtue of the articles of a treaty agreed on by both of us, for the good and benefit of us and our subjects, and for the safety of this nation, this is to declare, that all our subjects, and those of our before-mentioned son may converse and traffic together, as well in this country, as beyond the seas.

It is also agreed, that our son, king Henry, shall, from this time, honour us as his father, and our consort, the queen, as his mother; and that, during our life, he shall not disturb us in the quiet possession of our kingdom, in the same manner as we now enjoy it, with the royal dignity, and all the revenues, fruits, and profits of it; and that our royal consort may, while she lives, without any hindrance, take the state and dignity of queen, according to the custom of the kingdom, and possess such part of the revenues and profits of the crown as are suitable to her quality.

That the princess Catherine, our daughter, shall have such a dowry assigned to her in England, as the queens of that nation, in times past, usually had, that is, the yearly revenue of forty thousand crowns, two of which are to amount to the value of an English noble.

That our son Henry, by all ways and means that he can use, without violating the oath he has taken to observe the laws, customs, and rights of his kingdom of England, shall endeavour and make such provision, that the princess Catherine, our daughter, may be assured of her enjoying, from the time of his death, the said yearly revenue of forty thousand crowns in England.

That if the princess Catherine survive king Henry our son, she shall have paid to her yearly, out of France, from the time of his death, a dowry of forty thousand livres, to be raised from the lands and principalities which the queen dowager Blanche, wife of Philip of Valois, king of France, our great-grand-father, held as her dowry.

That, after her death, for all times to come, the crown of France, with all the rights and dominions which appertain thereto, shall remain to the king of England and his heirs for ever.

That whereas we are indisposed and incapable to reign, the whole power and exercise of the power of France, shall, even during our life, be devolved on our son king Henry, in conjunction with the council of the states of the kingdom, so as our son king Henry shall endeavour, to the utmost of his power, to govern zealously, industriously, and loyally, for the honour of God, of us, and our royal consort, and for the good of the kingdom, which he shall defend, preserve in peace, and manage all affairs according to the rules of justice and equity, with the counsel and assistance of the great lords, barons, and nobles of the kingdom.

It is also agreed, that our son, king Henry, shall so make use of his power, that the parliament of France, in all and every place subject to us, be preserved and maintained, both now and for the future, in all their entire authority and sovereignty.

That our son Henry, with all his power, shall preserve and maintain all and every noble, peer, city, town, community, and every particular private person now subject to us, or who shall be so, in their rights, privileges, dignities, liberties, and freedoms, belonging to them in all places of our dominions, or which shall be reduced to our obedience.

That our son, king Henry, shall diligently, loyally, and with all his power, endeavour that justice be administered in his kingdom of France, according to the ancient laws, rights, and customs of it, without partiality to any person; and shall uphold all the subjects of it in tranquility and peace; and, to his utmost ability, defend it from all violence and oppressions.

That our son, king Henry, shall, with all his ability, take care and provide that the offices of justice in parliament, of bailiwicks, seneschalships, and provosts, and other places of trust in the government, shall be conferred on persons qualified, useful, and fit for the good, just, peaceable, and quiet administration of affairs in the kingdom committed to them; and that they shall be such as the laws do authorize and appoint to be in those offices; and such as ought to be employed, to be serviceable for our good, and the prosperity of the nation.

That our son, king Henry, shall make use of all the power of his arms to reduce to our obedience all the towns, cities, castles, countries, and persons, which are yet in rebellion against us, siding with that party which is commonly called the party of the dauphin and of Armagnac.

That, to make the government more easy, free, and safe to our son, king Henry, the great lords, barons, nobles, the estates of the kingdom both spiritual and temporal, the cities, the considerable communities, and citizens and burghers of the towns now under our obedience, shall take the following oaths: 1. That all things, tending to the preservation of the government, they will humbly and obediently obey the commands of king Henry, as having the full power and authority to reign.

2. That they will, in their own particular, punctually observe whatever has been agreed between us, our royal consort, our council, and king Henry, or what shall hereafter be agreed; and will use all their power and care to see it observed by others. 3. That, from the time of our death, and ever after it, they will be faithful subjects to our son, king Henry, and his heirs; and will, without any contradiction, opposition, or difficulty, receive him for their sovereign lord, their liege and true king of France, and obey him as such; and that they will not be obedient to any other, as king or regent of France, our own person excepted. 4. That they shall not engage in any design or attempt to cause him to lose life or limb, to be taken prisoner, or to suffer damage or diminution in person, estate, honour, or goods; but that, if they know of any conspiracy against him, they will do all they can to prevent it, and discover it to him the first opportunity, by a messenger or letter.

It is also agreed, that all the conquests which our son, king Henry, shall make out of the duchy of Normandy, in the kingdom, shall appertain to us; and that he shall employ all his power that all estates and principalities, found in those new conquests to belong to any who are now good subjects, and will swear to observe our present agreement, shall be restored to their true proprietors.

That all beneficed ecclesiastics in the said duchy of Normandy, or in other places of France, subject to us, or our son, king Henry, or favouring the party of our beloved son the duke of Burgundy, who will swear to observe the present agreement, shall peaceably enjoy their benefices.

That in like manner, all who are the subjects of our son, king Henry, and who shall swear to observe the present agreement, shall peaceably enjoy their ecclesiastical benefices and preferment in all places of our dominions.

That all churches, universities, and ecclesiastical colleges, being in places subject to us, or which shall be so, or in the duchy of Normandy, or in any places of the kingdom of France, which are subject to our son, king Henry, shall enjoy their rights, possessions, rents, prerogatives, liberties, franchises, and honours; with a reserve to the rights of the crown and of any others.

That when our son, king Henry, shall come to the crown of France, the duchy of Normandy, and all other places conquered by him in France, shall be under the jurisdiction, obedience, and monarchy of the said crown.

That our son, king Henry, with all his power, shall procure, that all persons obedient to us, and favouring the Burgundian party, who have principalities, lands, revenues, and possessions in the duchy of Normandy, or other parts of France conquered by his arms, which have been given by him to them, shall, without any diminution of the crown of France, have compensation made to them by us, out of the lands conquered from those who are in rebellion: and if in our life this compensation be not made, our son, king Henry, shall make it when he comes to the crown of France; but if those principalities, lands, rents, or possessions were not given by him, they shall, without any delay, be restored to the proprietors.

It is also agreed, during our life, that whereas in all places subject to us, or which shall be so, the writs of common justice, the gifts of lands and benefices, benefices, the grants of pardons and privileges, are not valid, unless they be issued out under our name and seal; yet, since some cases and occasions may occur, to make it necessary or convenient for our son, king Henry, to do this, it shall be lawful for him to do so in our name, and his own as regent.

That, during our life, king Henry shall not assume the title of king of France.

That as long as we live, we will always give to our son, king Henry, the title of our most dear son, king of England, and heir of France; and in Latin we will stile him, "Noster præcharissimus filius Henricus, rex Angliæ, heres Franciæ."

It is also agreed, that our son, king Henry, shall not lay any taxes on our subjects but such as are reasonable and necessary, and to be employed for the public; nor shall he raise them by any other means than such as are agreeable to the laws and custom of the kingdom.

That, to preserve peace and concord between England and France, and to prevent any causes of difference for the future, our son, king Henry, shall take effectual care that, by the advice and consent of the three estates of both kindoms, it be ordained, that whenever our son, king Henry, or any of his heirs, shall come to wear the crown of France, the two kingdoms shall be for ever united under one king, that is, under king Henry, as long as he lives, and, after his death, under his heirs in a continued succession, and shall not, at the same time, be governed by two kings; and yet the rights, liberties, customs, usages, and laws of each kingdom, shall be kept distinct and inviolable, without subjecting one to the other.

That, from this present moment, all hatred, animosities, divisions, and wars shall cease between the two nations, and the people be fixed in this settled concert, mutually united in affections, counsels, joint-assistance, and defence against all enemies; and shall converse and traffic with one another, paying the usual customs in both kingdoms.

That all our confederates and allies, as also those of king Henry, who, in eight months after the publishing of this treaty of peace, shall declare their desire to be compromised in it, may be taken into it; reserving only to the two kingdoms, to us with our subjects, and to king Henry with his, all rights, actions, and remedies, in respect to those allies or confederates.

That our son, king Henry, with the advice of our most dear son, Philip, duke of Burgundy, and of other nobles of the kingdom, who may meet to consult about this affair, shall make an honourable provision for the maintenance of our person, suitable to our royal state and dignity; and that they shall so order things as that none, whether nobles or others, shall be admitted into our service, or to any offices about our person, nor be entertained as our domestics, but those who are natives of France, or where the people speak the French language; and also, that due choice should be made of such persons who are wise, loyal, and well qualified for our service.

It is also agreed, that we will have our residence in such places as are considerable, within our dominions, and not be confined to a mean and obscure retreat.

That, considering the horrid and enormous crimes perpetrated in this kingdom of France, by Charles, who calls himself the dauphin de Viennois, neither we, nor our son, king Henry, nor our dearest son Philip, duke of Burgundy, will make any treaty of peace or concord with him, nor so much as enter into a treaty, without the advice and consent of all three, and of the three estates of both kingdoms.

It is also agreed, that, besides our letters patent concerning these particulars, agreed and sealed with our great-seal, we will also give to our son Henry letters patent, confirmed and signed by our royal consort, by our son the duke of Burgundy, and other princes of the blood, by other great lords, barons, cities, and towns under our obedience, as king Henry shall require.

That our son, king Henry, besides his letters patent sealed with his great-seal, shall also give to us others, as we shall be pleased to require, confirmed by his brothers and the rest of the royal family, and by the great lords, barons, and cities of his dominions.

Now, to perform all and every one of these agreed articles, we, Charles, king of France, for ourself and our heirs, have, without fraud or dissimulation, promised, and do promise, have sworn and swear, in the word of a king, upon the Holy Evangelists, touched by us, that we will observe, and cause to be observed, both by ourself and subjects, all these articles; and that neither we, nor our heirs, will ever act contrary to any of them, neither judicially nor extra-judicially, neither directly or indirectly; and that this may be firmly established for ever, we have caused our seal to be set to these present letters.

Given at Troye, May 21, 1420, in the five-and-fortieth year of our reign.

Three weeks after this treaty was concluded, it was approved of, and ratified by the parliament of Paris; and the citizens of that capital took an oath to observe it. In all public deeds Henry held the title of Regent and Heir to the crown of France: his court and equipage at Troye were extremely magnificent; his guards amounted to above sixteen hundred, richly dressed and completely armed; and the duke of Burgundy, in honour of the king of France, fell little short of Henry's splendor.

On the thirtieth of May, Henry's marriage with the princess Catherine was solemnized in St. John's church, in Troye, by the archbishop of Sens. This lady was the greatest fortune and the finest woman of her time; but Henry suffered not his interest to give way to amorous dalliance: he was sensible that he owed all the important advantages he had gained, to the feuds and animosities which now prevailed in the courts of France and Burgundy; and that he should be in danger of losing them the moment the French nobility recovered the use of reason and reflection; and that those houses who had been excluded the succession in favour of a stranger, would not fail to unite together against him, as soon as the mist of passion should be cleared up; he therefore wisely resolved to give them no time for repentance.

All this time the dauphin behaved with surprising spirit and intrepidity. He had dispatched the count of Vendosme to solicit a supply of men from the Scots, whose king still remained a prisoner in England. These people, wisely considering, that if Henry became absolute master of France, France, they themselves must next fall victims to his ambition, resolved to assist the dauphin; and a supply of seven thousand men were sent over to him, under the command of John, earl of Buchan.

The dauphin had, in the space of a few months, taken the towns of Pont de l'Esprit and Nîmes, in Languedoc; and had thrown strong garrisons into Melun, Montereau, Montargis, Meaux, and Compeigne; and had ordered a general rendezvous of all his forces to be held at Bourges, in Berry. Henry had advice of all these proceedings; and, having paid the tribute due to decency and conjugal affection, he tore himself from the arms of his beloved consort, and reserved all his attention to the operations of the campaign. The first place he reduced was Sens, which submitted after a faint opposition: with the same ease he reduced Montereau, and recovered several other towns from the dauphin. He next resolved upon the siege of Melun, an enterprize attended with no small difficulty, great part of the city itself being encompassed by the river Seine, and the whole defended by a strong wall, flanked with towers and bulwarks: the place was commanded by de Barbaçon, one of the best officers in France, who made an admirable defence, from the twelfth of July, when Henry sat down before it, till the eighteenth of November, when it was forced by famine to surrender, on condition that none of the garrison or inhabitants should be put to death, except such as were concerned in the murder of the late duke of Burgundy: these last were to be tried, and suffer the punishment due to their crime; the rest were to be imprisoned at Henry's discretion, till they should give sufficient security for their not bearing arms against him for the future. The governor, Barbaçon, was condemned, as one of the assassins of the duke, by the parliament of Paris, to which venerable tribunal Philip, duke of Burgundy, applied as soon as Melun was yielded, for justice on his father's murderers; but Henry, having fought with Barbaçon hand to hand in a mine, in the course of the siege, saved his life out of a point of honour received in those days, and he was detained prisoner above twenty years, till the French recovered Chateau Gaillard.

After the surrender of Melun the two courts returned to Paris, where Henry made a magnificent entry on the first Sunday in Advent. Here he governed without controul, while Charles VI. continued shut up, with a few domestics, in the Hôtel de St. Paul, at which place Philip, duke of Burgundy, appeared in the presence of both kings, and of the few remaining nobility of the kingdom there assembled, and solemnly demanded justice for the murder of his father. Upon this the parliament summoned the dauphin to appear at the Marble Table*, and answer the charge preferred against him; but not appearing, he was condemned for contumacy. That prince, finding all sorts of means were used to deprive him of the crown, appealed to God and his sword, from all that was or might be transacted against him, in the name of the king his father; and continued still to assume the title of Regent. As such, he removed the parliament and university of Paris to Poitiers, where some of the members of those two bodies repaired. Thus were seen at the same time in France, two kings, two queens, two regents, all the officers of the crown double, seven or eight marshals of France on each side, two parliaments, and two universities of Paris. Towards the latter end of this year, the states of France were assembled, and granted Henry a large supply, without any debate. Let us now take a view of affairs in England during this year.

The death of Lewis II. king of Naples, which happened two years before, had given birth to a negociation which seemed to be big with great consequences to this kingdom; for, on his decease, a dispute happened between his son Lewis, duke of Anjou, and Joan, sister of Ladislaus, formerly king of Naples, about the succession to that crown. The claim of the princess was at first favoured by pope Martin V. who was the superior lord of that kingdom, Naples being a fief of the holy see; but the queen refusing to engage so deeply as he wanted her in his quarrel, the pontiff, and her own general, Forza, divested her of her crown, and invited the young duke of Anjou into Italy, and actually declared him king of Naples. The queen, finding herself thus abandoned, first strove to make up matters with the pope, and applied to the duke of Bedford, the regent of England, for his assistance: and one de Pisis coming over this year as her envoy, presented to the duke his credential letters, who received his proposals with great caution, but without rejecting them. They were, that the queen of Naples should adopt him as her heir and successor, provided he would march to her assistance with all his forces. Hereupon the duke ordered one Phiton to go to Naples, and enquire more minutely into the terms of the adoption; and, after several conferences, the following articles were secretly agreed upon by both parties.

"That nothing should be firm and ratified, which the pope did not approve.

"That it being probable that the French, observing the queen's design of introducing their enemies into her kingdom, would join with her rebellious subjects and, raise war against her, it was necessary, to enable her for a defence, that the duke should remit to Naples fifty thousand ducats, which should be secured in the hands of the bankers till the forts and cities of Blandusium and Regium were delivered to him; and that he should be obliged to come, eight days afterwards, into the kingdom of Naples.

"That, with the pope's consent and approbation, the queen should adopt him her son and heir, and to have the right of succession not only to the aforesaid kingdoms, but to the county of Provence, and any other territories which belonged to her.

"That she should create him duke of Calabria, and deliver to him all the castles and towns which were in her power.

"That he should be obliged to serve the queen in person, with one thousand men at arms and two thousand archers, at his own charge for six months, and after that time at the queen's.

"That he should not, farther than it pleased the queen, intermeddle in the government, the dukedom of Calabria only excepted, which he might rule with full authority.

* This is a large table, which was used, in the time of St. Lewis, for receiving the fines paid for vassalage, at the tower of the Louvre, and which ever after, remained as a kind of mark of jurisdiction. Volt. Gen. Hist. vol. viii. p. 13.

"That

"That in all councils and assemblies, respect should be paid to him as the queen's son.

"That all the riches he gained from the enemy should be to him and his heirs.

"That he should promise and swear to defend and maintain all principalities, cities, benefices, and offices conferred by the queen on any person.

"That, by these articles, no power was granted to one party over the person and estate of the other.

"And lastly, That, after the duke's arrival at Naples, the queen should cause her arms to be quartered with his, as her true and lawful son."

These articles sufficiently shew the duke of Bedford's reputation upon the continent. But, flattering as they were to his ambition, the state of Henry's affairs, and the duke's own employments both in England and France, did not suffer him immediately to embrace them; the queen therefore, while the duke took time to deliberate, found herself besieged in Naples by the Anjovin party, and she was obliged to have recourse to Alphonso, king of Arragon: that prince, embracing the proffers which had been made to the duke of Bedford, immediately marched to her assistance, and raised the siege.

The negociation between the queen of Naples and the duke of Bedford thus failing, Henry, who tenderly loved all his brothers, made several other attempts to raise that duke's fortune; first by proposing a match between him and the heiress of Nuremberg, and afterwards with the daughter of the duke of Lorraine, both which proposals came to nothing, and the duke remained unmarried till his brother's death. But to return.

Henry's coffers being almost exhausted, he found it absolutely necessary to make a voyage to England, to procure a fresh supply, that granted by the French states not being nearly adequate to his necessities; he therefore proceeded to settle the government of France in his absence. He appointed sir Gilbert Umfreville to be governor of Melun, in the room of the earl of Huntingdon, who was made governor of the castle of Vincennes; the duke of Exeter was appointed a kind of guardian to the person of the king of France, and governor of Paris; and the command in Normandy was given to his brother, the duke of Clarence; and Thomas Montacute, earl of Salisbury, was appointed his deputy in that province.

Having settled these matters, he set out for England, in the beginning of January, 1421, taking his young queen with him; and on the sixteenth of that month, while he was at Rouen, in his way to England, he, as duke of Guienne, received the homage of the d'Albret family, they renouncing the benefit of appeal which their grand-father, Charles d'Albret, had formerly put in before the peers of France, against the Black Prince, while governor of Aquitaine: the example of the d'Albrets was followed by the Armagnac family; and all of them were put in possession of their estates, which had been confiscated to the king of England.

On the twenty-eighth of January Henry crossed the sea from Calais to Dover, from whence he proceeded to London, into which he and his queen made a most magnificent entry: the coronation of the latter was performed, on Sunday the twenty-third of February, at Westminster; and, when this solemnity was over, the king made a progress into Wales, and into the North of England as far as

York, not only to shew the queen the country, but to see how justice was administered, and returned to his capital in the latter end of April. On the second of May he convened a parliament at Westminster, in which the peace of Troye was approved and confirmed by the three estates of the realm; at the same time they voted him a large subsidy for the prosecution of the war, though they also presented an address, in which they observed, that the conquest of France would probably be the ruin of England, which would be in danger of becoming a province of the former kingdom. In answer to this address, he assured them, that he would never suffer any of his conquests to prove detrimental to his natural subjects.

But while matters were going on successfully in England, Henry's affairs in France took an unsuccessful turn, which obliged him to go abroad sooner than he proposed. Great numbers of the Norman and Anjovin noblemen had joined the dauphin, whose troops had seized Villeneuve le Roy, and daily cut off the provisions that were conveying to Paris. The inhabitants thereupon began to murmur and throw out several disrespectful expressions on the English: the marshal de l'Isle Adam, who had for some time been greatly discontented at the growing power of the latter at court, seemed rather to encourage these murmurs of the populace; upon which the duke of Exeter gave orders for arresting him: as the marshal was extremely popular, upwards of a thousand of the Parisians took to their arms, and opposed the carrying him to prison; but the duke of Exeter, putting himself at the head of a chosen body of English archers, the mob presently dispersed, and he lodged his prisoner safely in the Bastille, where he remained in confinement all the rest of this reign. This disturbance was followed by an unlucky event in another part of the kingdom, which gave Henry no small uneasiness, and quickened his return to the continent.

The dauphin had, during the siege of Melun, reduced Languedoc to his obedience; and being master of all the French territories beyond the Loire, had advanced as far as Tours, at the head of a numerous army. Thomas, duke of Clarence, who had been left with the command of the English troops, made several irruptions into Anjou, to harass the dauphin's party. At length, he penetrated as far as the village of Baugé, where hearing that the earl of Buchan, with five thousand Scots, and a body of French detached from the dauphin's army, under la Fayette, a marshal of that prince's creation, were on the march to attack him, he resolved to anticipate their design; but as his troops were dispersed about the country, intent on plunder, and his archers were at some distance, the earl of Huntingdon pressed him to wait their coming up; but the duke's heat, pride, and obstinacy would not let him hearken to this prudent advice: so taking with him the few noblemen, officers, and men at arms that were about him, he marched through a narrow pass over a brook near the castle of Baugé, to meet the enemy; but having made his onset too rashly, and pursuing without any order a small party of horse which he had broken at the first charge, he on a sudden found himself surrounded by a strong body of Scots, under one Swinton, who had lain in ambush behind an hill to take advantage of the impetuosity of the English. The duke of Clarence being singled out by the Scottish knight, was first wounded in the face, and afterwards ran through the body; most of the gentlemen that followed him were also slain, as were sir Gilbert Umfreville, the earl of Kent, and the lords Grey and Ros: the earls of Somerset, Huntingdon, and Strafford, the lord Fitz Walter, and others, were taken prisoners, and the allies lost upwards of eleven hundred men. The earl of Salisbury, coming up with a fresh body of English, offered to renew the battle, which was declined by the earl of Buchan. This action happened on the twenty-second of March, 1421.

Upon this defeat of the English by the Scots, the dauphin, in order to engage that people more firmly in his interest, and reward the bravery and conduct of Buchan, created that nobleman constable of France, who thought to improve his victory by the taking of Alençon; but was obliged, by the earl of Salisbury, to raise the siege of that place, and retire with his forces.

Henry no sooner heard of the fate of his brother Clarence, and the defeat of his troops, than he instantly prepared for another voyage to France, and crossed the sea, on the tenth of June, from Dover to Calais. According to Monstrelet, he carried over with him an army of four thousand men at arms and twenty-four thousand archers. He left his brother, the duke of Bedford, regent of England in his absence. On his arrival at Calais, he heard that the duke of Exeter was almost blocked up by the dauphin's troops in Paris; upon which he sent a considerable detachment before him to the duke's relief; and another, under the duke of Gloucester, to recover certain places in Picardy, of which the dauphin had lately made himself master. Then marching in person with the rest of his army, he came to Bois de Vincennes, from whence he afterwards went and joined his father-in-law in Paris. When he had dispatched his affairs there, he proceeded to join the rest of his forces in Normandy, and led them to the relief of Chartres, which had been for some time besieged by the dauphin, who, knowing himself unable to make head against such a numerous army, retired beyond the Loire, the English pursuing him to the very gates of Orleans. Henry then investing Dreux, a strong place on the borders of Normandy, took it, on the twentieth of August, by capitulation; and soon after reduced Tilliers, Nogent, Gallardan, with other castles in the neighbourhood. Upon advice that the dauphin lay, with a great army, on the banks of the Loire, preparing for a general engagement, he marched to Baugenci, and, taking the place, waited there a fortnight, in hopes of that prince offering him battle; but the enemy dispersing, he turned off to Villeneuve sur Yonne, which had been lately taken by the dauphin; and having recovered that place, he sat down, on the sixth of October, before Meaux, a strong town situated on the Marne. This siege he undertook at the desire of the Parisians, who were greatly harassed by the garrison of that place. Whilst the king was employed in this operation, he received the agreeable news of his queen's being safely delivered of a prince, on the sixth of December, at Windsor, who was named Henry, and was afterwards the unfortunate Henry VI.

Before we conclude the transactions of the year 1421, it will be proper to take some notice of the affairs of Scotland, which we have forbore introducing sooner that we might not break the thread of the history.

The check which his brother Clarence had met with from the Scottish auxiliaries in the service of France, had given Henry no little uneasiness, and he used all his endeavours to persuade his prisoner, James, king of Scotland, to recal the troops which had been sent over to France, under the command of the earl of Buchan; and that prince, in consequence of some private stipulations with the king of England, laid his commands upon his subjects to quit the service of the dauphin; but the earl returned for answer, that they did not think themselves bound by any tie to obey the orders of their king, while he remained in the hands of his adversary, and might be supposed to act from compulsion. This order of James, however, furnished Henry with a pretext for treating as rebels all the Scots that were taken in the service of the dauphin. By this time the duke of Albany was dead, and was succeeded in the regency of Scotland by his son Murdoch, earl of Fife, who had been lately released from his captivity in England. It was since his accession to the ministry that the auxiliaries had been sent to France, and therefore he became disagreeable to the king of England; who, in order to encourage a party that should counterbalance his interest in Scotland, permitted James to revisit his own country, on his giving security for his return, and assuring Henry he would do his endeavours to dissolve the alliance between Scotland and the dauphin.

The siege of Meaux proved a work of great difficulty: it was strongly fortified by art and nature, and provided with a numerous garrison, commanded by the bastard of Vaurus, who had distinguished himself by his activity and rancour against the Burgundians. This place, as we have already observed, was invested by Henry on the sixth day of October, 1421; it continued to make an obstinate defence all the winter, and the English had lost a great number of men by the inclemency of the weather and fatigue, as well as by the valour of the besieged. The town was divided into two parts, called the City and the Marché, or Market-place; the first of which was taken by storm in the winter, but the other was defended with infinite resolution. The lord Cornwall's son, a youth of great expectation, and the earl of Dorset, both lost their lives at this remarkable siege, besides a great number of other gallant officers, in two successive assaults, both of which miscarried in spite of all Henry's conduct and intrepidity. At length the garrison, being reduced to the utmost extremity, after a defence of seven months, demanded a capitulation on the second of May, 1422, which Henry granted on the following terms: "That all the inhabitants and soldiers should have their lives, but nothing else, saved: that the English, Welsh, Irish, and Scots, bearing arms in the place, should be entirely in the king's mercy, together with the bastard of Vaurus and three other officers of the garrison: and that the place, with all the neighbouring forts, should be surrendered by the eleventh of May." The besieged were obliged to submit to these terms. After Henry had taken possession of the town, he commanded these officers to be instantly beheaded; and likewise put to death, without mercy, all the English, Scots, and Irish, who were found among the defendants, with all those who had been concerned concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy. As for the governor, Vaurus, he underwent an exemplary fate: the bravery of this officer could be exceeded by nothing but his cruelty; he was wont to hang, without distinction of age or quality, all the English and Burgundians that fell into his hands: Henry, highly incensed at such a barbarous and shocking practice, caused him to be hanged on the same tree which he had made the instrument of his inhuman executions, and which from thence was distinguished by his name.

The reduction of Meaux was soon followed by that of Compeigne, Gamaches, and St. Valery, and Henry saw himself master of all France on this side the Loire, except Anjou and Maine, and the castles of Guise and Crotoy, in Picardy. To add to his satisfaction, soon after the surrender of Meaux, his queen arrived from England, attended by the duke of Bedford, who had left the regency to the duke of Gloucester, his brother, lately sent over thither by Henry, on some private business. The two courts joining at Bois de Vincennes, went from thence soon after, to keep the Whitsun-holidays at Paris, which they did with great splendor.

But the moment was fast approaching, in which Henry, who seemed now to have almost attained the summit of human grandeur, was to find his course stopped short by the hand of nature, and all his mighty projects made to bow before an universal conqueror. Whilst he was preparing to renew the campaign, interrupted by the queen's arrival, news came that the dauphin had taken la Charité, which opened him a passage over the Loire, and was thereby enabled, without opposition, to form the siege of Cosne, which being ill provided for a defence, agreed to capitulate, if not relieved by the twenty-sixth of August, by the duke of Burgundy.

Henry received the account of those successes with sensible chagrin, and put himself immediately at the head of the army, in hopes that he should be able to force the dauphin to fight, who had hitherto carefully avoided a decisive engagement, and, by his cautious yet active conduct, had given Henry no little disquiet: but, whilst this latter was pleasing himself with the hopes of a victory that would render him absolute master of all France, he was seized at Senlis with a violent illness, which obliged him to travel in a litter; and finding himself grow worse at Corbeil, the conduct of the enterprize was given to the duke of Bedford, with the earl of Warwick as his assistant, whilst Henry returned to Bois de Vincennes.

The duke of Burgundy was then at Vezelay, waiting to be joined by the English, which being effected, his army greatly out-numbered that of the dauphin. This determined the latter to abandon his enterprize upon Cosne, and even to quit the banks of the Loire, which he had once resolved to defend, and to retreat to Bourges, to avoid the hazard of a battle. Thus the duke of Burgundy and the English, when in high expectation of effectually terminating the war, found themselves baffled by the prudent precaution of the dauphin, and obliged to retire towards Troye.

In their march thither the duke of Bedford received the melancholy news that Henry's disorder, which was a pleuritic fever, was increased so much as to leave very little hopes of recovery. The duke upon this set out, accompanied by the earl of Warwick, for Vincennes, and arrived just in time to receive the great Henry's dying commands, who, finding himself near his end, and being acquainted with his brother's arrival, ordered that he, with the earl of Warwick, the duke of Exeter, and all the English nobility who happened to be near him, might be brought into his bed-chamber, to give them his last instructions: the substance of his speech on this occasion, as we find in several historians, was as follows:

He began with observing, "that though his life had been short it had been replete with glory, and employed in endeavours to promote the happiness of his people: that though his pretensions to France had occasioned much bloodshed, yet that calamity ought not to be charged to his account, the guilt resting with those who, by their obstinacy and injustice, had forced him to have recourse to arms, by refusing to accept of a reasonable peace. The approach of death, he said, would have been beheld by him without concern, were not his last moments somewhat imbittered by the reflection of the doubtful event of the war he was engaged in, and the infancy of his son, which rendered him incapable of finishing a work so happily begun; he therefore besought the duke of Bedford and the rest of the nobles, who knelt in silent grief around him, that they would unite strictly in the service of their infant king, and take every possible care of his education. He added, as his last advice, that they should never make peace with the dauphin without having it as a preliminary, that the duchy of Normandy should be for ever annexed to the crown of England: and especially recommended to them, always to keep well with the duke of Burgundy; and not to release the duke of Orleans, the count d'Eu, the lord de Gaucourt, and the sieur Guichard de Sisay (who had been taken prisoners at the battle of Agincourt), till his son was of age. Lastly, he expressed a desire that the duke of Bedford might assume the administration of France, and that the duke of Gloucester might act as regent during his son's minority, the care of whose education he committed to the earl of Warwick."

Having thus delivered his sentiments concerning the management of public affairs, and received the solemn assurances of the nobles present, that they would faithfully obey these his dying injunctions, he ordered his confessor to attend, and received the final preparations for his approaching dissolution, in which devout exercise he soon after gave up the ghost, on the thirty-first of August, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, after reigning nine years, five months, and eleven days.

Immediately upon Henry's death, the duke of Burgundy came to Vincennes, and had a conference with the duke of Bedford and the English council, and they altogether set out for Paris, to which place the royal body was conveyed by torch-light. The funeral was afterwards performed with great magnificence, the particulars of which are thus given us by Goodwin, in his history of that great prince, concerning whom even the most trivial circumstances are interesting:

The body was placed in a rich chariot; on a bed, in the same chariot, was laid the figure of the king, with a crown of gold on his head, a sceptre in his right hand, and in his left a globe, both of the same metal. The covering of the bed was a vermillion silk, embroidered with gold: over the chariot was a rich silk canopy. Thus, with great pomp the funeral procession moved from Rouen to Abbeville. The chariot was drawn by six horses, in rich harness, each of them having a banner or streamer fixed to the harness; the first bearing the arms of St. George; the second, those of Normandy; the third, of king Arthur; the fourth, those of St. Edward; the fifth, the arms of France; the sixth, those of England and France quarterly. James, king of Scotland, followed the chariot, as principal mourner, attended by the duke of Exeter, the earls of Warwick, Marche, Stafford, and Mortaigne, the lords Fitz Hugh, Hungerford, sir Robert Robesart, lord Bouchier, sir John Cornwall, lord Fanhope, and the lord Cornwall. The banners of the saints were borne by the lords Lovel, Audley, Morley, and Zouch: the baron of Dudley bore the standard, and the earl of Longueville the banner. The hatchments were carried by twelve captains, and around the chariot rode four hundred men at arms, all in black armour, their horses barbed black, and their lances borne with their points downwards. A great company cloathed in white, bearing lighted torches, also encompassed the chariot. The officers and servants of the royal household followed, cloathed in black; and after them the royal family, in mourning: the queen, with a great retinue, followed, at a league's distance. The body was set in the church of St. Ofra, at Abbeville, where, as well as in all other places to which it came, masses were said, without interruption, from the first dawn of the morning till midnight. From Abbeville the procession came to Calais, where crossing to Dover, it continued with the same pomp to London. When the body approached that city, it was met by fifteen bishops in their pontificals, and a number of abbots in their mitres and vestments, with a great number of priests, citizens, and people; the priests performing all the way through the streets the funeral devotions, till they arrived at Westminster abbey, where the royal corpse was interred at the feet of Edward the Confessor, in a little chapel, afterwards enlarged and beautified with two iron gates by king Henry VII. On his tomb of grey marble, erected by his queen, was placed a royal image, of silver gilt, which remained there till about the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII. when the head, which was of massy silver, was broken off, and conveyed away with the plates of silver that covered the trunk, which now only remains of heart of oak.

Henry is represented to us as of a stature somewhat above the middle size; he had a beautiful countenance, a long neck, a thin and slender body, fine and elegant limbs, and was possessed of a surprising degree of strength and agility. He excelled all his contemporaries in personal courage and military prowess: he was hardy, patient, laborious, and more capable of enduring the extremes of cold, hunger, and fatigue, than almost any soldier in his army. He was in his manners affable, polite, generous, and magnificent: he had an excellent understanding, with a clear head and sound judgment, and admirable talents for the cabinet and field. But the glare of his successes, or the lustre of his great qualities, will not be found sufficient to conceal the defects in his character; nor can we, without shuddering, hear him appeal with his dying breath to the awful tribunal of Heaven, in defence of his public conduct: had he any just pretensions to the crown of France, in the pursuit of which he sacrificed so many thousand innocent lives, while Peace and Justice were his words of battle? how then could he presume to remove the guilt of all this bloodshed from his own door, to lay it at that of a people, whom he had so unjustly invaded, and so cruelly oppressed? Truth obliges us to confess, that Henry, during his life-time, shewed that he could not distinguish between the art of war and the trade of death, nor knew to join the feeling to the manly heart; and in the hour of his exit, he was a striking example how easily conscience is brought over to espouse the cause of any ruling passion; for, as we cannot suspect him of any dissimulation at such a juncture, we must suppose that he died in full conviction of having acted according to the dictates of equity; though impartial posterity will count him among the number of those warriors, whose ambition has spread ruin and devastation through the earth; and who sacrifice the character of humanity to acquire that of the hero.

It now remains to mention the wife and issue of this great king. He was married, as we have already seen, to Catherine of Valois, daughter to Charles VI. king of France: she was born in the year 1400, so that Henry left her a young widow, of immense fortune, the highest qualities, and most tempting beauty. After Henry's death she fell in love with and married a Welsh knight, named Owen Tudor, said to be sprung from the ancient princes of that country: she bore him two sons, Edmund and Jasper, of whom the elder was created earl of Richmond, and the second earl of Pembroke. The family of Tudor, which was first raised to distinction by this alliance, afterwards ascended the throne of England.

The only issue of Henry by this queen was Henry of Windsor, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester, to whose reign we shall next proceed.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

On the day of his coronation, there happened a tempest of wind, snow, and hail; the snow was most taken notice of because it was most prevalent; on which the people made superstitious observations: some thought it presaged, that the new king would be cold and negligent in the administration of the government, or wrong and oppress them; others took it for a good omen, that, having dispelled those clouds of vice which had darkened the nation, brightness and serenity would succeed the storm.

In the third year of his reign, the church service was changed throughout England, from the use of St. Paul to the use of Sarum. On Candlemas-day seven dolphins were discovered playing on the river Thames, and four of them were taken.

The first commission of array, which occurs in the English history, was issued in the course of this reign. The military part of the feudal system was now entirely abolished; and could no longer serve for the defence or security of the kingdom. For this reason, when Henry went to France in 1415, he empowered certain commissioners to take a review of all the free-men in each county able to bear arms, to form them into companies, and to keep them in a constant readiness to oppose any attempts that might be made by the enemy.

HENRY VI.

It was also this king that first instituted the office of Garter King at Arms, and made several regulations concerning that most noble order, which the curious reader may see in Ashmole's Institutions, &c. p. 252, &c. He also appointed a new herald, by the title of Agincourt King at Arms.

King Henry, among other works of charity and magnificence, rebuilt the royal palace of Shene, now called Richmond; and the castle of Kenelworth.

H E N R Y VI. furnamed Of W I N D S O R*. The third King of ENGLAND of the LANCASTRIAN Family. A. D. 1422.

BEFORE we enter upon the transactions of this reign, so very different from the last, we shall introduce our readers to an acquaintance with the great personages, especially those of the royal blood, who are to make the principal figures therein, and the knowlege of whose histories and characters will serve as a clue to guide us through the scenes we are now to tread.

It may be remembered, that, besides Henry V. the fourth Henry left three other sons; Thomas, duke of Clarence; John, duke of Bedford; and Humphrey, duke of Gloucester. We have already mentioned the death of the first of these, which happened without his leaving any lawful male issue. The next of the surviving brothers, and the third son of Henry IV. was John, duke of Bedford, who, though not possessed of those shining talents which distinguished Henry V. was yet formed with virtues more capable of making a people happy. He had given the most indisputable proofs of his great abilities for government, by his conduct while regent of England during his royal brother's absence on the continent; for under his administration the nation enjoyed plenty and tranquility at home, her commerce flourished, her agriculture was improved, and the public monies were strictly and beneficially employed. These qualities placed him high in the esteem of his elder brother, who, as we have elsewhere observed, sought all opportunities of raising his fortune.

Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, the younger brother of Henry V. was also one of the most accomplished princes of his age; the chief failing with which he is justly chargeable, was his suffering an impetuosity of temper sometimes to get so much the better of his prudence as to hurry him into acts or expressions that laid him too open to the malice or ill-will of his enemies; but his sincerity and freedom deservedly made him dear to every honest and noble mind, and he possessed no inconsiderable share of his royal brother's affection and esteem, who in his knowlege of mankind yielded to none of the age he lived in.

We shall now proceed to give an account of the other more remote branches of the royal family. Of these, the first in years and dignity was Henry Beaufort, cardinal of St. Eusebius and bishop of Winchester. He was son to John of Ghent, duke of Lancaster, by that nobleman's second marriage with Catherine Swinford, and consequently uncle to Henry V. He was a man of profound sense and great eloquence, as may be gathered from his speeches at the opening of many sessions of parliament, which are still extant upon the rolls: but the chief power of this prelate undoubtedly lay in the vast riches he had amassed; for, as he had more ready money than any other subject in England, he claimed a kind of merit in supplying the necessities of the crown, though at an extravagant interest†. But his avarice was even exceeded by his ambition; and he was alike impatient either of a superior or an equal. The great countenance which had for some time been shewn to the church, and his own near relation to the crown, gave him many extraordinary advantages; so that, upon the whole, he was esteemed one of the chief persons in the kingdom.

Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, third son of John of Ghent, by his second marriage, was a prince well versed in business, and had filled several principal posts both in the state and army, with reputation to himself and advantage to his country. In the fifth year of Henry IV. he had been made lord high-admiral of England; after that, governor of Calais, lord-chamberlain, and then created earl of Dorset and knight of the Garter. By Henry V. he was advanced to the dignity of a duke; and that monarch honoured him with a farther mark of his esteem, by making him governor of Harfleur, and earl of Harcourt in Normandy. The post he enjoyed in the beginning of the reign we are entering upon, was that of governor to the king, and commander in chief of the English forces in France: nay, if we may believe some authors, Henry V. had so great an opinion of him, that he appointed him, and not the duke of Gloucester (as Elmham has it), by his dying words to be protector of England.

Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, was by Henry V. designed tutor to his infant son, under the duke of Exeter. This nobleman was not only the most accomplished soldier, but generally allowed to be the finest gentleman of his time. He

* From the place of his birth. It is reported by most of our historians, that Henry, who was in France when this prince was born, on enquiring where his queen was delivered, was answered at Windsor; upon which, in a kind of propetic despondency, he said to the lord Fitz Hugh, his chamberlain, "I Henry of Monmouth shall short time reign, and much get; Henry of Windsor shall long time reign, and all lose: but God's will be done." However, this saying seems to have been more political than predictive; for it was no hard matter for Henry, at that time, to conceive that he could not hope, in the common course of things, to establish the crown of France in his own family.

had been employed at most courts in Europe, where he distinguished himself by his address and politeness †. He was, indeed, universally beloved and esteemed by all who knew him, either abroad or at home; and the great estate which he possessed, the number of his relations, all of whom were persons of considerable consequence, joined to the strength of his alliances, gave him a greater national interest in the country of England than, perhaps, any other subject, not immediately of the royal blood, then enjoyed.

The other personages of note, though inferior to these, who composed the young king's court, were Richard, duke of York, son of Richard, earl of Cambridge, who was beheaded at Southampton, and grand-son of Edmund of Langley, duke of York, a prince who afterwards claimed the crown as heir of Mortimer: Humphrey, earl of Stafford, son of Anne of Gloucester, daughter to the unfortunate duke whom Richard II. caused to be murdered at Calais: Henry, viscount Bouchier, afterwards created earl of Essex, uterine brother to the earl of Stafford, and married to Isabel, the duke of York's sister: Ralph Neville, earl of Westmoreland, allied to the royal family by his marriage with Jane Beaufort, sister to the duke of Exeter and the bishop of Winchester: Thomas Courtenay, earl of Devonshire, married to the sister of the earl of Somerset: Henry, lord Talbot, who had espoused the sister of the earl of Essex: Henry Holland, earl of Huntingdon, descended from an uterine sister of Richard II. Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland: and John Fitz Alan, earl of Arundel.

Having thus prepared the way to a clearer understanding of the ensuing scene of action, by this short account of the principal persons concerned in public affairs, we shall now continue our history.

It would seem that the death of Henry V. was concealed for some time; at least the news of it arrived so slow in England, that no step was taken towards recognizing the rights of his infant son till a month after his decease; for we find by the public records, that it was not till the twenty-ninth of September that the duke of Gloucester, at that time regent of the realm in the absence of the duke of Bedford, in consequence of the news of king Henry's death, issued writs in the new king's name for a parliament to meet on the twenty-ninth of November following. Two days after, viz. the first of October, 1422, young Henry being carried to London, was proclaimed there, not being full nine months old when he ascended the throne.

The parliament meeting according to appointment, made several regulations for the better exercise of the government. Thomas Langley, bishop of Durham, was appointed chancellor of England; William Rendraffe lord high-treasurer; and John Stafford keeper of the privy-seal. It appears, however, that Henry's dying request was not very strictly attended to, for, notwithstanding his verbal declaration, appointing Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, regent of England during the young king's minority, the two houses thought fit to confer that important post on the elder brother, John, duke of Bedford; but, at the same time, the duke of Glocester was fixed upon to supply that high office in his absence, and allowed to assume the same title. Not approving the title of Regent, Tutor, Guardian, or any other which imported power in a high degree, lest it might be abused, they chose that of Protector and Defender of the Realm and Church of England, and chief Counsellor of the King; at the same time assigning a salary of eight thousand marks per annum for the support of this dignity. The duke of Bedford being then beyond the seas, the said title and salary were conferred on the duke of Gloucester, to be by him had and received in absence only of the aforesaid duke: at the same time Gloucester was constituted lord-chamberlain and high-constable of England.

To guard against any encroachment, under colour of a title which, if it conveyed no authority, was, however, very pompous and high-sounding, they appointed a council, by whose advice all the affairs of the kingdom were to be administered, the protector having no prerogative in respect of its resolutions, but that of a double voice in case of an equality. This important point being established, they made some other regulations touching sheriffs, bailiffs, and justices of the peace; and having continued the tonnage and poundage, with the subsidy on wool, for two years longer, they broke up, on the eighteenth of December. Before they rose, however, they appointed governors to take care of the king's person and education: these were Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, and his brother Henry, bishop of Winchester and cardinal, the king's great-uncles.

While these matters were under consideration, advice came of some commotions in Wales and the neighbouring counties, raised probably by the Mortimer interest in that part of the country. These disturbances appear to have been somewhat serious, since we find commissioners appointed to enquire into, and suppress them. In all probability this writ had the desired effect, as we hear of no consequences that attended these insurrections*.

Thus was the infant son of Henry V. placed in quiet possession of the throne after his father, notwithstanding there was a person then living in the kingdom (Richard, duke of York, son of the late earl of Cambridge), who, as undoubted heir to the families both of York and Mortimer, was certainly the nearest in blood from Edward III. to the crown of England. But it is now time to turn our eyes towards France, and see what was transacted there in consequence of the death of its conqueror.

Charles VI. survived his son-in-law but fifty-five days, dying at Paris on the twenty-first of October, 1422, and his death occasioned a total revolution in the affairs of that kingdom. Many of the French nobility, who had considered themselves as obliged in duty to obey the king, without enquiring strictly whether his commands were conducive to the interests of their country, now looked upon themselves as under the same obligation to the dauphin, notwithstanding the treaty of Troye, which they considered as extorted from their late weak sovereign by force and fraud.

† While this nobleman was governor of Calais, he entertained the emperor Sigismund, in his way to England, with so much civility and gallantry, that his imperial majesty, on his arrival here told king Henry V. that no Christian king could boast of a knight equal to him for wisdom, good-breeding, and courage; and that if all courtesy was lost, it might be found in the earl of Warwick; who from thence was afterwards called the Father of Courtesy. Dugdale's Warwicksh. p. 327.

The dauphin, though his interest was lower than ever, was yet master of the counties of Berry, Bourbon, Languedoc, Lyonnois, Forrez, Auvergne, a great part of Xaintonge, Poictou, with the earldoms of Comminges and Armagnac, bordering on the Pyrenees. He was extremely well served both by his officers and ministers, and his accession to the crown could not fail of having a great effect in his favour.

The duke of Bedford was too sagacious not to foresee the consequences that must naturally result from such a change in the face of affairs, and therefore, the instant Charles VI. expired, he proclaimed Henry VI. king of France, and, agreeable to the will of his late brother, assumed to himself the title of regent of that kingdom; he also caused a new great-seal to be made, with the arms of France and England impaled, and on the other side the effigies of the young king, holding a sceptre in each hand. He next assembled at Paris all the great men attached to the English interest, and, in a set speech, exhorted them to acknowledge young Henry for their sovereign. This they immediately complied with, swearing allegiance to Henry as king of France, and doing homage to him, in the person of the regent, for the lands they held of that crown; and the same security was afterwards exacted from all the towns that were under the dominion of the English: at the same time the city of Paris sent deputies to London, to perform the same ceremony to the infant king in person, and congratulate him on his accession to the crowns of the two kingdoms. These deputies were ordered to take the Low Countries in their route, and exhort the duke of Burgundy to adhere steadily to his alliance †.

We have already taken notice of the places yet in the possession of the dauphin; on the other hand, Henry was in possession of Normandy and Guienne, Picardy, Champagne, la Brie, the Isle of France, and the city of Paris, besides the two Burgundys, Flanders, and Artois, which belonged to the duke of Burgundy, his vassal and ally. The duke of Bedford, who was his regent in France, and, as we have already observed, one of the most accomplished princes in Europe, whether considered as a soldier or a statesman, was assisted by officers alike distinguished for their personal courage and military talents; the chief of these were the duke of Somerset, the earls of Salisbury, Warwick, and Arundel, sir John Fastolf, and sir John Talbot. Hence it appears that the war might have been carried on in all the provinces of France, except Brittany, whose duke, John V. had hitherto observed a strict neutrality, which had greatly enriched his dominions, both in wealth and people. The duke of Bedford, sensible how necessary it was for him to strengthen his political interests by more numerous attachments, gave in charge to the ministers who were to call upon the duke of Burgundy, to use all their endeavours to obtain of the count of Richemont, brother to John, that he would use his interest with that prince to bring him over to the party of England. The count, who was under the strongest obligations to the English court ‡, applied himself so strenuously to comply with the regent's desire, that he at length prevailed with his brother to enter into measures with the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy; and a meeting of these four princes was appointed to be held at Amiens the beginning of the next year, which accordingly took place, and a treaty of alliance was concluded between them against the new king of France, to which the prince of Orange and the duke of Savoy were invited to accede*.

Whilst the duke of Bedford was thus taking every necessary precaution to serve the interests of the king his nephew, the dauphin was no less intent to his. He was at Espalay, a house belonging to the bishop of Puy, when he heard of his father's death; upon which he immediately caused himself to be proclaimed king of France, and repaired to Poitiers, where he was crowned with all the pomp and solemnity which the situation of his affairs would permit, the wayward state of which had no other impression on the young king, but to make him redouble his efforts in regaining his right; and though the season of the year was so far advanced, he found means to make himself master of Meulant, on the Seine, which surrendered to him on the fourth day of January, 1423.

As this place lay in the neighbourhood of Paris, the regent looked upon the reduction of it under his eye, as an insult offered to his arms, and therefore resolved to retake it at any hazard: accordingly, about the beginning of February, he in person formed the siege of it, accompanied by the earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the lords Scales and Poynings, sir John Fastolf, and others of his best officers. As a number of other fortresses in those parts, which were filled with Charles's troops, must be obliged to surrender as soon as Meulant should be retaken, that prince determined to spare nothing to maintain possession of it: he therefore ordered the count d'Aumale, and Stuart of Aubigny, general of the Scottish auxiliaries in the room of the earl of Buchan, then in Scotland, to march to its relief; but whether these officers could not agree about the chief command, or thought the attack impracticable, when they were advanced within a few miles of the place, they suddenly turned short, and marched off, Aumale towards Anjou and Maine, where he commanded for Charles, and the Scots towards their former quarters. This retreat exasperated the garrison so much, that Gravelle, who commanded the place for Charles, ordered the French standards to be torn from the battlements and thrown into the ditch, and instantly delivered up the place||, the surrender of which was followed by that of the fortresses of Marcouffi, Montléri, la Ferté, Milan, Compeigne, and others of lesser note.

This place capitulated on the second of March, and soon after the regent repaired to Amiens, where, on the eighth of April, he concluded the treaty of alliance and confederacy already spoken of; and this alliance was cemented by a marriage between Bedford and Anne, sister of the duke of Burgundy. The former consummated his marriage at Troye, and, in his way to Paris with his consort, took Pont sur Seine by assault. In the mean time John Montacute, earl of Salisbury, being appointed governor of Champagne and Brie, invested the strong castle of Montaigne, and, leaving the earl of Suffolk to command the blockade of that fortress, undertook in person the siege of Ver-tus, Sefanne, and Epernay, all which he reduced with very little trouble.

The blockade of Montaigne still continuing, and the French king understanding that the earl of Suffolk had but a few troops under his command, ordered Tanneguy de Chatel to attempt to raise the blockade; but this design was defeated by the vigilance of the earl of Salisbury, who obliged the French general to retire behind Maçon, a town in Burgundy, which Charles's troops had surprized; and then the earl of Salisbury, thinking the blockade of Mortaigne secure, turned short, and surprized Crevante, a strong place on the river Yonne, four leagues from Auxerre. Stuart of Aubigny, at the head of a body of Scots, and the count of Ventadour, with a considerable body of French troops in the interest of Charles, were sent by that prince with orders to raise the siege of Crevante, or, if the place was taken before their arrival, to use their utmost endeavours to recover it out of the hands of the allies. They punctually followed their orders, by investing the place a few days after it had surrendered to the English; and there being but a scarcity of provisions, it was soon reduced to great extremity.

The dukes of Burgundy and Bedford hearing of the distress of the besieged, sent a strong reinforcement to the earl of Salisbury, under the command of Toulangeon, marshal of Burgundy, with orders at all events to relieve the place. Toulangeon found means to force the enemy to a battle, which was fought with great obstinacy by both sides; but victory declared for the English, who routed the French, with the loss of twelve hundred of their own people, and near three thousand Scots slain in the field, besides prisoners, among which were the Scottish general and the count of Ventadour. In consequence of this victory, Mortaigne was immediately surrendered to Suffolk; Coucy, and other places about Maçon, submitted soon after; and, towards the end of the year, Crotoy and Guise, the only strong holds that remained to Charles in Picardy, capitulated for a surrender, if not relieved before the month of March following, when they were accordingly delivered.

These military achievements were greater than could be reasonably expected, after two such blows as the English interest had received in France, by the deaths of Henry V. and Charles VI. but the duke of Bedford well foresaw, that, without the utmost circumspection, they must be but transitory; the French in general were untractable under their new government; a young prince, expelled his native throne by the rebellion of his own subjects, and by the arms of strangers, could not fail to excite the compassion of all his people whose hearts were unbiassed by faction; and the present situation of France naturally engaged the attention even of the meanest persons, and became a common topic of conversation: add to this, that he found the earl of Richemont to be a froward, haughty, and troublesome ally, and withal of a brave, intriguing, and intrepid disposition: again, it was far from being improbable, notwithstanding the late advantages gained by the English, that the war might take an untoward turn for them, should the Scottish regency continue to supply the French king with troops: he reflected upon the ill success which had attended the detaining the king of Scotland a prisoner in the English court, which had been done from a supposition that the Scots would be deterred from joining the French in a war against England, as long as their king was a prisoner there; but the late hearty assistance they had given Charles proved this to be a mistaken notion. The Scottish nobility had always been desirous of getting their king home; but the duke of Albany, late regent, had found means to elude all their efforts for that purpose: Murdoch, earl of Fife, had succeeded his father in that post; and finding the people in general refractory under his government, he resolved to divest himself of so ungrateful an office, and accordingly, concurring with the desires of the great men, he sent ambassadors to England, in July this year, to treat for the king's liberty. This perfectly well corresponded with a project the duke of Bedford had formed; who being made acquainted with this application, gave it as his positive advice, that the wisest method of the English court would be to consent to the release of king James upon reasonable terms, since they already experienced how little the Scottish regency was affected to their cause; and that much might be expected from James's friendship, when laid under this obligation for his crown and liberty.

The council in England concurred with the duke in his reasons, and commissioners were appointed to manage the conferences for the release of the Scottish king: those on the side of the English were, Thomas, bishop of Durham, chancellor of England: Philip, bishop of Worcester; Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland; and Mr. John Wadeham: those for Scotland were, William, bishop of Glasgow; George, earl of Marche; James Douglas of Balgeny, his brother; Patrick, abbot of Cambuskenneth; John, abbot of Balmerino; sir Patrick Dunbar, of Bole; sir Robert Lauder, of Eddrington; Mr. George Borthwick, archdeacon of Glasgow; and Patrick Houston, canon of Glasgow*.

The conferences were opened at the city of York in the beginning of September; but it was the tenth of February, 1424, before all matters were settled, and then they came to the following agreement.

"I. That the king of Scotland, and his heirs, as an equivalent for his entertainment while in England, should pay to the king of England, and his heirs, at London, in the church of St. Paul, by equal proportions, the sum of forty thousand pounds.

"II. That the first payment, amounting to the sum of ten thousand marks, should be made six months after the king of Scotland's entering his own kingdom: that the like sum should be paid the next year, and so on during the space of six years, when the sum would be cleared, unless after payment of forty thousand marks, the last payment of ten thousand should be remitted at the entreaty of the most illustrious Thomas, duke of Exeter.

* Rymer, vol. x. p. 294, 296.

"III. That

“ III. That the king of Scotland, before entering his own kingdom, should give sufficient hostages for performance on his part. But, in regard that the Scots plenipotentiaries had no instructions concerning hostages, it was agreed, “ IV. That the king of Scotland should be at Branspath, or Durham, by the first of March next, where he should be attended by the nobles of his blood, and other subjects, in order to fix the number and quality of the hostages.

“ V. That, to cement and perpetuate the amity of the two kingdoms, the governor of Scotland should send ambassadors to London with power to conclude a contract of marriage between the king of Scotland and some lady of the first quality in England.

In pursuance of the last article, other two persons were added to the Scottish commissioners, and all together proceeded in a body to London, where they gave security upon the four principal boroughs in Scotland, viz. Edinburgh, Perth, Dundee, and Aberdeen, for the payment of the forty thousand pounds, and stipulated the hostages, the number of which were twelve, all of the noblest blood in Scotland, their names as follow: David, eldest son and heir of the earl of Athol; Thomas, earl of Murray; Alexander, earl of Crauford; Duncan Campel, lord of Argyll; William Douglas, son and heir of the lord of Dalkeith; Gilbert, son and heir of William Hay, constable of Scotland; Robert Keith, marshal of Scotland; Robert Erskine, lord of Erskine; Walter, lord Dirleton; Thomas Boyd, lord of Kilmarnock; Patrick Dunbar, lord of Carnoch; Alexander, lord of Gordon †.

Besides these hostages, who were actually delivered up to the English, the following were appointed to supply their places, in case the former should fail by death or otherwise: William, lord of Abernethy; Hugh Fraser, lord of Lovat; James Dunbar, lord of Frendraught; Andrew Gray, lord of Fowlis; Robert Livingston, lord of Livingston; John Lindsay; Robert de Lyle; James, lord of Calder; James Hamilton, lord of Cadrow; William, lord of Ruthven; William Oliphant, lord of Aberdalgy; Robert, son and heir of Robert de Maitland; David Menzies; David Ogilvie; Patrick, son and heir of lord John Lyon.

At the same time it was determined, that the king of Scotland should marry Jane Beaufort, daughter to the earl of Somerset (who was a son, by the second marriage, of John of Ghent), and niece to the duke of Exeter and the bishop of Winchester. This match was procured by that prelate, in order to strengthen and support his family by an alliance with Scotland; and the English council agreed to abate ten thousand marks of the ransom-money, by way of equivalent for the lady's portion. Then the commissioners of both nations signed a truce for seven years, namely to the first of May, 1431, by which James engaged to recall his troops from the French service by the month of June following, though he could not promise they would obey his orders. Thus James, after a captivity of seventeen years, was restored to his kingdom ‡. This treaty was confirmed by the parliament, which met on the twentieth of October; and having sat to the seventeenth of December, was adjourned to the fourteenth of January.

In this parliament a new council was appointed for the government of the realm, by the arts and intrigues of the bishop of Winchester, who, having had some dispute with the duke of Gloucester, raised an opposition in parliament, with a view to restrain the power of the protector by extending that of the council, which was accordingly enlarged.

Whilst the king of Scotland's liberty was negotiating in England, the war was continued in France with various success. In the beginning of the year 1424, Charles received a reinforcement of one thousand men at arms, and five hundred lances, from Philip Maria Visconti, duke of Milan; and these troops invading the Bajolois, not only saved the town of Bouffiere from falling into the hands of Toulangeon, marshal of Burgundy, but also attacked that general, who was taken prisoner with seven hundred men; but he was immediately exchanged for Stuart, the Scottish general, who had been taken at the battle of Crevante. Beaumont upon the Oyse, in the Isle of France, was also seized by a party of French royalists; but, on the other hand, the English and Burgundians surprized Gallion upon the Seine, and la Charité upon the Loire, the taking of which had, during the war, given Charles so many advantages. Several other actions of lesser note passed between the two parties; but the duke of Bedford could not, without great chagrin, behold his plan of clearing all the provinces north of the Loire of Charles's troops, attended with greater difficulties than he imagined; for he had no sooner subdued a place by force, than the enemy retook it by surprize, so that his task appeared to be equally laborious and ineffectual.

The French king was not a little indebted for the success of his arms to the bravery and conduct of his Scottish auxiliaries, of which he had at this time no less than fifteen thousand in his service: Charles looked upon them as his deliverers, nay as his guardians; he distinguished their officers by very particular marks of favour; the earl of Buchan he had already made constable of France, and he now created general Stuart, baron of Aubigny and count (or earl) of Evreux; and on the earl of Douglas, who had lately come over from Scotland with a fresh reinforcement of troops, and who was esteemed the most accomplished general of his time, he conferred the dignity of duke, by the title of duke of Terouranne: and so great was his opinion of the fidelity of the Scots, that he chose a company of them for the guard of his own person, which still subsists in name, and was actually existing till the time of James I. of England.

In the month of June the regent duke received advice that one of Charles's partizans had reduced Ivry, on the frontiers of Picardy; and as this was a place of great consequence, he was determined at any rate to regain it, while Charles was equally as determined to preserve it, that he might still continue the war to the north of the Loire. The regent marched thither in July, and made his dispositions so well, that the governor of the place agreed to surrender it, if not relieved by the fifteenth of August. Charles, apprized of this agreement, ordered the flower of his troops to assemble, determined to succour the place, though at the hazard of a battle. His forces rendezvoused in le Maine, and, upon a muster, were found to amount to twenty thousand men, composed of French, Scots, and Italians. The command of this army belonged to the earl of Buchan, as constable of France; but he being willing to resign that honour to his father-in-law, the earl of Douglas (duke of Terouranne) Charles sent that nobleman a patent, constituting him his lieutenant-general of the whole kingdom, otherwise the constable could not have been under his command. Douglas ordered the army to advance towards Chartres; but when they came within six leagues of Ivry, they heard that the place was surrendered, upon which the constable went to reconnoitre the English camp, which he found too strongly fortified to be attacked without evident disadvantage, and therefore the army was ordered to wheel round, and coming to Vernueil, a town belonging to the duke of Alençon, but then in the hands of the English faction, the place was summoned to surrender. On this occasion the French made use of an artifice, that had the desired effect; the messengers sent to the garrison had orders to tell them, that the constable and the earl were just come from gaining a complete victory over the regent duke, whose army they had cut in pieces, and that himself had with great difficulty escaped out of the field with a few followers only: this tale gained such belief, that the place immediately surrendered, and Douglas filled it with a garrison of French loyalists.

Upon the first news of the march of the French army, the regent sent to the earl of Salisbury for a reinforcement, and that nobleman joined him on the fourteenth of August, with a thousand horse and two thousand archers, which made the English army about fifteen thousand effective men: thus strengthened, the duke of Bedford advanced towards Vernueil, in order to force the enemy to an engagement.

When he arrived within a league of their camp, he sent a herald to offer Douglas battle, which the latter did not seem to decline, but without moving from his situation. This was some disappointment to the duke of Bedford, who had founded his principal hopes in the impetuosity of the French: but it was not long before those hopes were amply satisfied. The regent had pitched upon an advantageous spot for the field of battle, flanked by a hill, on which he posted a body of two thousand archers, and furnished his other soldiers with sharp stakes, like those that were used by the army of Henry V. at Agincourt, to oppose the onset of the French cavalry. Douglas, having surveyed the situation of the English camp, insisted that it would be the interest of the French to stand on the defensive, and not begin the charge, as the enemy had chosen their own ground, where they could not be attacked without manifest disadvantage. This prudent advice, which was seconded by the constable and all the officers of experience, appeared to Aymer, viscount of Narbonne, an headstrong and imprudent man, as the effect of fear or cowardice; nor did he spare to upbraid the commanders, in express terms, with dishonouring by their tameness the arms of France. Vain of superior numbers, he indulged that failing of headstrong impetuosity which has so often proved fatal to his nation: he was joined by all the young nobility, who were eager to signalize themselves; no reasons could be heard, no remonstrances were attended to: at length Narbonne, snatching up one of the standards of the division, exclaimed, "Let all who love their sovereign, follow me!" and rushing out of the line, he advanced at the head of all those under his command to begin the charge. Douglas and the constable, finding their advice neglected, and their authority despised, had now no other concern but how to perish as honest men and brave soldiers, as they foresaw inevitable destruction must be the consequence of this headlong rashness in their troops*.

The English were that day commanded by the duke of Bedford in the rear, with the earls of Salisbury and Suffolk on the wings; the regent had ordered all his horse to dismount, and placed between the main body and camp, which was the rear, forming round them a kind of barricade with the carriages of the army: in this position he waited the attack of the French. Before these latter came in sight of the English, their breath and spirits were almost exhausted; their generals in vain made an attempt to form them into some kind of order, they still refused to listen to any advice, and the French and Scots seemed to vie with each other in rushing forward to their own destruction.

Notwithstanding this disorder, their attack was so furious that a body of their horse on the right wing broke the opposite wing of the English, and advanced as far as the barricade which surrounded the horses, behind which was placed a body of archers, which received them with so terrible a discharge, as obliged them to wheel round and give back; while those that were posted upon the hill so overwhelmed the Italians, who were marching up in another line, that they betook themselves to flight in the very beginning of the battle, leaving the Scots and French to stand the whole brunt of the fight. This gave the body of reserve an opportunity of forming themselves, and advancing to the support of the main battle, where the fight had continued with great obstinacy for three hours, without either side being able to challenge the advantage; but this seasonable reinforcement fixed victory entirely on the side of the English: the French horse, as usual, were driven back by the arrows of the English bow-men upon their own foot, and a dreadful scene of slaughter ensued.

Douglas and the constable, seeing their defeat inevitable, scorned to survive the disgrace, and rushing into the thickest of the fight, fell in the midst of their enemies. Besides these two great generals, the headstrong Narbonne, author of this their fatal overthrow, the son of earl Douglas, the counts of Aumale, Ventadour, and de Tonnerre, the lords Grandville, Manni, Gamaches, and Guetri, with many of Charles's best French and Scottish officers, and a vast number of private gentlemen, with a thousand common soldiers, lay dead upon the field of battle; while the duke of Alençon, the bastard his brother, the marshal de la Fayette, and the lords Gaucourt and Mortemar, were taken prisoners. Nor did the English obtain a bloodless victory; they lost about seventeen hundred of their best men, who were left dead upon the spot, and among them some officers of distinction*. The day after this victory Vernueil surrendered to the conquerors; and there being no longer any army to oppose the English in the field, they made themselves masters, one after another, of the strong fortresses of Rambouillet, Mayenne le Juhez, Vitry en Patrois, and la Ferté Bernard, with other places in the neighbourhood.

The situation of Charles VII. was now deplorable: he had lost the bravest of his troops, and the flower of his nobility, by the late fatal defeat: his party was dispirited; he had scarce money sufficient for the common necessities of life, much less to pay an army; and he could raise none from among his subjects, without causing a general discontent, which, in his present circumstances, it was in a particular manner his interest to avoid. We may form some idea of his distress from what the French historians tell us, that he was reduced to make the silver mark pass for ninety livres in the places subject to his command, instead of half a livre, which it was formerly worth. But at the very time that his affairs seemed beyond the possibility of being restored, fortune, or rather Providence, that prescribes bounds to all mortal grandeur and depression, interfered in his behalf. The duke of Bedford was called off from pursuing his victory, by the necessity he found himself under of meeting the duke of Burgundy at Paris, in order to try at accommodating matters between the dukes of Brabant and Gloucester, which last had landed about that time, with a strong army of English at Calais, from whence he had marched and taken possession of the chief towns of Hainault, on the following occasion.

Jaquelina, daughter of William V. duke of Bavaria, and heiress of Holland, Zealand, and Friesland, had been married to John, dauphin of France; and, after his death, compelled by his mother to wed the duke of Brabant, whose person she detested. Indeed this aversion seems to have been reciprocal; and after they had lived together for some time, in continual dissention, she made an elopement to England, where she was hospitably received by the late king, and through his mediation, applied to the pope for a divorce; but as this could not be obtained, she gave her hand to the duke of Gloucester, by virtue of a licence from the anti-pope Benedict, and the nuptials had been celebrated in England with great solemnity, soon after the accession of the present king. It was about the end of October this year, that the duke of Gloucester carried over his consort, with an army of five thousand men, to take possession of her hereditary estates.

This marriage was, indeed, universally considered as a glaring outrage upon justice and decency; but the duke of Brabant, husband of this lady, must have been less than man not to have resented this double injury, both to his honour and property. Accordingly, he not only put himself in a posture of defence, but applied to the duke of Burgundy for assistance. This prince who thought no other than that the duke of Gloucester was come over with troops to reinforce his brother the regent, was not a little surprized when he heard that the duke had traversed his dominions, and that all the towns of Hainault had submitted, and taken the oath of allegiance to him and Jaquelina; and resolved to succour the injured duke of Brabant to the utmost of his power: however, unwilling to come to a rupture with the duke of Bedford, whom he knew to be strongly connected with his brother of Gloucester, he desired a meeting with the former, at Paris, in order to engage him to interfere his good offices, and even authority, to prevail with the duke of Gloucester to desist from his unjust pursuit. The regent readily agreed, and an interview was held at Amiens, between the four dukes, in which the regent laboured to persuade Gloucester to agree to an accommodation, or at least a cessation of arms, till he could be supported with the united strength of France and England: but the latter, blinded by love and ambition, was deaf to all remonstrances, so that the conferences were broke up entirely through his obstinacy.

The duke of Burgundy, justly irritated at the behaviour of the duke of Gloucester, put a stop to the career of his own successes against the French king, that he might the better check the progress of the other; and he was continually at war, either in Hainault, Zealand, or Holland, against the partizans of Jaquelina and the English succours sent her, till the year 1426, the repeated endeavours of Bedford not having been able in all that time to bring his brother Gloucester to reason, though the parliament had earnestly recommended an accommodation. To make matters still worse, the duke of Gloucester, thinking his honour injured by some expressions that the duke of Burgundy had let fall in the heat of his passion, sent to challenge him to single combat, and the very day was appointed; but the matter never came to that issue. Those differences, however, threw a total damp upon the English affairs in France, which the regent duke saw with the utmost concern, but without being able to remedy the evil: for by Gloucester's employing the forces, which should have been sent to reinforce his brother Bedford, in his wars in Flanders, and the army of the latter being mostly divided among a great number of castles and towns, which he was obliged to garrison, he found himself disabled from prosecuting his conquests. Thus, by the obstinacy and ambition of the duke of Gloucester, and his duchess, the English interest in France, after the battle of Vernueil, was able to make no great effort for pushing the war over the Loire.

In this dilemma the regent duke resolved to pass over to England, in order, if possible, to put matters upon such a footing as to be insured of a better supply for carrying on the war in France. His presence was likewise necessary for composing some differences which had arisen among the ministry here: the bishop of Winchester, who was a prelate of great capacity and experience, but of a turbulent overbearing disposition, had quarrelled with the duke of Gloucester, and their dispute threatened some serious consequences; nay, the duke of Gloucester had gone so far as to draw up a set of ar-

* By the report of Montjoy, French king at arms, and the English heralds then present, there were slain of French and Scots nine thousand seven hundred, and of the English two thousand one hundred: two hundred gentlemen, besides many common soldiers, were taken prisoners. This battle, which Rapin, Carte, and others place on the sixteenth and seventeenth of August, is said by Hall to have been fought on the twenty-seventh of that month. Hall, p. 90.

ticles by way of impeachment against the bishop. The regent duke hoped, by his presence and authority, to quiet these jealousies and distractions, and accordingly prepared for his voyage.

But before he left France, he gave orders to the earl of Salisbury to make fresh attempts for reducing all places which held for the French king in Maine and Anjou. Accordingly that nobleman, assisted by the lord Scales, sir John Montgomery, and sir John Fastolf, putting himself at the head of the few troops that could be spared, had for some time surprising success: the consternation of the French, after their late defeat, was such, that they gave up, almost without resistance, the strong castles of Beaumont le Vicomte, Teune, Sally, Osce, Roufie, Vafce, and about twenty more, in less than a month. At last, the earl laid siege to Mans itself, the principal city of the province, and being provided with a dreadful train of artillery for those days, he soon obliged the garrison to capitulate. The taking of this place was attended with great advantages to the English, and opened the way for the conquest of St. Susanne, the inhabitants of which were obliged to pay two hundred thousand crowns, barely to have their lives spared.

In the course of this year, sir John Mortimer, uncle to Edmund, earl of Marche, having been some time prisoner in the Tower, was charged with attempting to make his escape, in order to raise an insurrection in Wales. It was pretended that his design was to proclaim the earl of Marche, his nephew, or, upon his refusal, to proclaim himself. Whether his crime was proved, or it was thought proper to make away with a person who, in case he had escaped, might have done mischief, he was condemned and executed*.

The earl of Marche, his nephew, did not long survive him: he died in Ireland about the latter end of the year, without issue. By his death the title of earl of Marche, and his right to the crown of England, from which he was excluded by the election of Henry IV. descended to Richard Plantagenet, his nephew, son of Anne his sister, and the earl of Cambridge, beheaded at Southampton, in the beginning of the reign of Henry V. This young nobleman, who was at this time under age, was afterwards created duke of York, as will be seen in its place†.

In April, 1425, a parliament was held at Westminster, partly with a view to accommodate matters between the bishop of Winchester and his brother of Gloucester, who, in consequence of a short truce made with the duke of Brabant, had come over to England, leaving his duchess Jaqueline behind him, in Mons, whose citizens had engaged themselves by a solemn oath to guard her safely with their lives. The bishop of Winchester had gained so great an ascendancy in England, by the absence of the duke, that he was in this parliament made chancellor, in the room of the bishop of Durham, and opened the session in that quality: at the same time sir Thomas Newton was chosen speaker for the house of commons.

In this parliament a fierce dispute happened between John Mowbray, earl-marshal, and Richard, earl of Warwick, about precedency: this affair was very puzzling and intricate; but the earl-marshal demanding to be restored in blood to the dukedom of Norfolk, the same was granted, which of consequence gave him the precedency over his antagonist.

This difference, however, was but of small importance compared to that which was daily increasing between the duke of Gloucester and the bishop of Winchester, and was near producing a civil war, insomuch that the parliament found itself under a necessity of renewing the antient writs for prohibiting any person repairing in arms to the house during the session, which with some few adjournments continued to the end of the year. Notwithstanding this prohibition, the violent party-men, though they laid aside their arms, furnished themselves with clubs or batts, and had frequent rencounters, which as frequently ended in blood: for this reason this parliament was called the Parliament of Battis.

Notwithstanding these private feuds, this session distinguished itself by its zeal for the glory of the infant king: all the necessary supplies were voted, and many salutary acts passed for the advancement of commerce, the improvement of agriculture, and other matters conducive to the ease and benefit of the subjects, all which will be found under the head of Laws belonging to this period.

Towards the latter end of this year, and not before, the duke of Bedford arrived in England; and taking upon him the charge of protector, by his authority put a stop to the fatal quarrels that had disturbed the peace of the realm: he at first endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between the duke and the bishop; but finding his own influence insufficient for that purpose, he persuaded them to submit their dispute to the decision of parliament; and, after the matter had been fully discussed, they were both obliged to promise before that respectable body, to bury all their quarrels in utter oblivion: this did not happen till the month of March, in the following year. But it is now time to resume the affairs of France, and trace those causes which brought about the total decay of the English power there.

Whilst the war in Hainault was carrying on between the partizans of Jaqueline and those of the duke of Brabant, her former husband, assisted by the duke of Burgundy, which suspended all military operations in France, Charles was not an indolent spectator of these events: he resolved to improve this lucky diversion to his own advantage, and he could think of no method so effectual as that of detaching the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany from their alliance with the English. He knew that the former had openly broke with the duke of Gloucester, and that the other was wholly under the influence of his brother, the count de Richemont, who entertained a secret dislike to the duke of Bedford, for having refused him the command of the allied army during his absence in England, and conferred that post on the earl of Warwick. Charles was likewise encouraged and assisted in this scheme by some accidents which fell out about the time we are speaking of, and of which the following may serve as a concise account.

The duke of Burgundy had lately married Bona of Artois, widow of the earl of Nevers, and sister to the count of Eu, who still remained a prisoner in England, and half-sister to the count of Clermont; princes zealously attached to the Valois family: moreover, the duke of Burgundy had procured a bull from pope Martin V. which not only annulled the contract of Jaqueline with the duke of Gloucester, but likewise declared, that, even in case of the duke of Brabant's death, it should never be lawful for her to marry an English nobleman. Gloucester, thus disappointed in his hopes, espoused another lady, of inferior quality, named Eleanor Cobham, daughter to Reginald lord Cobham, of Sterborough, who had been his mistress: the news of this coming to the ears of Jaqueline, she threw herself entirely upon the protection of the duke of Burgundy, and even put on the appearance of a reconciliation with her husband, the duke of Brabant; and he dying shortly after, she appointed the duke of Burgundy her heir, in case she died without male issue, and promised never to marry without his consent. The great accession of dominion likely to fall to him by this compact, as it alarmed the English, so it not a little raised the duke's idea of his own consequence; and the quarrel between him and the duke of Gloucester still rankling at his heart, he affected on all occasions to treat the English with a superciliousness which they could not bear, and which gave rise to frequent disputes, so that it was easy to foretel that a total dissolution of their alliance might be brought about without a miracle.

Charles was not wanting, by his intrigues and emissaries, to make the most of appearances so favourable to his interest: he knew, as we have already observed, that the count de Richemont was incensed against the duke of Bedford; he was likewise well acquainted with the pride and vanity of the count, which he took care to flatter in the manner most likely to gain him. The staff of constable of France had not been disposed of, since the earl of Buchan's death, and Charles thought it the most proper bait he could lay before the count's eyes, at the same time causing him to be told how great an esteem he had for him, and that he should deem himself invincible if he had him at the head of his army. This was attacking Richemont in the most sensible part; he now thought he had a glorious opportunity of triumphing over the duke of Bedford, who had so scornfully refused him the first command in his absence: in a word, he yielded to the solicitations of Charles's emissaries; he accepted of the constable's staff, and even undertook to bring over his brother, the duke of Brittany, to the interest of Charles, provided that prince would banish from his councils Louvet, one of the principal authors of the Penthievrian confederacy against the duke.

Charles accordingly declared him constable of France; and next set about founding the duke of Burgundy, on whom he thought he should easily prevail, considering how highly he was exasperated against the English government, for supporting the duke of Gloucester in the affair of Hainault; but in the course of these negotiations the French monarch found that the duke, notwithstanding his resentments against Gloucester and the English in general, had not so entirely forgotten his father's assassination, as to listen readily to proposals from the author of his murder; and the bishops of Puy and Chartres, who had been sent by Charles with a carte blanche to the duke of Burgundy, could make very little impression upon him: in vain did they plead that Charles was innocent of the blood of his father; or that, if he had any knowledge of, or part in it, his youth at that time was to be considered, and that he had been under the guidance of evil counsellors, by whose pernicious advice he had been misled against his own sentiments. The duke returned no other answer to these excuses, only that when the king should have given proof of his disapprobation of that act, by removing from his presence those evil counsellors, or others who had availed themselves of his authority to perpetrate it, that it would then be a proper time to talk of accommodations. This answer, however, carried with it a kind of insinuation that he was not inexorable, especially as he had already consented to the count de Richemont's acceptance of the office of constable.

Charles, however, was not a little perplexed how to act on this occasion: the obnoxious persons, Tannegui de Chatel and Louvet, had sacrificed all considerations to his service; and he thought he could not, without great ingratitude, give them up to the power of their enemies. Tannegui, however, with a noble fidelity, resolved to rid his master of his embarrassment, and insisted upon quitting his court, and retiring to end his life in some remote corner of the world. Charles could not, without great reluctance, comply with his request; but knowing that his affairs were inevitably ruined, if he could not effect a reconciliation with the dukes of Brittany and Burgundy, both of whom were implacably irritated against the two favourites, he at length yielded to necessity, and dismissed Tannegui de Chatelet to the government of Boquere; but Louvet, deaf to all considerations but that of his own interest, clung as close to his posts as if he had resolved that his own fall should bring along with it that of his master; he even insinuated to Charles, that the views of the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany were no other but to amuse him with false appearances, and at length deliver him up to the English. Distress is ever suspicious; Charles began to think himself betrayed, and took such steps in consequence of this false notion inspired into him by the self-interested favourite, as must have brought instant destruction upon him, had not all the noblemen of his party, by a seasonable boldness, declared that they would abandon him to a man, if he neglected the only means in his power of making the two dukes his friends. Unable to withstand these dispositions, and, perhaps, shamed into compliance by the generous example of Tannegui, Louvet at last retired into Provence; and the constable de Richemont, having gotten rid of a person so obnoxious to him, performed his promise in bringing over his brother, the duke of Brittany, who came and did homage to Charles at Saumur, for his duchy and for the earldom of Montfort, on the seventh of October, 1425; and at the same time concluded a treaty with him, whereby he engaged to assist him in driving out the English from France, upon the following conditions: 1. That Charles should be reconciled to the princes of the blood, particularly to the duke of Burgundy. 2. That he should desist from prosecuting the earl of Penthievre. 3. That the duke of Brittany should have the administration of the finances in the Languedoit, that is, the country between the Loire and Languedoc: but this was provisionally, in case the duke of Burgundy could not be brought to break with the English likewise*.

The duke of Bedford perceiving the untowardly turn the English affairs were taking in France, hastened his departure for England, that, by removing all animosities there, he might direct the united efforts of all parties against their common enemies. He no sooner arrived, than summoning a parliament, he laid before them the perfidy of the court of Brittany, as he chose to term their conduct, and gave it as his opinion, that the only method to prevent the duke of Burgundy from pursuing the same measures, was to declare war against the Bretons, and to push it with the utmost vigour. This advice of the regent was unanimously approved; and, early in the year 1426, it was agreed by the parliament to declare open war against the duke of Brittany. In what manner the regent duke quieted the animosities between his brother and uncle, we have shewn already, and therefore shall only observe that the bishop seemed still to retain some sentiments of disgust, as we find him in this parliament desiring to be discharged of his office of lord chancellor, which was accordingly done, and the great-seal was delivered to the bishop of London.

In the mean while the earl of Warwick, who had been left governor of France during the absence of the regent duke, took the field in person, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, and, laying siege to Pont Orson, carried it by assault, and afterwards took and fortified the town of St. Jaques de Beauvron, where he fixed his head-quarters, and from thence terribly ravaged the adjacent country, up to the very gates of Rennes. But the constable de Richemont, having gotten together an army of twenty thousand men, put himself at their head, and, entering Brittany, besieged and took Pont Orson, the earl of Warwick not daring to oppose him, on account of his great inferiority of numbers, contented himself with calling in all his detachments, and shut himself up in Beauvron with his little army, amounting to no more than eight thousand men. The constable now thought he was at the eve of gaining great honour, and giving a mortal blow to the English interest by taking this place with the earl shut up therein; this he proposed to do by blockade, from a persuasion that so numerous a garrison must soon be starved into a surrender. But de Giac, who had succeeded Louvet in his place in the king's councils, and had a hatred to the constable, neglecting to send him the necessary supplies of men and money, Richemont despaired of effecting his purpose; yet, mad with the thought of being baffled in his first campaign, he rashly resolved upon a general assault, but the garrison made so brave a resistance, that he was beaten back to his camp, and the besieged, observing the disorder of his ranks, sallied out, and, falling upon them in the rear, put them to flight with great slaughter, taking all their baggage and artillery. The constable was almost at his wits end at this disgrace; he vowed the severest revenge against de Giac, whom he looked upon as the author of it, which he soon after found means to effect, by causing that minister to be strangled and thrown into the Loire. However, he found means after his late defeat to get together the scattered remains of his army, which he led into Anjou, and made himself master of la Flèche and Galarande belonging to the English.

All this while the regent duke was acting the part of a great and wise prince in England, by endeavouring at a reconciliation of all parties. With this view, having effected an apparent reconciliation between his brother and uncle, he next procured Richard Plantagenet, son of the late earl of Cambridge, to be restored to the honours and estates of the late duke of York, his deceased uncle, and to the honours and estates of the earldoms of Ulster, Marche, and Rutland, belonging to the Mortimer family: at the same time this young lord, with twenty-one other noblemen, together with young king Henry himself, received the honour of knighthood from the hands of the protector.

The earl of Warwick seeing that the constable's defeat before Beauvron, the desertion of his troops, and the broils in Charles's council had disabled the French from appearing with any numbers in the field, formed a design of making himself master of Montargis, the possession of which place would greatly facilitate the regent's intentions of carrying the war on the other side of the Loire: the earl accordingly set down before it with a small but well-provided army, and was assisted in his operations by the earl of Suffolk and his brother, John de la Pole, both experienced officers; and they had taken their measures so well, that the place was reduced to the last extremity, when the bastard of Orleans, afterwards the famous count de Dunois, resolved to march to its relief. This officer was not then above three-and-twenty years of age, but had served with vast reputation in eight campaigns. He was natural son of that duke of Orleans who was assassinated by the duke of Burgundy, and had been bred to the church; but the good genius of France had so ordained it, that he had changed an ecclesiastic for a military habit. With a body of no more than sixteen hundred men, this gallant young leader ventured to approach the English camp, and, with his handful of troops, made so furious an attack upon the enemy, who knew nothing of his approach, that he not only forced his way into the place, but even gave such a severe blow to the English, as obliged the earl of Warwick to abandon the siege. This was the first action which discovered the great military genius of Dunois, and laid the foundation of that high character which he afterwards attained. However, the earl of Warwick lost neither credit nor power by this misfortune; for we find that about this time he was nominated to succeed the duke of Exeter, deceased this year, as governor to the king; but he resided long after this in France.

But the regent Bedford, who returned to France in the beginning of the following year, 1427, soon after his arrival, restored the honour of the English arms by an important enterprize, which he accomplished with a success equal to the wisdom with which he had planned it.

Having privately assembled a numerous army on the frontiers of Brittany, he fell so unexpectedly into that province, that the duke, unable to stop his progress, and the duke of Burgundy still refusing to declare himself against the English, the former was glad to comply with all the terms which the enemy thought proper to prescribe; and, after having seen his territories wasted with fire and sword during the whole summer, he at length consented to an interview with the regent duke, and, on the eighth of September, a treaty was signed between them, by which the duke of Brittany not only returned to his old engagements with the English, but also signed the treaty of Troye, acknowledged the duke of Bedford for regent of France, and engaged to pay homage to the king of England for his duchy of Brittany, in the same manner as his predecessors and he himself had used to pay it to the kings of France †.

The regent duke justly looked upon this treaty as a great acquisition; he now saw himself delivered from a troublesome enemy, who lay behind him; he next resolved to make himself master of Pont Orson, the only place which now stood in the way of his carrying the war beyond the Loire; besides, being in the hands of the French (for the reader may remember, that this place had some time before been taken by the constable de Richemont), it gave them an inlet into the dominions of the duke of Brittany, whom he now considered as his ally. Accordingly he sat down before it, but met with a very vigorous resistance, till at length the earl of Warwick coming to his assistance with seven thousand men, he obliged the place to capitulate, and made the lords Rois and Talbot governors of the same, the latter of whom had lately distinguished himself in recovering the town of Mons, which had been taken by treachery by the count de Foix, who was very near making the earl of Suffolk, who commanded therein, prisoner, had he not retired in time to the citadel; but Talbot arriving with a reinforcement, the French were driven out of the place with great loss.

The regent duke, encouraged by his successes, determined to attempt an undertaking, which, if crowned with like success, would give a fatal blow to the affairs of Charles, and pave the way for the final reduction of France. With this view, after committing the care of the army to the earl of Warwick, he set out for Paris, there to concert the operations of the great expedition he meditated.

The bishop of Winchester had by this time got himself dignified with the title of cardinal, which put him under the court of Rome's particular protection, and the pope having also invested him with a legatine power, his credit was so increased, that he had greater sway in parliament than ever. The duke of Gloucester, notwithstanding the late seeming reconciliation, could not without jealousy behold so much weight given to the cardinal; and some reflections which the latter threw out against his authority, as if he was no more than a substitute to the duke of Bedford, nettled Gloucester so much that he made an attempt, in a parliament which was held this year, to increase his authority, either by change of his title into that of regent, agreeable to the declaration of the late king on his death-bed, or by getting some new powers annexed to his office of protector, but without success; for, after deliberating upon the request of the duke, the lords declared and signed the following resolution, which was delivered to him in form:

“That he ought not to have been protector; notwithstanding, to satisfy his desire, it was granted that he should be protector, and have farther power, as in anno 1 Hen. VI. The which name of protector, or defender, importeth only a personal duty of attendance to the actual defence of the realm against foreign enemies and inward rebels; and not any special government, as properly belongeth to tutors, lieutenants, governors, or regents; for if they had otherwise meant, they then would have expressed more whereby (i. e. by the office of protector) in council, as privy-counsellor, he had pre-eminence; but in parliament he had no other place than as duke of Gloucester; so as they wished him to supply his place in parliament, and to be content with the power aforesaid, for the other they would not grant *.”

We find little else remarkable in this parliament, which was held at Westminster the thirteenth day of October, except an act which passed, that knights of the shire, who, in case of an undue election, were, by 11 Hen. IV. to lose their wages, and sheriffs who, making a false return, were, by the same statute, to pay an hundred pounds, should be permitted to have their answer and traverse to offices before any justices of assize ‡.

It was towards the close of this year that the affair of Jaqueline and Hainault was terminated by that lady's giving herself and dominions up to the duke of Burgundy, in the manner we have already related. The duke of Bedford had all along formed the design of attacking Charles in the provinces beyond the Loire, which had as yet felt nothing of the ravages of the war; but the quarrel between the dukes of Burgundy and Gloucester had forced him to suspend its execution: that dispute being now determined, and the war of Hainault at an end, he knew that all the strength of England might be united for the conquest of France, which seemed the more easy as Charles had not one body of troops in the field, and had lately given himself up to the pleasures of indolence in the arms of a beautiful mistress, named Agnes Sorel, as if he had laid aside all thoughts of opposing the progress of the enemy.

The duke of Bedford therefore assembled the states at Paris early in the year 1428, and proposed to them the laying siege to Orleans, the taking of which would cover all the places on this side the Loire, whilst those beyond that river would be open to the ravages of the English. This enterprise was unanimously approved, and it was resolved to carry it into execution as soon as the earl of Salisbury should arrive with the supplies which were daily expected from England §. It was near Midsummer, however, before that nobleman came over with those troops, which amounted to eight thousand, and, with the forces already in France, were thought sufficient to effect the conquest they meditated. Upon the arrival of the earl of Salisbury, the earl of Warwick departed for England, to take upon him the education of the king.

‡ Rot. Parl. 6 Hen. VI. n. 24.

§ This nobleman's reputation as a general, was so high that he contracted to raise six hundred men at arms, six knights bannerets, thirty-four knights bachelors, and seventeen hundred archers, all well armed and provided; and for their pay he was to have himself six pence three farthings sterling per day, for each knight banneret four pence sterling, for each knight bachelor two pence; for every man at arms twelve pence per day; and each archer six pence: he likewise had an allowance for his artillery. Rymer, vol. x. p. 392.

The arrival of the earl of Salisbury gave prodigious spirits to the English party in France, and the regent duke immediately committed the management of the enterprize against Orleans to his care, who began his march from Paris with a body of sixteen thousand men, about the latter end of July, attended by the earl of Suffolk, the lord Talbot, sir John Fastolf, with other excellent officers. He immediately advanced through the county of Beauffe, and made himself master of all the towns which lay in his way to Orleans †, and sat down before that place on the twelfth of October, upon the side of Sologne, having passed the Loire at Beaugenci.

The French easily perceived, by all the English general's motions, that he meditated the siege of Orleans; accordingly, whilst he was employed in reducing the places he found in his route, they exerted their utmost endeavours to provide for the safety of this important city; and, above all, the count de Gaucourt, an officer of great courage and consummate experience, inviolably attached to the Orleans family, was appointed to defend it. Many other officers of distinction threw themselves into the place; the troops which they brought with them, were accustomed to war, and familiar with dangers, and even the citizens had acquired that military turn which was so much the mode of the age, and were thereby extremely well qualified to assist the regular forces in the defence of the place: add to this, that they burnt with resentment against the English, for making their master, the duke of Orleans, suffer so strict, so long, and so rigorous a captivity. Many new fortifications were raised, and the old ones put in repair; and we are told by Monstrelet, that they pulled down all the most considerable buildings in the suburbs, and among the rest twelve churches and several monasteries, that the English might not make use of them in carrying on the siege. The eyes of all Europe were fixed upon this important object, as it was commonly imagined that the French would exert their utmost efforts in supporting the rights of their king and the independency of their kingdom.

The first operation of the English † was against a bulwark, which the besieged had raised in order to cover the little castle of Tourelles, which defended the head of their bridge over the Loire. This bulwark was attempted by mine; but the English perceiving they were countermined, their general, the earl of Salisbury, desisted from that way of proceeding, and prepared to attach the bulwark with his cannon: these soon ruined all the parapets, and a breach being made sufficiently large, the English prepared to storm it: the French, on the other hand, sensible of the importance of the place, defended it with surprizing courage, and the earl of Salisbury ordered a retreat to be sounded, leaving two hundred and fifty of his best troops dead before the breach. This repulse, however, served only to increase the vigour of the besiegers; they continued their batteries with such incessant fury, that, on the twenty-third of October, the place, being no longer tenable, was abandoned by the French, and the English took possession of it the next day. The besieged, apprehensive of this event, had erected a new fort between the Tourelles and the town, and had demolished some arches of the bridge between them, leaving only some beams of timber to serve for a communication.

The English having made themselves masters of the Tourelles, erected four great towers, two above the bridge and two below, upon the banks of the Loire, from whence they battered the city itself. But all this time the place was invested only upon the side of Sologne, and all access to it on the side of Beauffe was still open; by this side, two days after the taking of the Tourelles, the bastard of Orleans found means to throw himself into the city with a reinforcement of eight hundred men, accompanied by la Hire and several other gallant adventurers; and the English not being numerous enough to encompass the city, it was continually receiving reinforcements, insomuch that the garrison, which originally consisted of twelve hundred men, was, by the latter end of December, augmented to three thousand. In order to deprive the town of all possibility of receiving future succours in this manner, the earl of Salisbury ordered sixty small forts or redoubts to be built around it; but whilst he was taking a view of the several spots most proper to erect them on, a stone discharged from a cannon of the city took away half his face with the right eye. He was immediately carried to Melun, and died there on the third of November, universally regretted by the army, who thought themselves invincible while under his command. After his death numbers deserted, and returned to England. Thus fell the gallant Thomas Montacute, earl of Salisbury: he was the lineal descendant of Montacute, the favourite general of Edward III. and died without male issue, leaving only one daughter, married to Richard Neville, third son of the earl of Westmoreland, afterwards created earl of Salisbury in right of his wife*.

The death of this nobleman was a great loss to the English; for though they were in no want of able generals, they had few so well experienced in the art of attacking and defending places. However, the siege continued to be carried on with great vigour under the direction of the earl of Suffolk, who now took the command, assisted by the renowned Talbot, one of the greatest captains which that age produced: but as it would be tedious to relate all the particulars of this siege, the attacks, sallies, and daily skirmishes, either to introduce or repulse convoys, I shall therefore content myself with observing in general, that, on the twenty-first of December, a fresh reinforcement of English and Burgundian troops, to the amount of eight thousand, arrived to invest the city on the side of Beauffe, and took post in the suburbs; nevertheless, the army of the besiegers was not yet numerous enough to encompass the whole extent of so large a place, and the forts which had been erected in consequence of the earl of Salisbury's plan, were at such a distance from each other as still allowed the enemy to introduce into the place succours of men with large quantities of ammunition and provision, magazines of which had been prepared at Blois, in order to be thrown into the town as opportunity might offer; the count de Clermont had also taken up his quarters in the last-mentioned town*, with a large body of troops, for the greater security of their own convoys, and for intercepting those of the English in their way from Paris to supply the army with necessaries.

Four months had already been spent in continual sallies and engagements, when the regent ordered a convoy to set out from Paris, with salt-fish, herrings, and the like kind of provisions, for the use of the besiegers in Lent. This convoy was escorted by a guard of seventeen hundred men, under the command of sir John Fastolf, an officer of approved valour and great experience. Charles, who had come to Chinon, a town in Touraine, about twenty leagues distant from Orleans, that he might be nearer to this great scene of action, receiving intelligence of the day on which sir John was to begin his march, ordered the count de Clermont to attack him with three thousand men, on his road to Orleans; and that nobleman, agreeable to his orders, set out at the head of his party, and came in sight of the enemy on the twelfth day of February, 1429, at Rouvrai St. Denis, in Beaufle. Fastolf being apprized of his approach, and knowing himself too weak to encounter in open field an enemy so much superior in numbers, drew up his men behind a barricade of waggons, where they sustained the first shock of the French, who attacked them with their usual impetuosity; but, far from being able to break through this entrenchment, they met with such a warm reception as threw them into confusion, and the English commander, seeing their disorder, caused openings to be made in his barricade, through which his men charged the enemy before they could rally, and routed them with great carnage.

In this action, called the Battle of the Herrings, one hundred and twenty noblemen and officers of distinction lost their lives, besides a great number of common soldiers. The bastard of Orleans (whom we shall henceforth call the count de Dunois) having received notice from Clermont of his intent to cut off this convoy, had found means to get out of Orleans, and join the count with a body of veteran troops; however, he secured his retreat to the town with four hundred men, in good order, accompanied by the count de Clermont.

This defeat, and the untoward face of Charles's affairs in general, had filled that monarch and his whole court with so great a despondency, that it was absolutely proposed in the council to abandon the Orleanois, Touraine, and Berry, and to retreat into Dauphiné: however, willing to try every expedient that was left, and had the air of practicability, he sent Xaintrailles to the regent at Paris, to propose that Orleans might be sequestered into the hands of the duke of Burgundy until the war should be finished. This proposal being rejected by the duke of Bedford, Charles endeavoured to obtain a farther supply of men from Scotland. A treaty of marriage had been some time on foot between the eldest daughter of James I. of Scotland, and the young dauphin of France, Charles's son; and now offers were made to James, to conclude the match on any terms, provided the latter would send six thousand men to the assistance of the loyalists in France; but James, who had, ever since his restoration, been upon good terms with the English, could not be brought to do any thing till the truce with England was expired. Much about the same time Charles's court seems to have renewed its negociation with the duke of Burgundy, in hopes of detaching him from the interest of England; but that prince was not to be then prevailed on to listen to their proposals.

Charles, thus baffled in every attempt to ward off the impending blow which threatened the loss of his crown and dignity, actually laid aside all thoughts of farther opposition, when his affairs were suddenly restored by the strangest and most unlooked-for revolution ever recorded in history.

In the village of Domremi, or, as Rapin calls it, Dompré, near Vaucouleurs, on the borders of Lorraine, lived a lusty stout virago of a girl, about twenty-seven years of age, named Joan d'Arc, who was servant in a small inn; and, being of a masculine turn, used to take care of the horses, and ride them to water, and do many other offices of that kind, which are generally performed by the ostler. It is allowed on all hands, that the girl's character for chastity remained wholly unimpeached. She possessed a genius superior to most in her class of life. Baudicourt, governor of Vaucouleurs, having seen and conversed with this girl, probably thought her properly qualified for acting the part of a divine missionary, and raise the drooping spirits of the French, naturally of a superstitious disposition, and, in their present situation, eager to catch at any thing that promised safety, and to embrace even the most distant prospect of assistance and relief from the successful arms of the English. This girl having been a proper time in training, and Charles and his court having been apprized of the part she was to play, Baudicourt sent her to that prince, who was then at Chinon. Care was taken, however, to prepare the way for her reception among the people, by spreading the most amazing stories of her supernatural knowledge, intrepidity, virtue, and other qualifications never yet found in a mortal, especially one of her sex. Charles, on his side, being informed that Joan was upon the road, declared that Mary of Avignon, a nun and reputed saint, had formerly told him, that Heaven would deliver France from its enemies by the arm of one of her sex; adding, that, perhaps, this girl was the person designed by Heaven. The opinion of a king is generally that of his courtiers, at least outwardly so; the complaisant infection catches, and each subordinate class thinks, or appears to think, like its superiors; so that every one of the loyal party seemed to be satisfied before-hand, that Joan of Arc had a miraculous call in their behalf. This will clearly account for the most surprizing parts of the following relation.

When she arrived at Chinon, which was about the latter end of March, 1429, she appeared at court in a man's dress, and was received there in the manner most proper to favour the deceit. Being required to give an account of herself, and upon what foundation she built her belief of being divinely commissioned, she made no other reply than by immediately discovering to the king a secret known only to himself and his favourite mistress, Agnes Sorel. The whole court appeared struck with amazement; and this circumstance, so well calculated to strike the minds of the vulgar with admiration, was carefully circulated. However Charles, willing to keep an appearance of impartiality, declared himself not thoroughly satisfied, and that he was resolved to have her examined. The divines who had the interrogating her, declared (upon what grounds I leave the intelligent reader to judge) that her mission was of Heaven. After this she was sent to the parliament of Poitiers, who were of the same opinion. Lastly, to put the matter beyond doubt, the king declared that she had demanded of him, as the instrument of her future victories, a particular sword which lay in the church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, and which, though she had never seen it, she described with such a number of circumstances as plainly proved her supernatural knowledge: in a word, the affair was so well managed, that the French common soldiers, heretofore trembling at the name of the English, by whom they had been so often beaten, now felt themselves revigorated; and believing that Joan of Arc, to whom they gave the name of la Pucelle, or the Maid, was sent from God to save France, they gave credit to all her predictions, and were ready to rush into the most daring actions, from an assurance of victory; while the wench, on her side, kept her imagination warm by incessantly declaring that she had been told by a celestial visitor, that she should relieve Orleans, conduct Charles VII. to be crowned at Rheims, and deliver France from its enemies, the English*.

Thus far, as Mr. Rapin very judiciously observes, here is nothing that appears very strange: it is easy to conceive that the whole might be a contrivance to revive the courage of the French, and perhaps of the king himself, dismayed at so many losses, and beholding the kingdom ready to fall under the dominion of foreigners. But that this contrivance should succeed according to the design of the authors, is what may, indeed, be just cause of admiration, and afford ample matter for moral and political reflections. But to return.

This extraordinary engine being thus prepared, it was resolved to try its force upon the enemy. The sword of St. Catherine was sent for, and presented to Joan; she was armed cap à pié, mounted on a fine steed, and in that military garb suffered to harangue the troops every day. At length she had the command given her of a large convoy of provisions, for the besieged in Orleans. A body of twelve thousand chosen men were prepared to escort it; and, to manage as much as possible the honour of the new female military saint and prophetess in the first enterprize, the lords of Gaucourt, Ray, and St. Severe, the admiral de Crevant, and other excellent officers were ordered to assist her; and Florentine d'Illiers, governor of Chateaudun was sent the day before, with a party of four hundred men at arms, who got into Orleans, and gave the garrison intelligence of the design. A great number of boats were prepared to waft the convoy over the Loire; and when the escorte drew near the town, on the side of Sologne, on the twenty-ninth of April, the count de Dunois made a vigorous sally upon the English on the side of Beaussé, to keep them from sending succours on the other side of the river, whilst the boats were taking in the provisions destined for the town. The English on that side were too weak to encounter so strong a force as escorted the convoy, and their inaction being interpreted by the French as a terror imprinted on their minds by Heaven, to facilitate the enterprize of the Pucelle, they fell upon the English with enthusiastic fury, who, after a long resistance, were defeated, and obliged to suffer the convoy to pass in. A natural event served not a little to heighten the superstition of the French: during the whole time of the action there was a most violent storm of thunder, lightning, and hail: it may easily be supposed this was taken for the voice of Heaven declaring in their favour. However, Joan made her entry into Orleans amidst the generals, and with the repeated acclamations of the people, who ascribed to her presence the success of that day.

The Maiden was now looked upon with adoration, and the French troops glowed with impatience to retrieve their honour under the auspices of the female champion. She herself appears to have worked her mind into a state of enthusiasm, and to have mistaken the warmth of her own passion to render herself remarkable, for the impulses of heavenly inspiration; for, while she was at Blois in her way to Orleans, she sent the following letter to the regent and the English generals, to be by them communicated to their king.

“ King of England,

“ Give an account to the King of Heaven for his royal blood; surrender up to the Virgin the keys of all the good towns which you have taken by force; she is come from Heaven to vindicate the royal blood of France, and is very ready to make peace, if thou wilt submit to reasonable terms; and, as equity and justice require, restore what thou hast taken from him. King of England, if thou wilt not do this, I am the captain of the wars; and in whatsoever part of France, I shall find any of the English nation, I will drive them out, whether they will or no; but if they will submit, I will take them to mercy: I am come from the King of Heaven to expel you out of France; and if you will not obey, I will make such a slaughter and stir among you, as hath not been these thousand years in France. Believe me, the King of Heaven will give me and my forces such irresistible courage and strength, as you shall not be able to oppose: go, in God's name, into your own country, and be not obstinate to your own opinions, for you shall not hold France of the King of Heaven, the son of the Virgin Mary; but Charles the true heir of it, shall again possess it, and be king of it; for God hath given it him, and he shall enter Paris with a goodly train. You, William Pawlet, earl of Suffolk †; John, lord Talbot; Thomas, lord Scales, lieutenants of the duke of Bedford; and you, duke of Bedford, who callest thyself regent of the kingdom of France, be sparing of innocent blood, and give Orleans its liberty: if you will not do justice to those whom you have wronged, the French will do the noblest exploit that ever was done in Christendom. Mind this wholesome advice given you by God and his Virgin.”

* Histoire de Charles VII. Pasquier Recherches, liv. vi. chap. v.

† An egregious blunder in this pretended prophesy; the earl of Suffolk's name being de la Pole.

And when about to begin her march for Orleans, she commanded the soldiers to make confession; and ordered a standard to be made, which she carried in her hand at the head of the troops, in which God the Father was represented grasping the globe of the earth, encompassed by fleurs de lis: and she insisted, by virtue of her prophetic spirit, that the convoy should enter Orleans on the side of Beaufle; but the count of Dunois, who thought it more prudent to adhere to the rules of military art than to her inspirations, ordered it to approach by the other side of the river, where he knew the weakest part of the English army was posted. This alone is sufficient to shew what the real opinion of men of rank and understanding in France was of Joan's divine mission.

However, not to let the spirit of the soldiery cool after the late event, Joan was sent, on the fourth day of May, to attack the fort of St. Loup, which was one of those the English had raised for the blockade of the place, and after a furious dispute of four hours, carried it sword in hand, against a garrison of twelve hundred men, four hundred of whom were killed in the assault, and, amongst the rest, William Gladdisdale, captain of the fort, and the lords Molings and Poynings. Two days after this action, our heroine proceeded against the fort of St. John, where she met with very little resistance from the English, who had well nigh abandoned it before her arrival. Having secured this conquest, she attacked the fort of London, as it was called, which was the most considerable of all, and took it by storm, after a very obstinate engagement. Encouraged by this success, the troops were led, without giving them the least respite, against the fort of Tourelles, but, for want of day-light, were obliged to postpone the attack till next morning, when the French, with Joan still marching with her standard in the van, began the assault, which lasted fourteen hours without intermission: the French were repulsed four several times, and as often returned to the charge, this extraordinary female always appearing in the foremost ranks. Under her eye the French thought themselves invincible; they performed prodigies of valour, and at length made themselves masters of the fort, when six hundred of the garrison were put to the sword. During the action, Joan was wounded in the neck by an arrow; but instead of discovering the least dismay thereat, she stepped aside, pulled it forth, and returned to the fight as if no such accident had befallen her. But we cannot pass by unnoticed the words of Monstrelet, a French author, who lived in the time of these events, who, in speaking of the Pucelle, thus expresses himself; "Notwithstanding that in these three assaults [of the forts], Joan is reported by common fame to have had the chief command, and the glory of them; yet they were chiefly performed by those noble knights and captains, who had so bravely defended Orleans." And in another place he says, speaking of the march of the French army, after the raising of the siege of Orleans, "Joan was ever in the front before her standard; and in all the marches her fame was cried up as if there had been no other general but herself."

In these attacks the English lost near eight thousand men, and the French not above one hundred. Such a series of misfortunes filled the former with terror and consternation: treating the divinity of her mission with contempt, they conceived a notion rather more absurd, and supposed she acted by compact with the devil*. The common soldiers were struck with an unaccountable panic, and trembled with the very apprehension of being led against this terrible enchantress. The earl of Suffolk, with the lords Talbot and Scales, beheld these attacks, and the loss of the forts, without being able to succour their party, having scarce men enough to defend the forts on the side of the Beaufle. There was now in Orleans an army full as strong as that of the besiegers, and a free communication was now opened with Berry, by taking the forts on the other side of the river, so that the English general, finding it impossible to reduce the place whilst it could receive succours every day on the side of Sologne, raised the siege on the twelfth of May, and abandoned the enterprize, after having lain before the place full seven months. Such was the issue of the siege of Orleans, on which the fall of France had, in a great measure depended, and the miscarriage whereof gave a fatal blow to the English affairs in that kingdom.

Charles, to improve his success while his troops were in heart, and terror possessed the English, summoned the noblesse from all the provinces which acknowledged his authority; and they attending him in great numbers, with a body of ten thousand men, he put them under the command of the duke of Alençon, who had lately recovered his liberty upon the payment of his ransom. The constable de Richemont joined him at the same time with a corps of twelve hundred Bretons; and these forces being daily strengthened by the arrival of fresh supplies, resolved to take the field in pursuit of those from whom they had so long fled.

The English, by an inconceivable mistake, after retiring from before Orleans, instead of keeping their forces in a body, had distributed great part of them into places near the Loire, which they had subdued before they laid siege to Orleans. The enemy thus divided, the French found little resistance in the places they attempted. Joan still kept along with their troops: the troops, with her at their head, looked upon themselves as invincible. Gargeau, a small fortress, into which the earl of Suffolk had been so imprudent to throw himself with four hundred men only (probably seized with the general panic), was obliged to surrender at discretion, and the earl was taken prisoner. Melun had the same fate, with many other towns and castles that the English had garrisoned: Beaugenci only held out, and this place it was necessary to take before the entrance into Beaufle

* Even the regent duke himself appears to have had the same belief, for in a letter addressed to king Henry he expresses himself thus:

"And alle thing there prospered for you, till the tyme of the siege of Orleans taken in hand, God knoweth by what advis. At the whiche tyme, after the adventure fallen to the persone of my cousin of Salysbury, whom God assoile. there falle, by the hand of God as it seemeth, a great strook upon your people that was assembled there in grete nombre, caused in grete partie, as y trowe, of lakke of fadde beleve, and of unlevefulle doubte, that thei hadde of a disciple and lyme of the seende, called the Pucelle, that used fals enchauntments and forcerie. The whiche strooke and discomfiture nought oonly lessed in grete partie the nombre of youre people there, but as well withdrowe the courage of the remenant in merveilous wyse, and couraiged your adverse partie and ennemys to assemble hem forthwith in grete nombre," &c. could be secured: accordingly Alençon formed the siege of it, and in a few days, compelled it to open its gates to him.

Of the two-and twenty thousand English lately before Orleans, there were left but six thousand, under the lord Talbot, who had taken the command of the army after Suffolk was made prisoner. As soon as the French were masters of Beaujenci, they marched after this little army (themselves near twelve thousand strong), and overtook it, on the eighteenth of June, near Patay. The English general would willingly have declined a battle till his men were recovered of the general consternation into which the pretended mission, and almost miraculous successes of the Pucelle, had thrown them; but there was no remedy, and the event proved such as might naturally be expected, when a handful of men, and these under the power of superstitious prepossession and panic fear, are attacked by numbers greatly superior to themselves, and encouraged by a series of success. The English were totally defeated; two thousand of them lay breathless on the field; and upwards of two hundred were taken prisoners, among whom were the lords Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, sir Thomas Rempston, and several other officers of note. Monstrelet tells us, that the English troops were in such astonishment at beholding the banner of the Pucelle displayed in the front of the French line, and advancing towards them, that they forgot to fix the stakes, with which they were provided, to keep off the enemy's horse, and ran away shamefully at the first onset. In consequence of this day's action, Jonville, a strong place near Patay, though provided with a good garrison, submitted to the victors without any resistance; and all the castles which held for the English about Orleans, were abandoned immediately, the garrisons retiring to Paris: in a word, both valour and victory seemed now to have changed sides, and the once all-conquering English now fled like a herd of timorous deer before the ensigns of a female plebeian.

Charles VII. had never yet appeared at the head of his troops; but encouraged by this victory, declared he would take the field in person. This resolution was worth an army to him: the French nobility, ever accustomed, on such occasions, to attend their sovereign, even at their own expence, flocked from all quarters with their followers, to range themselves under their famous oriflame*. Lewis III. duke of Anjou, and king of Sicily, Charles's brother-in-law, brought, immediately after the battle of Potoy, a supply of several brave officers, who had attended him into Italy some time before, and were come back with him into France: in a word, Charles soon found himself at the head of a considerable force, and his adherents daily increasing; while the duke of Bedford was obliged to confine himself within the walls of Paris: so greatly had the late success on the part of the French, and misfortunes on the part of the English, altered the state of affairs.

Charles now made a general review and muster of his troops at Gieau, and found that they amounted to fifteen thousand fighting men; five of which he sent off in two detachments, one under the command of the constable de Richemont, to make a diversion in Normandy; and the other to carry the war into the heart of Guienne, under the conduct of the count de Pondriac. The king himself, at the head of the remaining ten thousand, began his march for Rheims, at the pressing instances of the Pucelle, who promised him that he should be crowned in that city without opposition. The event answered the prediction; and, indeed, from the then situation of affairs, it required no supernatural gift to divine it would. Charles, in his route, received the submission of Troye and Chalons, while the inhabitants of Auxerre followed the example. The citizens of Rheims were no sooner apprized of the king's approach, than they drove out the English garrison, and sent deputies with their keys to Charles, who entered the place in triumph; and in a few days after, viz. Sunday, July 17, was crowned there with great solemnity. As soon as this ceremony was at an end, the Maid of Orleans (for by this name Joan was called, ever after the raising of that siege), very prudently desired leave to retire, affirming that she had now accomplished the design of her mission; but the king was, or seemed to be, unwilling to part with his benefactress, and she was at length persuaded to continue at court, where it was more than probable her presence might be still thought necessary.

During this surprising revolution in the affairs of Charles, the court of Henry in England was again embroiled by the revival of the quarrel between the duke of Gloucester and the bishop of Winchester, whose new dignity of cardinal, while it added both to his power and riches, had rendered him so insolent and overbearing that the duke of Gloucester resolved to check him in his career; and, in order to humble his pride, he made a motion in the council, that he might not be permitted to keep the bishopric of Winchester at the same time with the dignity of cardinal. After a very serious debate on this important point, the assembly, which consisted of most of the peers, spiritual and temporal, decreed, "that, because it was an unknown thing to hold a cardinalship and the bishopric of Winchester in England, they neither durst nor would prejudice the king during his nonage, nor was it their intention to prejudge either him or the church; therefore they request that the cardinal should not appear as bishop of Winchester next St. George's day, at Windsor†." This was a severe stroke to the cardinal's pride; nevertheless, he still retained his temporalities and powers, and he now affected to decline the title of cardinal of Eusebius, under which he first received his hat, and to assume one less foreign in its room, namely that of cardinal of England; and, to console him for his late disgrace, his good friend the pope appointed him his legate in Germany, and general of a crusade against the Bohemian heretics, who were known by the name of Hussites, and of whom we shall have occasion to give a full account in our review of the State of the Church, at the end of the reign of Henry VII.

The cardinal was no sooner invested with this commission, than he applied to the council for leave to raise five hundred lances, and as many thousand archers, for that expedition; and his demand being granted, under certain restrictions and limitations †, he began his levies with great diligence, and they went on with equal success. I cannot help observing here, that it is amazing, at a time when the English were so much distressed in their own interests, they should consent to support so romantic, so ridiculous an enterprize: in the end, however, this step of the council happened to turn to the advantage of the nation.

For when the levies were completed, news came of the loss of the battle of Patay by the English, and the imminent danger in which the duke of Bedford and Henry's affairs were in France. Upon this a council was held, on the first day of July, at Rochester, in which it was proposed to employ the troops, designed for the crusade, in the French war, and they entered into an agreement with the cardinal, who engaged to serve in France, under the duke of Bedford, till the end of December, with the troops of the crusade, provided they were not employed in any siege *. In a few days after this agreement the council received letters from the English regent and council in France, setting forth the successes of king Charles, whom they style the dauphin, desiring a reinforcement might be sent over with all expedition, and in particular earnestly requesting that the young king should, with all convenient speed, be sent over to be crowned in Paris, which, if complied with, might, they thought, remove a great number of inconveniencies they then laboured under †.

But before this last request could be complied with, it was thought proper that Henry should be solemnly crowned in England, which was performed upon the sixth of November, at Westminster, Henry being then in the eighth year of his age: the duke of Gloucester acting as lord high-steward in his own person, and as lord high-chamberlain by his deputy.

The parliament, which was convoked on this occasion, voted that the names of Protector and Defender of the Nation, ought not, from thenceforth to exist, as being inconsistent with the majesty of a crowned head §. And a committee of the lords being sent to acquaint the duke of Gloucester with this resolution, he very readily came into parliament, and expressed his acquiescence in it; but with a salvo to all the pretensions which his brother, the duke of Bedford, might have. The house then voted the king a subsidy on tonnage and poundage, as formerly, and then broke up. We shall now resume the state of affairs in France.

While the English government was employed in making preparations for the king's voyage to France, the duke of Bedford repaired to Picardy, where he intended to wait for the succours from England; and Charles in the mean time made himself master of Soissons, Pervins, Chateau Thierry, Cressi, and several other towns and castles in those parts.

The regent being at length joined by the troops belonging to the cardinal, as also by another body sent from England, under sir John Radcliffe, he found himself enabled, in the beginning of August, to bring near twelve thousand men into the field, at the head of whom he advanced as far as Montereau on the Yonne, and from thence sent a challenge to Charles, who was then at Mont Nangi, offering to give him battle in any indifferent place he should name, to end the war by a general engagement, if it could not be done by a reasonable treaty; but Charles, grown wise by his past misfortunes, forbore hazarding his present successes on so precarious an issue; and he knew the arms of the English too well, to think of attacking them in their trenches: thus the two armies continued to face each other for some days, without either venturing to attack his opponent. At length the duke of Bedford, deceived in his expectations from the impetuosity of the French, and seeing that Charles had the advantage of him by reason of the country being plain and level, which admitted this last to make use of the superiority of his horse, the regent returned back to the Isle of France, in order, by his presence, to keep the towns from revolting, as those of Champagne had done, as also to keep the French nobility in temper, who began to grow tired of a campaign, in which they all served at their own expence.

Charles, on his part, proposed to pass the Seine at Brai, and retire into Berry; but this project being frustrated by an English garrison entering Brai the night before his arrival, Charles crossed the Marne, at Chateau Thierry, and advanced to Dampmartin, the duke of Bedford following him close; but as both sides were determined to run no hazard without an apparent advantage, and la Pucelle, who still attended Charles's camp, varying in her opinion, declaring at one time for, and at another against an engagement, they parted at last without coming to a general action.

Charles returning to Crepi en Valois, made new proposals for bringing the duke of Burgundy over to his interest; but though his ambassadors were received with great respect, and Charles had many advocates among the duke's council, in hopes of preferments and favours, which the ambassadors were very liberal in promising, the negotiation proved unsuccessful. He received, however, the submission of Compeigne, Creil, Pont St. Maizant, Beauvais, and other places; and had he advanced to St. Quintin, Corbie, Amiens, and Abbeville, these towns would likewise have received him with open arms: but the inhabitants of Senlis took arms, and expelling the English garrison, submitted to Charles ||.

It may be easily supposed that these losses must have given the duke of Bedford sensible uneasiness, and the more so, as it was partly in his power to have prevented them; but he had now an alarm from another quarter, whence he least expected it. The constable de Richemont, who had lately retired from the French court, in some disgust with the ministry, being joined by his friend the count de Marche, who had also withdrawn on the same occasion, they both resolved to sacrifice private pique and resentment to the good of their country and the service of their prince; and, uniting their forces, which amounted to about twelve hundred men, over-ran all the country about Evreux, in Normandy, with great success; they even took the strong castle of Galliard, where they found the brave Barbason, the same who had defended Melun against the late king Henry*, and whom they now set at liberty; and this brave officer, second to none in his age, immediately went and joined Charles, and was received by that prince with all the distinction due to his merit. The loss of this place, together with that of Aumale, and some others of importance upon the confines of Normandy, alarmed the duke of Bedford so much, that, leaving two thousand men, under Radcliff, in Paris and recommending the government of the city to Lewis Luxemburg, bishop of Torouanne, Henry's chancellor in France, and Morluer, the provost of Paris, he marched with the main body of his troops to Normandy, to stop the constable's progress there.

Charles thought the absence of the regent a favourable opportunity for making an attempt upon Paris, whither he now marched. Lagni and St. Denis making no resistance, he posted his troops at Montmartre, Aubervilliers, and the neighbouring villages, in hopes of some commotions in the city; but the regent had taken such salutary precautions, that not a man stirred. Disappointed in this respect, he yielded to the continual instances of la Pucelle, who was still in high vogue with the people; and on Monday the twelfth of September, made an assault on the suburbs of St. Honoré: the event proved rather disgraceful to the prophetic talents of the Maid, who was herself wounded in the attack, and the French were repulsed with great loss; upon which Charles, seeing no likelihood of carrying his point, marched off with his troops, and retired into Berry. His departure was probably hastened by receiving news that the regent was about to return from Normandy, which he accordingly did, after having drove the constable out of that duchy; and, soon after his coming back to Paris, recovered, by escalade, St. Denis and Lagni, which very much annoyed that city: Chateau Galliard was also retaken in the month of December.

Before we close the occurrences of this year, it will not be improper to take a view of the conduct observed by the duke of Burgundy, since the revolution in the English affairs. Though this prince had about eight hundred men all this time in the service of England, yet nothing is more certain than that, ever since the siege of Orleans, he had not acted with the same spirit and forwardness in the common cause, as he had shewn before that time: and the event pretty clearly shewed that he had formed other measures. His policy suggested to him, that by assisting the English too powerfully, he might procure himself troublesome masters, as he had already experienced in the affairs of Hainault; and therefore, since he was to have a sovereign, he chose rather to have a prince of his own blood in possession of the throne of France than a foreigner: his own subjects were also greatly prepossessed in favour of the house of Valois. Nevertheless, he carefully concealed his own sentiments, lest both parties should take the advantage of them against him; and he resolved to continue to assist the English, but at the same time to give Charles some hopes that his resentment for the assassination of his father was not insurmountable: in a word, his intent appears to have been to have made his own terms at the expence of the English, though he did not think fit to open himself so early. The duke of Bedford, on his part omitted no means for fixing this important ally; and a conference having been held between them at Paris, in the month of September, they entered into fresh agreements: but, from the effect of that insincerity too common among men, and from which princes in particular are not free, notwithstanding their treaties, they could not trust one another, but lived in continual fear of being deceived, and that either the one or the other would, without scruple, break his engagements upon the prospect of any considerable advantage.

During those busy scenes in France, very little of any importance seems to have passed in England: in short, the principal thing we find done this year in England, was confirming the truce with Scotland, by a meeting of the commissioners from both kingdoms, by which the supplies which king James had stipulated to send to France, were farther delayed†: nor, indeed, did they take place till some years afterwards.

The year 1430 was opened by the duke of Bedford by a fresh negotiation with the duke of Brittany, to whom he resigned all the English pretensions in Poitou. Having thus fixed this prince and the duke of Burgundy in the interest of England, at least for some time, the regent next applied to the duke of Savoy, who was, to appearance, a zealous partizan of the house of Valois; but as that prince was both needy and ambitious, a little money and large promises soon gained him from the French interest; and, together with the prince of Orange, it was agreed that he should attack Charles's dominions on the side of Dauphiné. The prince of Orange was to have Vienne, and all its dependencies, for his share; while the duke was to possess Grenoble and the rest of Dauphiné. Gaucourt, who acted for Charles in those parts, soon had intelligence of this treaty, and managed matters so well, that he surprized the prince of Orange, who was to carry on the enterprize, and cut in pieces his troops, while he himself narrowly escaped being made prisoner; but it was only to see his whole principality and city of Orange fall into the French king's hands.

The revolution of affairs in France gave occasion to great murmurs and complaints in England; and the parliament meeting in the beginning of this year, several warm debates ensued upon this subject. There were not wanting many who accused the generals of negligence and remissness in the execution of their duty; while others ascribed the bad success of the English to the misconduct of the king's council, and particularly to the ambition of the duke of Gloucester, who, by his obstinate prosecution of the war in Hainault, had occasioned such a diversion to the English arms, as had prevented the entire conquest of France, which must have been the certain consequence of the whole strength of England being united.

But what gave rise to the warmest altercations in this assembly, was the opinion of a certain party, who insisted that the untoward situation of affairs on the continent, had been owing to the imprudence of the council in detaining the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon prisoners in England, at a time when, had they been sent home, they would probably have renewed their old quarrels and dissensions with the duke of Burgundy, which had brought so much advantage to the English heretofore; and that prince, having these powerful adversaries to encounter, would have found his interest in assisting the English more heartily than he had done of late: in short, the detaining these two princes captive, had procured France a tranquility destructive to England. It was farther urged by the abettors of this opinion, that it was not yet too late to release them; and that, in the present state of the English finances, their ransoms might afford a reasonable recruit.

This last argument had such weight with the parliament, that nothing but the express desire of the late king could have prevented them from practising an expedient which bore so plausible an appearance. At length it was thought that the government might dispense with the royal restriction, in favour of the duke of Bourbon, who, by a private contract with the late king, had engaged to swear to the peace of Troye, to pay a certain sum by way of ransom, and to deliver his two sons, and two fortresses, as hostages for the performance of his promise; and though Henry V. died before this treaty could be executed, it had been renewed, with some alteration, in 1428, and young Henry, as king of France, received the duke's homage: the treaty was ratified, but some intervening obstacles retarded the duke's release, and, after a captivity of eighteen years, he died at last a prisoner in England, in the beginning of the year 1434.

The parliament was the more disposed to this accommodation, as it would have afforded a fund to defray the expences of the king's voyage to France; but this resource failing, they practised another shift, which answered the purpose: all persons possessed of lands to the value of forty pounds per annum, were summoned to receive the honour of knighthood; the jewels of the crown were pawned; and large sums were borrowed from the towns, corporations, and individuals; and cardinal Beaufort, who accompanied the king, supplied him, on this occasion, with about ten thousand pounds for his use.

Every thing was in readiness for the king's voyage about the beginning of May this year. The duke of Gloucester was named keeper of the kingdom during the royal absence in France, and Henry, with his court, set out for Canterbury, on his way thither; but the English in general were so deeply impressed with the notion of Joan's magic sorcery and diabolical power, that many officers and soldiers, belonging to the forces who were to accompany the young monarch over, deserted before their embarkation; and several of those who had actually crossed the sea, terrified with the accounts they heard of the surprizing achievements of la Pucelle, withdrew privately and returned to England.

Henry arrived on the nineteenth of May at Calais. The council of England had consented to this voyage as a step that was absolutely necessary for retrieving their sovereign's affairs; but thinking his person would be too much exposed at Paris whilst the enemy was strong in the neighbourhood, they insisted on his residing at Rouen, till he might remove to the capital of his French dominions with safety†. Accordingly Henry, instead of marching directly to Paris, after reposing some time at Calais, went to Rouen, where he continued most part of the year.

But this step had almost lost Paris to Henry; for the French interest in that capital, perceiving the affections of the duke of Burgundy's party sensibly cooled towards the English, laid a plan for betraying the city to Charles. The vigilant duke of Bedford, however, who was always on the watch against designs of this nature, having discovered the plot by intercepted letters, and by the confession of the bearer, one hundred and fifty of the conspirators were seized, and many of them executed with great severity. This was done by way of example, to strike terror into others; but, at the same time, it greatly alienated the affections of the Parisians from the duke of Bedford, who thus secured his master's interest at the expence of his own popularity.

Whilst young king Henry was at Rouen, the regent, apprehending that the duke of Burgundy began to lend a favourable ear to the proposals that were incessantly making to him by the emissaries of Charles, endeavoured to attach him more firmly to his interest by yielding to him all the places that the English held in Champagne and Brie; but by this cession the regent knew he should be enabled for some time to stop the progress of Charles, who had carried on his conquests with wonderful rapidity.

The duke thus influenced, entered France at the head of a powerful army; and, after having reduced Torcy and Soissons, he ordered the earls of Suffolk and Arundel to join their troops with his, and to invest Compeigne. This place was defended by Flavi, a brave experienced officer, and provided with whatever could serve to make a long and vigorous resistance. Upon the first news of this enterprize, the Maid of Orleans and Xaintrailles, one of Charles's best generals, threw themselves into the place, which gave new spirits to the garrison.

This happened on the twenty-fifth of May. Next day, which was the last of her liberty, Joan put herself at the head of five or six hundred men, with whom she made so furious a sally upon the quarters of John of Luxemburg, count de Ligny, the Burgundian general, that she drove him from his post; but, in making her retreat into the city, she was intercepted by a party of the English, and, after a most heroic defence, and having her horse killed under her, she was obliged to deliver herself prisoner to the bastard of Vendosme, who immediately gave her up to the Burgundian general*.

The English, long unaccustomed to decisive advantages, looked upon the capture of the Maid in that light: Te Deum was publicly sung at Paris; the duke of Burgundy, and all his chief officers, sent for her, to satiate their curiosity by gazing on the person, before whom they had solately trembled. Luxemburg, whose prisoner she was adjudged to be, sent her to be confined in a castle on his own estate. The garrison of Compeigne, however, still continued to make a gallant resistance under its brave governor, till the latter end of the year, when it was relieved by the count de Vendosme: besides, the army of the besiegers was, during the course of the siege, much weakened by the duke of Burgundy's going off with a large corps, in order to take possession of the duchies of Brabant and Limburg, which had fallen to him by the death of his cousin Philip; and by the sending off another detachment to oppose the Liegeois, who had invaded the county of Namur†.

Nothing could have happened more lucky for Charles than this advantage at that time. It re-animates his party, who thereby saw that his fortune was not fled with the liberty of the gallant Maid. Many places in the neighbourhood of Compeigne surrendered to the French, and Xaintrailles defeated Henry, a Burgundian general, at Germini, where sir Thomas Knyvet, a brave English officer, who had some time before defeated the count de Clermont near Beauvais, was taken prisoner.

The king of England remained all this time at Rouen. The various successes of the war had for some time suspended all talk of his coronation; but the duke of Bedford, who seems to have resided all this summer at Paris, pressed it so warmly, that, about the middle of November, Henry set out for that city, to be crowned, accompanied by the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, and a splendid train of nobility of both nations. The ceremony of the coronation was performed in the church of Notre Dame, on Sunday the seventeenth of December, and was as magnificent as the nature of circumstances would admit; but the cardinal of England was so impolitically ambitious as to place the crown upon his head, to the great disgust of the archbishop of Paris and the French nation in general.

We shall spare our readers the dry and uninteresting detail of the numberless attempts and skirmishes between the troops of Charles and Henry, as they contributed but little to the decision of the general affair. It will, however, not be improper to recount one instance of the deep impression that Joan's pretended inspiration had made upon the minds of the French: a shepherd, in the neighbourhood of Rouen, addressing himself to the marshal de Bouffac, assured him that, by virtue of a revelation from Heaven, he could conduct him through a secret path into the very heart of Rouen; and the marshal communicating the proposal to Xaintrailles, they agreed to embrace the opportunity, which they thought was offered them by Providence. Having, therefore, assembled a body of chosen troops, they followed the shepherd, who conducted them into an ambuscade formed by the English, who destroyed the greater part of their forces, and took Xaintrailles prisoner.

With a view to convince their enemies of the mere mortality of this heroine, but more especially to cure their countrymen of the terrors with which the belief of her supernatural agency had filled their minds, the English generals resolved to leave nothing undone to get her into their power, that, by interesting religion in the case, by proceeding in the forms of the church against heretics, and, by getting her condemned as a forceress and an impostor, they might more effectually answer the end they aimed at, of erasing from the minds of the people the idea of her virtue and divine commission. Accordingly the duke of Bedford demanded her so earnestly of the count de Ligny, that this general could not refuse his request: he required, however, a reward suitable to the importance of such a prisoner; and Joan, being delivered up to the English, was brought to Rouen.

As she had been taken in the diocese of Beauvais, Peter Cauchon, bishop of that city, obtained leave of the chapter of Rouen (the see being vacant) to exercise his jurisdiction there, and proceed against the captive Maid. His request was granted; and, in conjunction with a brother-inquisitor, he began the process, which lasted between four and five months; and being carried on with all the formalities of justice, was approved by the faculties of law and divinity, and in the parliament of Paris. Whether the imagination of this Maiden was really struck with the notion of her being destined to be the deliverer of France, or she had coined her story in order to make a figure in the world, she appeared before her judges with an air of intrepidity that struck all present with awe and admiration: she boldly avowed the designs she had formed against the English; she told them, with an air of confidence as from God, that they should ere long be driven out of France.

Being interrogated about her pretended revelations, and whether she would submit to the judgment of the church in that point? she only answered, "That she was certain they came from God, to whose judgment she would leave the decision; determined not to give them up to any other authority, even though the church should declare them to be illusions." This declining the judgment of the church was made use of, by her examiners, as a sufficient ground to charge her with heresy. When she found these consequences, she would afterwards have submitted to the pope, on condition she might be sent to Rome; but it was not the practice to admit such appeals in cases of heresy, and the proposal was considered as a mere contrivance to gain time for making her escape*: and as she still persisted in the story of her heavenly visitation, she was at length condemned "as a blasphemer against God, and an impious pretender to divine inspiration, and the knowledge of future events; and as an idolater (on account of her kneeling to the saints, angels, or spirits which appeared to her as she pretended), a witch, a heretic, a breaker of the decorum and modesty of her sex, by going in man's apparel, and leading the life of a soldier, and as an impudent impostor; and as such condemned to perpetual imprisonment†.

* As she had before attempted to do, while under the custody of Ligny, by jumping from the top of the tower, where she was confined, down to the ground; but she was so bruised with the fall as not to be able to walk, and was retaken, and put into irons.

† Monstrelet, p. 71. Pasquier Recherches.

While this sentence was reading on a scaffold, erected for the purpose, before the abbey of St. Ouin, in the hearing of a vast concourse of people, Joan interrupted the officer that read it, declaring "That she submitted to the church and her judges; that, since they were of opinion she ought not to maintain her revelations, she should not do so for the future; and that, as the spirit which spoke to her had assured her she should be delivered, she was fully convinced she had been deceived." After which she made and signed a full recantation, in the presence of all the spectators.

She now left off her man's dress, which she could never before be persuaded to lay aside, though tempted by the promise of being admitted to hear mass and to communicate, from which she was debarred whilst she wore it: but as she still discovered a strong inclination to that garb, those who were bent on her ruin having, to tempt her, left a man's suit in the room by her all night, she was found dressed in it next morning, pretending that she had a vision the preceding night, commanding her so to do. The fact being proved, the court met again, and declared her a relapsed heretic, and delivered her over to the secular arm, to be burnt alive; which sentence was executed upon her in the Old Market-place of Rouen, on the thirtieth day of May, 1431.

Such was the end of this famous amazon, la Pucelle, or the Maid of Orleans, whose reputation in point of chastity was never impeached even by her enemies. Her actions were certainly extraordinary, and her courage can never be too much admired, whether it arose from her natural constitution, or was the effect of enthusiasm. The French had such a regard for her memory, that, on a revision of her process, in which, not so much the form, as the substance of the affair was examined, she was, on the seventh of July, 1456, adjudged innocent. Father Daniel tells us, that there were several descendants from her family living in his time, who took the surname of du Lys*.

It cannot be denied that the English, on this occasion, appear to have been actuated by a barbarous policy and bigotted superstition, in thus condemning to death a person, whose noble achievements, in defending the liberty and independence of her country, ought to have recommended her to the esteem of every humane and generous breast: besides, they were guilty of a flagrant act of injustice, in punishing one who, being a native under another government, and taken in fair war, could neither legally be tried by their courts, nor put to death by their award. But it is now time to see what was transacting in England, during the course of this year.

Soon after Henry's departure for the continent, the duke of Gloucester, taking advantage of the cardinal's absence, who had accompanied the king over sea, declared in the council that Winchester intended to quit the king and return to England, to excite fresh troubles in this kingdom, as well as to avail himself of the pope's authority for dissolving his engagement to serve against the French king. This remonstrance met with such credit, that the council published a proclamation, forbidding all the king's subjects, of what rank or condition soever, on pain of imprisonment, to accompany the cardinal, should he leave the king without the royal permission†.

On the eighteenth of November, a truce for one year was concluded at London with the king of Castile, to commence on the first of May, 1431‡.

About the middle of December the ambassadors of England signed, at Edinburgh, in Scotland, a five years truce with that nation, to begin the same day with that made with Castile||.

On the twelfth of January, 1431, a parliament was held at Westminster by the duke of Gloucester, keeper of England, which gave the king one tenth and one fifteenth, and a third of both; a grant of tonnage and poundage for two years, with a subsidy of like value on all merchants strangers, over and above the said tonnage and poundage§, with other grants, and several public acts were also made, which will be found in their proper order under the head of Laws.

When the sinews of war are defective, no great enterprizes can be expected: the most considerable undertaking on the continent this year, was the raising of the siege of Vaudemont by the troops of the duke of Burgundy, who supported Anthony, count de Vaudemont, in his pretensions to the duchies of Lorraine and Barr, as heir male of his uncle Charles, the late duke, in opposition to René of Anjou, who claimed these two duchies as husband to Isabella, daughter to the aforesaid Charles. René and the famous general Barbason rising from before the town which they had beleaguered, met the Burgundians at Sandricourt, and offered them battle, which the others accepting, a bloody engagement ensued, in which the troops of René were routed, himself taken prisoner, and the gallant Barbason left dead upon the field of battle. All the advantages gained by the English consisted in the recovery of Louviers, which had been surprized by Stephen de Vignolles, called la Hire; and in defeating a party of French, near Beauvais, by the earl of Arundel. It is extremely difficult to trace all the rambling encounters which happened at this juncture, or to fix either the times or scenes of action: we must not, however, pass by unnoticed the surprisal of Montargis by the English, through a correspondence they held with a young woman, who prevailed with her lover to admit them into the town by a back gate. On the other side, Loré, a French captain, made an inroad to the very gates of Caen, upon a fair-day, and carried away two thousand persons, with a very great booty: after which he retired to Sellé le Guillaume, a small town in Maine, where he was besieged by the earl of Arundel; but the duke of Alençon suddenly coming to his relief, obliged the English to retire¶.

* There appeared such another extraordinary maid in the last century, in Muscovy. After the suppression of a rebellion against Alexis, father of Peter the Great; amongst the prisoners brought to the general there was a nun, who wore a man's habit, over that of her order.—She had commanded seven thousand men, and shown great bravery on all occasions. Death did not terrify her, though she was condemned to be burnt, for leaving her monastery; and when she went to the place of execution, she said, if every one had behaved as valiantly as herself, the general and his whole army would have been cut to pieces. Mem. of the reign of Peter the Great.

¶ Complete Hist. Rapin. J. Chartier Hist. de Charles VII.

This is all that passed worth notice in France between the two parties. In England, the duke of Gloucester proved successful in quieting some commotions which appeared there during this year. It seems the spirit of the lower people under Tyler and Straw, in the reign of Richard II. was not yet entirely rooted out of the nation; for, soon after the rising of the parliament, numbers of disorderly people assembled near Addington, under one Mandeville, a weaver, and bailiff of the place. This Mandeville took the name of Jack Sharp of Wigmoreland, in Wales; which being the chief manor of the Mortimer family, carries an appearance of some important design being in agitation, though it has not come to our knowledge: it is certain that the duke of Gloucester thought it of so much consequence, that he went down himself, at the head of some troops, and dispersed the insurgents. Their leader, Mandevil, was taken prisoner, and, according to Stowe, from whom we have inserted this transaction, he confessed that the intention of his party was to have destroyed all the priests: upon this confession, and his overt-acts of treason, he was executed as a traitor at Addington, his head was set upon London bridge, and the rest of the principal abettors were put to death in other parts of the kingdom.

Young Henry had, soon after his coronation, left Paris and retired to Rouen, where the duke of Bedford thought him in greater safety; but here he was in danger of being surprized in the night of February 3, 1432. One Peter Audebœuf, a native of Bearne, but in the English service, entered into a plot with one Ricarville, a French officer, to get possession of the city and Henry's person, by introducing Ricarville, with one hundred and twenty men, into the great tower of the castle: and had this small party been supported by a larger corps of troops, which were posted within a league of the place for that purpose, it is more than probable the design would have succeeded; but the officers quarrelling about sharing the booty which they supposed they should find in the place, many of them refused to march, though they had advice of the lucky beginning of their enterprize by the safe introduction of Ricarville and his party, and the whole body returned to Beauvais. Those who had entered the great tower being thus abandoned, were forced to surrender at discretion: Audebœuf, the traitor, was quartered; fifty of the French had their heads struck off, and the rest detained prisoners of war. The French had better success in their attempt upon Chartres, which, on the twentieth of April, was surprized by the count de Dunois, and the garrison, consisting of five or six hundred English, taken prisoners.

The late danger which he had so narrowly escaped alarmed king Henry to such a degree, that he immediately set out for England, and arrived at Dover the middle of February. He was received with great shew of affection by his English subjects: and the first act of his government, after his arrival, was to take the great-seal from the chancellor, the archbishop of York, and give it to the bishop of Bath and Wells: and a parliament being summoned on the ninth of May, the bishop, in consequence of his new dignity, made a speech at its opening. John Russel, esq. was chosen speaker to the commons.

The differences between cardinal Beaufort and the duke of Gloucester appear to have been revived with great bitterness in this parliament. It seems the duke had, as keeper of the kingdom, given orders, some time before, for seizing at Sandwich some of the king's jewels, which were mortgaged to the cardinal, and which the latter intended to carry over with him to France, whither he was going to join the king. The cardinal complained of this to the house as a violent insult offered to his person and property, and prayed that the duke might be obliged to make restitution; but the affair being strictly enquired into, the house made an order, that, before they were restored to him, he should pay the king six thousand pounds more on them, and lend him ten thousand marks besides. The cardinal, who seems now to have been worth more money than almost all the other noblemen of England, submitted to this mulct; and it was moreover ordered, that, if it should appear upon a fair and equitable trial, that the baggage had been justly seized, the money should be forfeited to the king. The cardinal, however, apprehending some other attacks against him from the same quarter, made such interest in the parliament, that the commons were prevailed on to present a petition in his favour, and by which he, the cardinal, obtained an ample pardon, with a Non obstante of all statutes and ordinances, for all the offences and actions he might have been guilty of, either against the king or the state †.

Very little else of moment passed in this parliament, which now proceeded to grant the king a continuance of the subsidy upon wool, tonnage, and poundage: and, before the house broke up, Richard Plantagenet, son to the earl of Cambridge, beheaded in the beginning of the late reign, being now of age, was restored to all the hereditaments belonging to the late Edward, duke of York (slain at the battle of Agincourt), and of Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche; and sir John Cornwall was, by a very honourable patent enrolled in full parliament, created baron of Fanhope ‡.

In the course of this year several skirmishes and surprizes happened between the troops of Charles and those of the regent duke, chiefly to the disadvantage of the latter; but the losses of the English were in some measure repaired by the surprize of Montargis, which facilitated, some time after, the recovery of Pre vins: but, in the month of July, Bedford having laid siege to the town of Lagni on the Marne, with an army of six thousand men, notwithstanding all his vigilance and precaution, the count de Dunois (bastard of Orleans) found means to throw succours into the place; and afterwards marching with all his forces towards Paris, the duke of Bedford, alarmed at this step, and fearing that he might be in private correspondence with the Parisians, raised the siege, and retired with his troops to cover that capital. Here he was mortified by an event that gave the English interest a great blow: his wife Anne, sister to the duke of Burgundy, and the chief means of that harmony and friendship which had hitherto subsisted between them, died on the fourteenth of November, and was buried in the church of the Celestines, in the city of Paris*.

The regent duke had always taken a particular care to keep the duke of Burgundy and the duke of Brittany in the English interest, to which the latter was but very little inclined; and it was purely owing to his fear of not being able to defend himself from the resentment of the English, that he had not long ago quitted their party, and openly sided with king Charles, a step which his brother, the count de Richemont, was incessantly soliciting him to take. The death of Anne of Burgundy dissolved the close connection that subsisted between her brother Philip and the regent duke; and a step which the latter took soon after, helped to bring matters to an open rupture between them. Bedford, being a widower, married, in March, 1433 (not quite four months after the decease of his late duchess), Jaquelina of Luxemburg, a young lady of about seventeen years of age, eldest daughter of Peter of Luxemburg, earl of St. Pol†. This hasty marriage was extremely resented by the duke of Burgundy, who not only considered it as a slight put upon the memory of his sister so lately deceased, but as an affront to himself, it having been done without his knowledge, whereas he thought the duke of Bedford should have shewn him more respect, since, besides the consideration of the many ties by which they were united, he married the daughter of one of his vassals. The duke of Bedford, who was very prudent and circumspect, had doubtless his reasons for acting with such secrecy and reserve: be that as it may, several bitter recriminations were thrown out on this occasion by both sides; and cardinal Beaufort, fearful of the consequences, laboured to make up the quarrel, and prevailed so far upon both parties as to obtain their consent to a conference, in May, at St. Omer's, in order to adjust all differences. The two dukes came to the place appointed, but an unhappy dispute about precedence prevented their reconciliation, and caused them to part extremely disgusted with each other. It seems the conference was to have been held at a third place, and not at either of their houses; the duke of Bedford, however, insisting on the first visit, the other refused to comply with it, though in a town of his own dominions, and that the other was the son, the brother, and uncle to kings, but, above all, the representative of his nephew, who, as king of France, was the duke of Burgundy's master. But the truth seems to be, that the latter had already resolved to desert the English interest, and laid hold of this pretext to break with the regent; though, at the same time, he determined to have it in his power to extort such terms from Charles as he should think proper to prescribe, and for that reason he still continued his hostilities against the French. Thus the war continued to be carried on, not only in Burgundy, where Philip's forces acted alone, but also in Picardy, where they were joined by the English, and where the French had surprized several places: the most considerable of these was St. Valery; but it was afterwards recovered by the earl of St. Pol, the duke of Bedford's new father-in-law, and the lord Willoughby; but the death of St. Pol, who was soon after carried off by a pestilential distemper, which raged this year in all the English part of France, almost ruined the regent duke's best-concerted schemes; for there being no general of eminence to take the command of the troops, the war was left to the conduct of the commanders of garrisons, and produced nothing but depredations, which ruined all the provinces on this side the Loire, rencounters of small parties, and attempts on petty forts, without giving occasion to one remarkable action. It was on this account that the duke of Bedford proposed to king Charles the exchange of the gallant lord Talbot for Xaintrailles; and his offer was accepted. The duke of Bedford could not do without such a general as Talbot, though, to procure him, he was forced to give his equal to the enemy.

If the affairs of the English were upon an ill footing in France, they wore not a much better face in England, where the people began to be heartily tired of the war, and were extremely desirous of procuring a fair and equitable peace, so that there was an universal murmuring throughout the nation, and the parliament granted subsidies with the greatest reluctance. The duke of Bedford had severely felt the effects of this backwardness, and, desirous to carry on the war with such a force as, whilst Charles's affairs were low, might at once clear the provinces on this side the Loire of the enemy, and, by the reputation which such success would give to the English arms, keep the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany firm in their alliances with England, appointed a meeting with the duke of Gloucester at Calais. He expected some comfort, or at least council, at this conference; but Gloucester giving him no hopes of obtaining any aid from England, unless he came over himself, the regent duke, though he could be very ill spared from Paris, was forced to take this step, and set out for England about the middle of June.

On the eighth of July this year, the parliament met at Westminster; and on the thirteenth the duke of Bedford appeared in the house, when he acquainted the assembly, that, however necessary his presence might be in France, the service of his king had required his attendance in England: he then proceeded to give the two houses an account, as well of what had passed of late years in France, as of the present state of that country. His conduct was unanimously approved, and the parliament not only expressed their high opinion of his services in France, but requested him to stay in England, and take the direction of affairs upon himself; with which the duke complied for the present, and actually remained in England till the year 1434.

In the mean time the duke of Orleans, who had, ever since the battle of Agincourt, been a prisoner in England, and who had long solicited his freedom in the most earnest terms, but to no purpose, thought he now found, in the general dispositions of the English towards a peace, a favourable opportunity for recovering that inestimable blessing. As he was indulged with a free correspondence with France, he was perfectly well acquainted with the dispositions both of that court and its enemies. There had lately happened a revolution in Charles's court: Tremouille, the first minister to that prince, having rendered himself obnoxious to the queen and the princes of the blood, they, with his capital enemy, the constable de Richemont, conspired to destroy him: the design took effect; Richemont found means to seize his person at Chinon, where the French court then resided, and caused him to be carried to the strong castle of Mount Trefor, and there shut up. Charles at first appeared greatly enraged at this insult put upon himself in the person of his minister; but soon growing calm, he received Charles of Anjou, count of Maine, as his prime minister; and in a short time the count became a greater favourite than his predecessor.

This change in the French ministry proved of infinite advantage to Charles's affairs. New schemes for peace were now laid, and hopes were entertained, that, if an interview could be brought about between Charles and the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany, these princes might be induced to exert their endeavours for that purpose, or be brought to desert the English, if they continued obstinately bent to prosecute the war. The bringing about this desirable interview was now undertaken by the duke of Orleans, who wisely judged, that if the parties could securely trust each other, they would be all of one mind, and join in ridding their country of an enemy who had lorded it there in the most imperious manner.

To bring about his favorite view, therefore, he, in August this year, gave in a paper of proposals for a general congress towards establishing a peace. He proposed that the queen dowager of Sicily, her son, Charles of Anjou, the duke of Brittany, with his two brothers the counts de Richemont and St. Giles, the duke of Alençon, the counts of Armagnac, St. Foix, Perdrac, and Clermont (son to the duke of Bourbon), and the archbishop of Paris, should meet such plenipotentiaries as the English court should nominate, at Calais; and he desired permission to assist at the congress, in order to enforce the negociation. At the same time he presented a set of articles, which were so favourable for England, that the council embraced his proposal without hesitation*, and he signed, sealed, and swore to the treaty which he had planned: but, notwithstanding, these solemn appearances of truth and real intention on the part of the duke of Orleans, and though safe-conducts were actually expedited by the government of England for the persons who were to assist at the conferences, yet nothing can be more plain than that the whole was, on the part of the duke, an artful juggle, to give his countrymen an opportunity of understanding one another's sentiments, and to divert the council of England from listening to the request of the duke of Bedford, and making preparations for recovering their late losses in France. That this was the real state of the case will clearly appear in the sequel.

In the mean time the affairs of the English went very badly in France, through the absence of the duke of Bedford, who, on his return thither, in the autumn of 1434, found the Lower Normandy in danger of being lost: the peasants, who were utterly ruined by the incursions of parties, having, in the beginning of that year, taken arms to the number of fifty or sixty thousand men. Two thirds of these invaded the Vexin, and the other body of twenty thousand attacked Caen, which, together with Harfleur, Dieppe, and Lillebonne, they soon reduced. The earl of Arundel was so soon informed of this insurrection, that he advanced against those who had fallen into the Vexin, and, attacking them in the night, obtained an easy victory.

It might have been more difficult to reduce those in Caen, as they were headed by the marshal de Rieux, but they were so terrified at the fate of their companions, that they immediately dispersed, and the greatest part of them returned to their own habitations. The marshal, with a few of the most courageous, threw themselves into Dieppe, which, together with Harfleur, was still in the hands of Charles; though Arundel recovered Caen and Lillebonne, and afterwards marched against the French in Picardy, who had taken the strong town of Rue: but being informed on his way, that the enemy was fortifying Gerberoy, near Beauvais, he thought it more adviseable to drive them thence before the works could be completed. Accordingly he appeared before that place; but hearing that la Hire and Xaintrailles were approaching with twelve hundred men to its relief, he raised the siege, and marched to meet them in order of battle, when a bloody dispute ensued. Sir Ralph Standish, with about one hundred horse, were cut in pieces at the first onset; and three culverins, which la Hire had brought into the field, did such execution, that of five hundred horse which the earl had with him, two hundred were killed, and one hundred and

* These were of so very extraordinary a nature, that it would be unpardonable in us not to give our readers a sight of them. The paper is worded in the most abject terms, for he there calls Henry "his lawful Lord of France," and gives Charles no other title but that of the dauphin.

I. He proposes that the king of England and France should send commissioners with full powers to treat of a peace; and that the queen dowager of Sicily, &c. as above.

II. He, the said duke, proposes, if the peace should take place, to continue for a year after its commencement a prisoner within England; after which time he is to be set at liberty without any ransom, upon his swearing fealty, homage, and allegiance to Henry, as true king of France and England, and never to recognize any other person or family in that capacity, and to fight for him to death against all living, and to bring all his tenants and subjects to do the same, under grievous penalties; but if they should agree to this, they were to enjoy all the benefits stipulated by the treaty of Troye.

III. He promises the same for his friends, the duke of Alençon, the earl of Armagnac, the earl of Perche, and his own brother the earl of Angoulême; and likewise to employ all his good offices with his friends who had dominions without France, such as the dukes of Milan and Savoy, to acknowledge Henry as king of France, and to enter with him into a firm league and friendship.

IV. In case the peace should not take place, he offers to put into the hands of the English the cities of Orleans and Blois, with all the forts and possessions belonging to his own family; and likewise to procure them the possession of an infinite number of other places, not immediately depending upon himself, particularly Rochelle and Mount St. Michael, with Lisieux, Xaintes, Bourges, Chinon, Poitiers, Tournay, &c. or an equivalent for them all, except the two first-mentioned, which were to be delivered up without admitting an equivalent; and that if, in the mean time, king Henry should please to confer on him any estate or post in England, he was, in like manner, ready to swear homage, fealty, and allegiance to him.

V. In case a general peace should not be concluded, he, the said duke of Orleans, agrees, for the greater security of performing his promises, to re-deliver himself a prisoner in England until all his engagements should be fulfilled, unless the king and council of England should find it expedient for their service to give him leave, under the great-seal, to depart from England.

In another article he supposes the dauphin (as he affects to call king Charles) would be contented with an honourable and considerable appenage, or provision, for him and his heirs; which was the very thing the English aimed at in the negociation: and there cannot be a clearer proof than this very article, that the duke of Orleans was in concert with the court of France to impose upon England; for can it be supposed that Charles ever would entertain a thought of being satisfied with the above appenage in lieu of a crown and kingdom, to which he had an undoubted right? This hope, therefore, was insinuated only to cause the English the more readily to fall into the snare. Rymer's Fœdera, vol. x. p. 556—559.

fifty taken prisoners. As to Arundel himself, he was mortally wounded and taken prisoner, and in a few days expired; to the great sorrow of the duke of Bedford, who in him lost one of his bravest generals, and England one of the most accomplished of her noblemen.

But the loss of this great man was in some measure supplied by the services of the gallant lord Talbot, who arrived about the latter end of the summer from England, with four or five thousand men, to whom he joined some troops drawn from garrisons; and being joined by the marshal de Lisle Adam (whom Henry had made marshal of France), at the head of about three thousand troops, he recovered Crespi in the county of Valois, Beaumont on the Oyse, Creil, Pont St. Maixence, and Clermont in the Beauvoisis, which had been surprized by the French: he even began the siege of Beauvais, but the bad weather obliged him to desist. During these petty excursions Charles went into Languedoc and Dauphiné*.

This year died the duke of Bourbon, a prisoner in England, being succeeded by his son, the earl of Clermont, in his honours and estate. This prince had ever continued zealously attached to the French interest; and, putting himself at the head of a formidable body of troops, he made a terrible irruption into the duke of Burgundy's estates; and his progress was so rapid, that, before that duke could get together an army to drive him out of his dominions, he laid waste with fire and sword great part of the open country, and surprized many of the towns. Upon notice of this, the duke of Bedford altered the destination of certain troops, which were to have besieged Manche, and ordered them to march, under the lord Willoughby, to the assistance of the duke of Burgundy. It was not long before they came up with the main body of the French, at Lyonnois, and, after an obstinate encounter, the English and Burgundians remained masters of the field.

The duke did not fail to lay hold of this opportunity to represent, in very warm terms, to the council of England, this invasion on his territories as the effect of the great load he was obliged to take of the war through their inactivity, and which extremely exhausted his subjects: in short, he began to shew himself greatly discontented; he complained of the duke of Bedford as having treated him disrespectfully in the affair of his marriage. His violent aversion to Charles, on account of the murder of his father, began now to abate; and having, in pursuit of his vengeance, done enough to satisfy his honour, by reducing France more than once to the brink of ruin, he was not averse to a reconciliation with Charles, and no longer to persist in setting a foreign family on the throne, even to the exclusion of himself and his blood. In this disposition he lent a willing ear to a proposal made him by the constable Richemont, of a conference at Nevers, under pretence of adjusting matters between him and the count de Clermont, now duke of Bourbon. Accordingly, in January, 1435, the two dukes and the constable repaired to Nevers: the latter and the duke of Bourbon were accompanied by their wives, who were Philip's sisters; and this conference finished the work, and determined him to drop his resentments, and make peace with France. But there was, however, no pretence in decency for breaking off the proposed conferences at Calais; and this might greatly have embarrassed the duke in his newly adopted views, had not the council of Basil, which was then sitting, interposed; for the cardinal of St. Croix, who had some time before been sent by that council to labour for an accommodation between France and England, now received fresh instructions to continue and redouble his efforts; and, under colour of his authority, it was resolved that the conferences for a general peace should be held at Arras instead of Calais. In the mean time, however, the French court had intrigued so well, that the duke of Burgundy, in a meeting he had with the archbishop of Rheims, chancellor of France, and others of Charles's ministers, put the final hand to a separate agreement with that monarch; but this was to be kept a profound secret till the event of the congress of Arras should be known; and, the more effectually to cover their designs, they seemed impatient to fix a day for opening the congress, which was accordingly appointed for the month of July; and notices were sent to the council of Basil, and to almost all the powers of Europe, not even excepting the court of England, to send their plenipotentiaries to assist at the negotiation, which, it was said, was intended not only to close the wounds of France, but to restore peace to the Christian world.

In a word, the duke of Bedford and the government appear to have been completely duped in this affair, and not to have entertained the least doubt of the duke of Burgundy's sincerity: this is clearly evinced in that, when they came to nominate their plenipotentiaries at the approaching congress, they put the duke at the head of the commission: this, indeed, laid that prince under a difficulty how to act, both as a plenipotentiary for England, and a principal contracting party in the negotiation; but this difficulty he got partly over by the instructions which he gave to his commissioners, who appeared there for him as duke of Burgundy: on the whole it must be confessed, that this prince acted a very treacherous part through the whole affair.

A little before the opening of the congress, the English council received intelligence that the duke of Burgundy had solicited pope Eugenius to absolve him from the oath which he had taken to the late king Henry. Eugenius being applied to on this subject, declared that the French prince had not made any such demand; and that, for the future, he would observe such conduct as would be satisfactory to the king of England. How religiously his holiness observed his promise will appear by the sequel.

The congress of Arras was not opened till the sixth of August, though the first of July was the day appointed, all the plenipotentiaries not being arrived at that time. Those on the part of Henry were partly English and partly French, as Henry treated in quality of king of both people: the English commissioners (besides the duke of Burgundy, as chief) were the bishops of Norwich and St. David's, the earls of Huntingdon and Suffolk, the lord Hungerford, Lyndwood, the famous canonist, keeper of the privy-seal, sir John Radcliffe, constable of Guienne, sir John Popham, sir Robert Shott-borough, secretary Reynel, with the doctors Everard, Ruffel, and Sprevor, all of them civilians*.

The chief of those for Charles were the duke of Bourbon, the count de Richemont, constable of France; the count de Vendôme, great-master of the household; Renaud of Chartres, archbishop of Rheims and chancellor of France; Christopher d'Harcourt, and Gilbert de la Fayette, marshal of France.

Those for the duke of Burgundy were, Rolin, his chancellor; the bishops of Liege, Cambray, and Arras; the duke of Gueldres; the counts of Estampes, St. Pol, de Ligny, Vaudemont, Nevers, Nassau, Montfort, Magie, and some others.

The kings of Poland, Castile, Navarre, and Sicily, the dukes of Brittany, Barr, and Milan sent likewise their ambassadors, as the city of Paris and the great towns of Flanders did their deputies. The conferences were to be held under the mediation of the cardinal of St. Croix, who assisted as representing the pope, and the cardinal of Cyprus, who appeared on the part of the council of Basil. In short, no fewer than ten thousand people extraordinary repaired to Arras on this occasion†.

The conferences were begun by the duke of Burgundy, as first plenipotentiary for England: he demanded of the French commissioners the terms they were instructed to proceed upon, in writing; which they accordingly gave in, and were to the following purpose:

"That Henry should lay aside his style of king of France, and renounce, for himself and his heirs, all claim to that crown; and also that he should give up Paris, and all the places he held in other parts of the kingdom: in consideration of which he should enjoy what he actually possessed in Guienne, together with the entire duchy of Normandy, but on condition of swearing homage and doing fealty to Charles, as king of France, for those territories, agreeable to the ancient usage."

The English plenipotentiaries were next called upon to give in their proposals, which were,

"That Charles should be left in peaceable possession of all he already held on both sides the Loire, on condition that the English should retain the like possession of all they held in France; but that to prevent any future differences, the places of the one power that lay in the heart of the other's possessions, should be exchanged for the like places to be given up by the other power, or for some other equivalent." They likewise offered, "That their king should marry a daughter of Charles; and that the duke of Orleans should be set at liberty for a moderate ransom."

The conferences on the subject did not last long; the French not receding from their demands, and the English absolutely rejecting them as so remote from what the duke of Orleans had made them expect, all farther proceedings towards a peace between the two crowns were stopped, and the English plenipotentiaries (all but the duke of Burgundy), with all their retinue and attendance, left Arras on the sixth of September, and proceeded to Calais, from whence they sent the duke of Orleans over to England; for the English had been so far imposed upon by that prince, that they had actually brought him with them to Calais, hoping that his presence, and the reflection of his captivity, might have a great influence with the French commissioners in the prosecution of the negotiation; but this step had a very contrary effect, for the duke underhand wrote to his countrymen, encouraging them not to abate aught of their demands, nor to suffer his confinement in the least to influence their proceedings.

The hasty departure of the English plenipotentiaries was by no means a subject of surprize either to the duke of Burgundy or the French ambassadors; they must have foreseen that the offers they made, would be refused; nay, it may very reasonably be presumed, that it was for this very purpose they projected the plan of a congress for a general peace, well knowing that the English would reject the conditions they meant to propose, and their refusal would furnish the duke of Burgundy with a pretext for concluding a separate accommodation: and here we may learn the true motives of the magnificent offers made by the duke of Orleans to the king of England, in case the conferences should prove ineffectual.

Agreeable to this plan, on the English plenipotentiaries quitting the congress, their abrupt departure was exaggerated, and represented as a clear evidence they never intended to make peace; and the duke of Burgundy now openly declared, that he was not obliged to be governed by their humour, or render the war everlasting for their sake, but thought himself at full liberty to act for his own own interest; and, by the assistance of the mediating cardinals, the accommodation between him and Charles was very quickly finished, for on the twenty-first of September (only fifteen days after the departure of the English ambassadors), the cardinals having previously absolved the duke from the oath he had taken to the late and present kings of England, concluded a separate treaty of peace with France, on the following terms.

"I. That king Charles, though he excused himself from the murder of the duke of Burgundy, his father, yet he should make satisfaction for his death, by punishing all that were found guilty of it, if they could be discovered and apprehended, by death; if not, by perpetual banishment: and should build a church in Montberras, with a monastery of twelve monks and a superior, which he should endow with a sufficient maintainance, to pray for his soul for ever.

"II. That king Charles should pay to the duke of Burgundy fifty thousand crowns, for the jewels that were taken from his father at the time of his death; and should have liberty to recover those that were not named, particularly the fleece, which was of a very great value, from any in whose possession they were found.

"III. That the following countries, cities, and towns, with all their pre-eminences and jurisdictions, should be immediately delivered up to Philip, duke of Burgundy, and settled on him and his heirs, whether male or female, viz. Mafon in Xaintoinge, the city of Auxerres, with the jurisdiction of Barr up the Seine, the city of Castel, with the lay patronage of the church and abbey of Leuxeule, pretended to, but never possessed by the dukes of Burgundy before, the cities of Montidier, Peron, St. Quintin, Corbie, Amiens, and Abbeville, the county of Ponthieu and Poictou, with the outbounds of Champagne.

"IV. That,

“IV. That, in case the king of England should make war upon the duke of Burgundy and his subjects, king Charles should assist him both by sea and land, as in his own cause, and should not make peace with him, unless he concluded him in it: and that, if king Charles should not fully keep to his agreement, his own subjects should not be bound to obey him; but being free from all oaths of allegiance to him, might assist the duke of Burgundy against him.

“V. That Charles, count Charlerois, son to duke Philip, should marry the lady Catherine, king Charles's daughter, and have with her in portion one hundred and twenty thousand crowns†.”

The princes of the blood in France, and the noblemen of Burgundy, ratified this agreement under their hands and seals; and, on the fifth day of November, it was confirmed by the council of Basil, which denounced sentence of excommunication and interdict against that prince who should infringe the articles. Never had king of France made so dishonourable a peace; but it seems as if the French court thought nothing too much to bring the duke of Burgundy off from his alliance with England, as the surest means to extricate Charles from his difficulties.

If the defection of the duke of Burgundy was an unlucky incident for the English interest in France, it received a still more fatal blow, and almost at the same instant, by the death of the duke of Bedford, which happened this year, on the fourteenth of September, in the castle of Rouen. Very probably his indignation to be thus imposed upon by Charles and the duke of Burgundy, and his foreseeing that the affairs of his nephew were going to be irretrievably ruined, helped to throw him into the sickness of which he died. We have already given the character of this prince; and shall only add, that it is hard to say, whether he shone most in the field or the cabinet, whether he was a greater hero or politician, and whether he was most esteemed or admired for his valour, his equity, or his moderation. There cannot be a greater proof of the veneration in which the memory of this excellent prince was held, even by his enemies, than the reply which Lewis XI. son of Charles VII. gave to one of his courtiers, who advised him to demolish the monument of Bedford*: “God forbid (said Lewis) that I should be guilty of such a base and ungenerous action, as to disturb the ashes of a prince, who, were he alive, would make the boldest of us all tremble; I rather wish that a more stately monument were erected to his memory||.”

About the same time died Isabella, queen dowager of France, at Paris, very little lamented by the French, who considered her as the principal cause of all those miseries and calamities with which the kingdom had been so long oppressed.

The death of the regent, as we have already observed, was a terrible blow to the English interest in France; and the misfortune was made still greater by the squabbles of parties in the council of England, which caused a delay of seven months, in a juncture where a moment was not to be lost, before they could agree in the choice of a successor. The French found their advantage in this delay; and the garrison of Pontoise going out to forage, the townsmen rose, seized the place, and applied for assistance to the marshal de Lisle Adam, who, taking upon him the government of the town, delivered it afterwards to Charles VII. and was confirmed by him in that charge, as well as in the dignity of marshal of France. This general had never been hearty in the service of the English; and though young Henry had created him constable of France, yet he gladly embraced the first opportunity of returning to his allegiance to his lawful sovereign. The marshal de Reux, who had thrown himself into Dieppe, getting an army of eight or ten thousand men together, before the end of this year, reduced Feschamp and Mortvilliers, with all the towns and castles in the Upper Normandy, except Arques and Caudebec.

All these misfortunes, which were but so many preludes to far greater ones, struck a deadly damp into the minds of the English. A parliament had been assembled, on the tenth of October this year, at Westminster, in which the bishop of Bath and Wells, lord chancellor of England, in his speech at the opening of the session, gave the members a particular detail of the negotiations at Arras, in which he represented the conduct of the duke of Burgundy in the blackest colours; and the nation was so exasperated at the news of that prince's defection, that they voted a large subsidy for carrying on the war, and to punish the faithless conduct, as it was termed, of the duke of Burgundy‡.

Mean time the duke, willing to shew still some regard for Henry, sent two heralds with letters, to excuse his concluding a separate peace, in which he declared it was through no disaffection to the English that he had taken that step, but to comply with the earnest wishes and remonstrances of his harassed people, sinking beneath the load and calamity of so long a war; and concluded with exhorting Henry to enter into the like pacific sentiments, and conclude a peace upon just and moderate terms, offering his mediation between him and Charles for that purpose. This offer was looked upon as a fresh insult; besides, it was observed that the superscription of his letters was now in a different style to that he was wont to use; for whereas he had before always directed to Henry as his sovereign lord and king of France and England, he now only gave him the appellation of “Henry, by the grace of God king of England, our well beloved cousin§.” It was resolved to return no answer to his letters; his heralds were treated with indignity; the parliament even took no precaution to conceal their indignation from the public; and the populace getting a hint of the affair, the mob rose in London, and fell upon the Flemings and others of the duke of Burgundy's trading subjects then in that city, killing some and plundering others, till a proclamation was issued to stop those disorders, and protections were granted to such as, being settled in England, would take the oath of allegiance; but those who would not, were immediately expelled. This step had a great effect, for most of the Flemish, or Brabanders, settled here, immediately naturalized themselves Englishmen†.

The duke of Burgundy, after the treatment his ambassadors and subjects had met with, thought he had no measures to keep with the English court; and, to give Charles an earnest of his sincerity, he corrupted the English commanders of Vincennes and Corbeil to betray them into his hands, and immediately resigned them into those of the French king. Several towns in Normandy also revolted to the French, and these conquests paved the way to the reduction of Paris itself.

Nothing could give a greater reputation to king Charles's affairs than reducing the capital of his realm; but his finances not being in a condition to support so large an army as was necessary to besiege it in form, the only way left of succeeding in the enterprize was to amuse the court of England with fresh proposals, while he might find means to establish some intelligence within the place, so as to surprize it before the English could be upon their guard. With this view he made overtures of peace to Henry in the beginning of the year 1436, and offered to confirm it by giving that monarch the eldest daughter of France in marriage; and, amazing as it may seem, notwithstanding the court of England had so lately, and with so much haughtiness, rejected all terms with France, and when they could not be ignorant of the dispositions which Charles and the duke of Burgundy were taking to drive the English entirely out of France, they listened so attentively to this proposition, that Henry even named the duke of York and some others as his plenipotentiaries to treat of a peace; nay, he likewise named for his commissioners to conclude the marriage, the cardinal of England and the duke of Burgundy, with whom he was actually at war*. Let others account for this glaring contradiction, in the best manner they are able; I must confess myself utterly at a loss herein, and should look upon it as incredible, did it not stand as a fact vouched upon the face of our records.

This inconsistency or fluctuation in the English councils, however, regained to Charles his capital and his crown; for while his agents, in concert with the duke of Orleans and the count d'Armagnac, were amusing Henry's court, he dispatched the constable de Richemont, the marshal Lisle Adam, and the count de Dunois, to attempt the great and decisive conquest, which he had so much at heart. Corbeil and Vincennes had been already betrayed into the hands of those generals; and they now made themselves masters, by the like treacherous artifices, of Escouan and St. Denis; so that Paris was in a manner blocked up, and its supply of provisions greatly straitened: it is true, that the constable's troops did not amount to above six thousand men, even after he had been joined by a body of five hundred lances sent by the duke of Burgundy; but the French generals found means to procure such exact intelligence from within the place, that, with this handful, they proceeded to the reduction of it.

The lord Willoughby at this time commanded for Henry in Paris: he had no more English regular troops within the place than fifteen hundred, so that he was obliged to depend upon the French-English (or rather Burgundian) party among the citizens themselves to guard the gates. It was by the help of this party that Lisle Adam had surprized the place, about fifteen years before, for the English; to them therefore he secretly applied on this occasion; and finding the sole difficulty they had as to their giving up the city, was left Charles, if successful, should punish them severely for their long disloyalty, the marshal, who had foreseen this objection, and wisely provided against it, produced an act of amnesty under Charles's own hand, and guaranteed by the duke of Burgundy, stipulating a full pardon, and restitution of all their privileges, to the Parisians. This satisfied the conspirators, and they undertook to let him into the town, early in the morning of Friday, the thirteenth of April, by the gate of St. Michael.

On the day appointed, Lisle Adam, with a chosen party, scaled the walls, by ladders let down by those within; at the same time another party let down the draw-bridge, that the constable might enter with all his forces. The alarm soon spread, the English took to arms immediately, and Willoughby, with a wonderful presence of mind, gave such orders, that the constable would have been driven out of the city; but the French and Burgundian parties joining in his favour, drew chains across the streets, and rose in every quarter, and while the garrison endeavoured to repel the assailants, they were overwhelmed with a shower of stones from the windows and battlements of the whole city, echoing with repeated acclamations of "Long live king Charles VII. and the duke of Burgundy!"

The governor, unable to oppose such a multitude of enemies, retired to the Bastile, where he might have defended himself for a considerable time, had it been properly furnished with stores and ammunition; but finding it destitute of every thing necessary for sustaining a siege even of a short continuance, he capitulated a few days after, upon condition of being allowed to retire unmolested, with his garrison and their baggage, to Rouen‡. St. Germain and Charenton soon followed the fate of the capital.

Upon the death of the duke of Bedford, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, was nominated to the regency of France; but Edmund Beaufort, third son of John Beaufort, earl of Somerset (by an unaccountable mistake, in all our historians called duke of Somerset, though no such title then existed§), and himself earl of Mortaigne in Normandy, and lord of Chirkland in the Marches of Wales, contested with him that dignity; and having gotten the duke of Gloucester on his side, they managed their intrigues with such art in the council, that the expediting of the duke's patent was delayed from time to time, which had given the patrizans of Charles in France leisure to extend their conquests without opposition; but the loss of Paris seems to have awakened the council of England out of the lethargic disposition which had made them hitherto so shamefully neglect the affairs of France, and to have convinced them of the necessity of prosecuting the war there with vigour; at the same time certain intelligence arriving, that the duke of Burgundy was meditating a great blow upon some other of the capital possessions of the English in that country, the cardinal of Winchester, who had warmly espoused the cause of the duke of York, at length prevailed to have the seals put to a commission, appointing him the king's lieutenant-general in France †, notwithstanding all the opposition of the duke of Gloucester; and the duke of York set out for France with an army of eighty thousand men; but these unhappy disputes had so much retarded the public service, that he did not arrive in that kingdom till the middle of May, when he landed in Normandy, where he recovered many small places and castles, which the French had taken since the death of the duke of Bedford. While he was thus employed, he received intelligence that the duke of Burgundy was making great preparations for the siege of Calais; in consequence of which he wrote over to the council in England, pressing them to put that place in a posture of defence. Nothing could alarm the court of England more than this news: orders were immediately issued for equipping a fleet and army, the former to be commanded by the earl of Huntingdon (John Holland), and the latter by the duke of Gloucester, who, on this occasion, obtained from Henry, as king of France, a grant for life of the county of Flanders; as John, lord Beaumont, did that of Boulogne.

In the mean time the duke of Burgundy, glowing with resentment to find his good offices, towards bringing about a peace, so contemptuously treated by the English, had been continually endeavouring to distress Henry all he could; and having assembled the states of his dominions, before whom he laid the proceedings and practices of the English court in the most odious lights, he at length prevailed with that ever fickle people to resolve upon entering heartily into a war with England, and to begin by forming the siege of Calais. He had drawn together an army of fifty thousand men, of which seventeen thousand were inhabitants of Ghent, and with these he surprized the castles of Oye, Marque, Sangate, and other fortresses of importance about Calais.

Before this last place he sat down about the latter end of June, with his numerous army. The Flemings fancied that they should have little more to do than shew themselves, and that the garrison would be terrified into an immediate surrender; but they soon found their mistake. The besieged made a most gallant defence, the place was well supplied with all necessaries, and the besiegers found themselves most terribly harassed by the successful and well-conducted sallies of the enemy. Philip, who hoped to acquire immortal fame by taking of one of the strongest places in Europe, began to perceive with regret, that the attempt was beyond his power; however, as he knew that the duke of Gloucester was daily expected to the relief of the place, he resolved to omit nothing to prevent their succours from entering, and ordered five or six great hulks, loaded with stones, to be sunk at the mouth of the harbour, to choak up the entrance; but these vessels lying aground on the sands at low-water, the people of Calais, when the tide was out, found means to burn them, and otherwise render them useless.

The design of blocking up the port by sea thus miscarrying, a small wooden fort was erected on the land-side, and well supplied with cannon and other military engines, to batter the place, and hinder the sallies of the besieged: this was taken by the English, and the Flemings, who guarded it, all put to the sword. In the mean time the duke of Gloucester arrived, with about fifteen thousand men: he found the garrison in so high spirits, and saw such manifest signs of fear in the approaches of the besiegers, that he immediately sent a messenger to the duke of Burgundy, offering him battle. The latter accepted the challenge, as the only chance he now had for success, despairing of ever being able to carry the town; but his boastful Flemings had experienced too much of the English valour to dare to meet it, even with superior numbers, in the field: they pretended they were betrayed, the place not being invested by sea, as they had been assured it would; in a word they shamefully broke up their camp, and made a most precipitate retreat. Philip, fearing that the garrison of Calais might take advantage of the confusion caused by this sudden desertion, drew up his regular troops to secure their retreat; and, leaving his artillery, baggage, and provisions in the hands of the English retired to Gravelines*.

The duke of Gloucester, having provided for the security of Calais, marched, with about ten thousand men, into the very heart of Philip's county of Artois, burning and destroying all before him, and taking great plunder; but, for want of provisions, he was forced soon after to return back to Calais. Nor was this the only loss that the duke of Burgundy sustained: hardly had he returned to his own dominions, when he had the mortification to see the maritime coasts of his possessions in Flanders ravaged by an English fleet, while he himself was even in danger of losing his life in a sedition at Bruges, after having seen the marshal Lisle Adam almost torn in pieces by the furious populace †.

This year Margaret, princess of Scotland, daughter of James I. who, the reader may remember, was affianced some time before to the dauphin of France, Lewis, having now completed her twelfth year, was sent over to France, and the marriage was celebrated with the utmost pomp, on the fourteenth of June, at Tours.

The truce between England and Scotland expiring much about the same time, hostilities were recommenced between the two nations. The earl of Northumberland, with the other lords of the Marches, invaded Scotland, but were encountered, at a place called Pepperden, by William Douglas, earl of Angus, and some other Scottish noblemen, when, after an obstinate engagement, victory fell to the Scots, who routed the English, killing fifteen hundred of their men, and taking above four hundred prisoners; while their own loss did not amount to more than two hundred in all. English council being apprized of the intended passage of the princess Margaret over to France, fitted out a fleet, which was stationed in the Channel in hopes to intercept her; but the Scottish squadron, sailing round by the Western Isles, escaped the enemy's cruisers, and landed their precious charge safely at Rochelle.

In the beginning of the year 1437 died queen Catherine of Valois, widow of Henry V. at the end of whose reign we have given an account of this lady's second marriage, the descendants from which afterwards sat on the throne of England. This princess was followed by Joan of Navarre, the other queen dowager of England, relict of Henry IV. beside whom her remains were interred; a proof that, before her death, she had got the better of the aspersion that had been cast upon her conduct and loyalty to the royal family.

Early this year a parliament was held at Westminster, who made several regulations for the benefit of the marine and trading interest; and provided for the farther security of Calais, in consequence of a representation from the duke of Gloucester, governor of that place, setting forth the danger it was in, and protesting in form, that the loss thereof should not be imputed to him, if its preservation was not attended to in time. In this parliament likewise sir Richard Woodville, a gallant young soldier, and who had been captain or deputy-governor of Calais, owned his marriage with Jaqueline of Luxemburg, duchess dowager of Bedford, which having been contracted without the king's licence, the bridegroom was obliged to pay a thousand pounds fine for that, and to obtain livery of her dowry; but he was afterwards (in the twenty-sixth year of this reign) created earl of Rivers by patent. The remarkable acts of this parliament will be found in their proper place: taking leave of the civil, we will now proceed to the military transactions of this year.

The two parties in France passed the greatest part of this year in daily inroads and surprizes upon each other, unchecked by the severe cold of the early part of the season; for the brave and indefatigable Talbot found means to turn this very circumstance to the advantage of his master's arms. Having undertaken to surprize Pontoise, he effected his design by a stratagem worthy of his military genius: knowing that the ditches of the place were frozen, and the country all about being covered with snow, he ordered a large body of his men to march by night, with white cloths over their armour; and coming before day to the foot of the walls, he made them lay down in the ditch, where they could not be distinguished from the snow with which it was filled: the centinels being to be relieved at day-break, the English, on hearing the garrison's drums, clapped their scaling-ladders to the wall, and entered the place so suddenly, that neither the garrison nor Varambon, the governor, had time to make the least defence, but took to precipitate flight for their own safety. The taking of this important post enabled the English to waste the country and make incursions to the very gates of Paris, to the great annoyance of that capital.

The garrison of Crotoy, which was commanded by sir John Standish, encouraged by the success of Talbot, committed the like ravages in the adjacent parts of Ponthieu, and greatly harrassed Abbeville and other towns, belonging both to Charles and the duke of Burgundy; this made the latter resolve to lay siege to Crotoy in person: he accordingly sat down before it with about ten thousand of his best troops, but had the mortification to find his project baffled; for the duke of York, after having reduced Tancarville, Beauchatel, and Materville, detached the lord Talbot with a body of five thousand men, to relieve the place; and this experienced general, having passed the Somme at Blauquetaque, without opposition, advanced to Crotoy with so much resolution and good order, that the duke thought proper to decamp, and suffer him, without resistance, to supply the place with all necessaries, and even to ravage the neighbourhood for some days, after which the English general went and joined the regent's army in Normandy.

In the mean time Charles, after having spent the conclusion of the preceding year in celebrating the marriage of his son Lewis, the dauphin, with the princess of Scotland, in assembling the states of Languedoc, and in settling matters in his other provinces south of the Loire, made preparations for marching to Paris, which he had not yet honoured with his presence. Accordingly, getting together an army of six thousand men, he advanced to Brai, a town on the river Seine, and, after having taken Chateau Landon, Charni, Nemours, and some other English garrisons that lay in his way, he invested Montereau sur Yonne, a post of consequence as interrupting the communication of the county of Gatinois with Champagne and Burgundy.

This garrison was commanded by sir Thomas Gerard, a brave English officer, who made a gallant defence, though his numbers in the place did not amount to more than four hundred men. Hitherto Charles had not been remarkable for his personal courage, but on this occasion he performed such noble exploits as greatly surprized his friends, and his enemies: having, after a long siege, given orders for a general assault, he was the first who jumped into the ditch, where the water came up to his middle, and was the first who mounted the walls; and so greatly were his men animated by his example, that the town was taken sword in hand. After this conquest, by which he acquired great reputation, Charles went to Melun, having sent the constable Richemont to dispose things for his entry into Paris, where he arrived in person on the fourteenth of November this year, and was received with the warmest expressions of loyalty and joy; while he, on his part, seemed to forget that the city had ever shut her gates against him. His first care was to re-establish the parliament and courts of justice there, and to provide for the future good government of the city. But a stop was put to these salutary regulations; for a terrible famine, followed by a pestilence, broke out among the impoverished and long-harrassed inhabitants, which carried off such numbers as rendered it unsafe to live within the walls; and the king and court leaving the city, with the greatest part of the remaining people, it became a perfect desert.

But France did not alone experience calamities; England was rent by factions: the Somerset party

at that court, sworn enemies to the duke of York, of whom they had conceived a jealousy, founded upon reasons of blood, had intrigued so effectually against him, that he was recalled from the government of France this year, and Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, was appointed Henry's lieutenant-general in that kingdom. The old feuds between the cardinal and the duke of Gloucester were also revived, with the most rancorous animosity: the latter was indefatigable in attacking him wherever he lay open; and the other entrenched himself deep behind repeated general pardons from the crown for all treasons or trespasses he might be guilty of. Gloucester had ever been a strong opposer of the release of the duke of Orleans, and the dying charge of the late king gave his opposition no small weight; but, notwithstanding, the cardinal-bishop, glad of any opportunity to humble his antagonist, even though at the expence of his country's interest, lent a favourable ear to the proposal made him by Charles, for bringing about the ransom of the duke of Orleans, as the only person whose merit and rank could balance the credit of a party which, to Charles's infinite regret, he saw daily increasing in his court, and of which his own son, the dauphin, a young man of a restless and ambitious disposition, was at the head, and had engaged the dukes of Alençon and Bourbon, with the counts de Vendôme and Dunois (the famous bastard of Orleans), to enter into his counsels and designs. Accordingly we find, at the end of this year, that not only a treaty for the enlargement of the captive duke was set on foot, but there was also a project for a final accommodation between the two crowns, by means of that prince.

But, in order to have a clear view both of the designs and interest of the court of England at this time, we must attend the events of neighbouring courts, which, had they been as carefully improved, as they favourably happened, for the English might have once more given them the ascendancy on the continent. And first we shall take a view of the Scottish affairs at this period, and give some account of the constitution of that nation, as it has been gathered from their best writers by a modern historian, whose words we shall nearly transcribe.

"The feudal law, which had been established in that country, continued at this time in much greater rigour than in England, or perhaps any part of the world: but the Scots, receiving it more early than the English, received it with much greater imperfection. It was not like the great system introduced by the Norman Conqueror (and afterwards alternately improved by the crown and the people, as the scale of power preponderated in favour of either), modelled so as to keep the balance even among the constituent parts of the legislature; for, in Scotland, it had an evident tendency to aggrandize the middle order, that of the barons. What made this a misfortune was, the smallness of the qualifications of those barons, by which such vast numbers of them enjoyed the feudal rights to the highest extent.

"That there seems to have been no such order among them as that of a knight, in the English sense of the word, viz. as one depending upon a baron, and holding his lands for the services he performed to his lawful lord in the field; by this, the militia, in effect, was in the hands of the barons; and, in all domestic differences, the only safety of the crown was, that when the division was pretty equal, as it generally happened, the king's weight cast the balance upon the side into which it was thrown. It is true, in all disputes with England, the crown had very great influence, the cause being common, the king their common leader; and in this his subjects agreed, though they often agreed upon nothing else. As to the form of their government, that too retained all the fierceness of its Gothic model, without any of those softening introduced into that of England; and, it must be owned, that the commons seem to have had no manner of share in their government, before they were introduced by the English, under Edward I. Robert Bruce was too good a politician not to perceive that the continuing this order might in time prove some kind of balance to the formidable power of the barons; he therefore encouraged it, and burgessees now sat in parliament, in the same chamber with the barons.

"From this short view of the Scottish constitution, the reader may perceive, that there was not any intermediate order between the crown and the commons, as peers of the king's court. There was no other difference between the barons and the commons, than that the former served hereditarily and collectively, the other electively and representatively. The meanest commoner, even to the latest period in which the people could boast of a parliament, had the same deliberative and decisive voice as the greatest baron; they joined in the same protest, and enjoyed the same privileges, while their political capacity lasted. There were, it is true, in Scotland, as in other parts of Europe, distinctions of nobility, such as dukes and earls; but this gave them no pre-eminence in voice above the meanest commoner returned to serve in parliament: by those means there was no proportion between the influence of the barons in parliament, and their power in the field, the latter so greatly outweighing the former, that the appeal was generally made to the sword.

"As to what was afterwards looked upon to be the representation of the commons from counties in Scotland, it was, in effect, no fundamental in their constitution, but a mere matter of convenience, and, apparently inconsistent with the feudal law, which supposes every baron to be a Par Curia, and therefore representing himself. But they were not the commons that those members from counties represented, they were actually the barons, who at first served collectively, till (as it happened in some cases in England) they, in general, began to think their attendance too expensive and inconvenient*, and James, as a matter of grace, dispensed with the attendance of the smaller barons, upon their joining to send up a representative for their county. But it is to be remembered that this was not the case of all the barons; for the king obliged the most able and the most considerable of them to attend his court. Upon the whole, therefore, the original of nobility in Scotland was purely accidental, and, as all nobility ought to be, was annexed to great property and great parts. As to a peerage, they never had any, in the English sense of the word; and in this Gothic form stood the constitution of Scotland at the time we now treat of †." I have been the more particular in this account of a people to whom the English are now so intimately related, not only because it has a connection with English history, but because the reader, from this representation, may form some conjecture how far the English had gained or lost, by the alterations which had been introduced into their own feudal system.

James I. of Scotland, though endowed with great abilities for government, had an education too foreign from the manners of the Scots, which had pushed him upon some impolitic severities. He had undertaken to humble the overgrown power of the barons, and he seems to have had it in view to worm them out of the militia, by bringing the parliament to pass several acts establishing a kind of reformed militia, which was to be commanded by the respective sheriff of each county. He brought to justice many of his great men, who, during his exile, had acquired exorbitant powers: and, as he had the commons on his side, who were glad of the royal authority to shelter themselves from the tyranny of their more immediate lords, he proceeded so far as to take off every man whose temper or power he dreaded, and that with a severity too much favouring of cruelty.

These proceedings necessarily gave disgust to many of the great men, but to no one more than Walter Stuart, earl of Athol, who, with the assistance of a bold outlaw, called Græme, and a brisk ambitious young man of his own name, and heir to his estates and honours, formed a conspiracy for taking off a prince whom they looked upon as a bloody tyrant, for opposing the ambitious and oppressive proceedings of his nobles. The plot was carried on with such secrecy, that James knew nothing of it till he saw himself surrounded by the conspirators at dead of night, in the convent of Dominicans at Perth, where he then lodged. The king had just time to start from his bed and seize his sword, when the ruffians entered his apartment and attacked him; he bravely defended himself for some time, and his queen interposed her own body between that of her husband and the swords of the traitors, receiving some dangerous wounds in his defence; but this noble exertion of conjugal affection proved ineffectual, and she had the grief to behold her royal consort expire under twenty-eight wounds, many of them mortal.

This tragical event might have been improved to the advantage of England, who was not only freed thereby from a dangerous neighbour, attached to its enemy of France, but saw him succeeded by an infant, during whose minority the government of Scotland was chiefly influenced by the queen-mother, an English woman by birth, and related to Henry; but the domestic divisions of the English court prevented the suitable measures, which such a situation of affairs seemed to point out, from taking place: on the contrary, on the last day of March, 1438, a new truce was concluded with Scotland for nine years, viz. from the first of May, 1438, to the first of May, 1447; and a meeting was appointed for fixing the Marches of both kingdoms. Thus did the English lose the fairest opportunity they could have of breaking the connexions between France and Scotland, and of recovering their interests in both countries.

Nor was their conduct less impolitic with regard to the former of these courts. Charles, the French king, as we have already observed, began to be distracted by civil jealousies. Some of his great men, who had served him faithfully, and who, thinking themselves but indifferently rewarded, had begun to form a party under the young dauphin against the government. This had put Charles upon using all his endeavours to obtain the enlargement of the duke of Orleans, and he succeeded so well in this, that it was actually agreed to in the English court, by the influence of the cardinal-bishop. This unpopular step was strenuously opposed by the duke of Gloucester, but not all his credit could prevent a new train of negotiations from taking place, for we find, in the Collection of Public Acts*, this year, 1438, that a treaty with France was set on foot, at the request of the duke of Brittany, who it seems had been importuned thereto by the pope.

Thus the court of England suffered itself to be amused at this critical juncture, without taking advantage of the many happy circumstances that presented in its favour.

This year produced but few remarkable military events; England as well as France being afflicted with the pestilence, the war languished for want of reinforcements, and nothing was undertaken, on either side, of greater importance than some petty siege or pillaging excursions. The duke of Burgundy, indeed, chagrined at his late miscarriage before Calais, resolved, if possible, to retrieve his honour by a second attempt against that place, from the nature of which he hoped for greater success than in his last. He employed a great number of pioneers, and other workmen, to cut a dyke, through which he imagined the town would be suddenly overflowed by the sea rushing in, and he proposed entering the town sword in hand, when the inhabitants should be in the midst of the terror and confusion caused by such an unexpected event; but the town being higher than the sea, his design was baffled, and the earl of Huntingdon arriving with a numerous supply of men from England, the duke was obliged to give over his undertaking.

No other event of consequence happened this year, excepting William Brunellard, governor of Dreux, giving up that place to the French for eighteen thousand crowns; and sir Francis Surienne receiving ten thousand saluts d'or† for himself, with five thousand for his garrison, for the surrender of Montargis. On the other hand, the lord Talbot made himself master of Longueville, Cales, Manille, and several other places.

But the famine and pestilence ceasing in England and France, both sides prepared to renew the war with vigour, as the most effectual method to hasten the conclusion of a peace, which each court was equally desirous of bringing about. Accordingly, in the month of March, 1439, the constable de Richemont, with an army of four thousand men at arms, laid siege to Meaux, one of the strongest places in France, which had formerly held out seven months against Henry V. This city was commanded by the bailard of Thian, an officer of distinguished military talents and valour, who had under him sir John Ripley and sir William Chamberlain; but, notwithstanding this general made so brave a defence as astonished the besiegers, yet the town was taken by storm, after holding out three weeks, and the gallant governor was taken prisoner in the action; when the constable, by a cruel severity, of which, to say the truth, the English had, in the course of the war, set him but too frequent examples, ordered his head to be struck off, because he was a Frenchman, and, as such deemed a rebel.

The work of the besiegers was, however, but half completed by the taking of the town; for the garrison, consisting of about five hundred men, headed by Ripley and Chamberlain, retired into the Marché, or Market-place (that part of the city so called, which is separated from the other by the river Marne which runs through it), and breaking down the bridge of communication over the river, the constable found that he had a new siege to undertake, more difficult than the former; however, determined to carry the place at all events, he drew lines of circumvallation, flanked with redoubts, quite round it.

The active Talbot, hearing of the brave defence made by his countrymen, got together a body of about four thousand troops, and advanced with a resolution of relieving them; and, falling upon the French camp suddenly, and with great fury, he cut his way through the enemy, and threw four hundred men, with a supply of provisions, into the city; after which he retired, without the French daring to follow him, or come to an engagement. But Charles, being informed that Talbot meditated a return, with a still more considerable supply, he reinforced the constable so seasonably, and the latter pushed the siege with a vigour and impetuosity, that obliged those within to capitulate†.

The reduction of this important fortress greatly raised the constable's reputation, who, to make the most of the ardour of his soldiers, elated by success, immediately formed the siege of Avranches, now in the hands of the English; but Talbot, who was on his way to Meaux with a body of troops designed for the relief of that place, hearing of its fate, and how the constable was at present employed, he advanced against that general, attacked and forced his lines, and forced him to abandon his undertaking.

Talbot then turned his victorious arms against Harfleur; but as his army was not strong enough to form a regular siege, he contented himself with blocking up the town, and at the same time entrenched himself in such an advantageous manner, as to bid defiance to almost any numbers to force him; in the mean time the earl of Mortaigne kept the place beleaguered by sea. The earl of Eu, lately arrived from England, where he had been long prisoner, and now exchanged for John Beaufort, earl of Somerset, approached, at the head of a body of troops, to attack the English entrenchments; but perceiving the nature of their situation, he thought proper to retire, after making a slight attempt, in which the count de Gaucourt was made prisoner by the English. Talbot, after continuing the blockade for above four months, at length made himself master of the town. He then proceeded to clear the rest of Normandy of the French garrisons that occupied several castles there, until he conquered the whole province, the single town of Dieppe only excepted.

Though the war was thus carrying on in France with equal fury, yet both courts seemed to lean towards peace. We have already taken notice, that negociations had been set on foot the preceding year for that purpose, at the request of the duke of Brittany; and the duke of Orleans took an opportunity to offer his mediation in conjunction with that of the beforementioned prince, and for that end renewed his instances for leave to go to Calais to confer with that duke. This was strenuously opposed by Gloucester, who plainly saw, and loudly declared, that the duke of Orleans could not be an impartial mediator; but his great antagonist, the cardinal of England, began to gain an ascendant over him, in proportion as the king advanced in years: possessed of greater wealth than any other subject in the realm, he was always able to furnish Henry with supplies of money on every emergency, and by this and several other means, he so engaged Henry's affection, that he trusted wholly to him for information; and being naturally of a weak capacity and jealous disposition, was easily induced to believe that the duke of Gloucester designed to keep him in perpetual dependence; this raised in him so violent an aversion to his uncle, that he omitted no opportunity of thwarting him, so that Gloucester's opposition was of more service to Orleans than all the power and interest of his friends, or the largeness of the sum he offered for his ransom: in fine, it was agreed that he should have liberty to go to Calais and confer with the duke of Brittany. But the most remarkable circumstance of all, was a power which Henry gave to the cardinal-bishop of repairing to Calais, and there opening the conferences with the French ministry. This is a further proof in how small consideration the duke of Gloucester now was at his nephew's court. What is here related passed in the preceding year; but, as we chose to keep the account of this negociation entire, we reserved it for this place.

In the month of January this year, Isabella of Portugal, duchess dowager of Burgundy, and the cardinal of Winchester, had an interview between Calais and Gravelines, when they agreed that the negociation should be double on the part of England, one with the duke of Burgundy, which was to be managed between the duchess and the cardinal-bishop; and another between the commissioners of England and France, the said duchess and cardinal, together with the dukes of Brittany and Orleans, acting as mediators. Pursuant to this agreement, the very place where the duchess and cardinal were, was chosen for holding the congress; and plenipotentiaries were nominated on both sides from the princes of the blood and the chief noblemen of both kingdoms*.

† Monstrelet, p. 162, 163.

* The commissioners for Henry were, besides the cardinal, John, archbishop of York; John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk; the bishops of Norwich and St. David's; with the earls of Stafford and Oxford, and the lords Bouchier and Hungerford; besides several civilians and other officers of state: those for the king of France, besides the duke of Orleans, were the chancellor archbishop of Rheims, the counts of Vendosme and Dunois, the lord of Busche, and some other French counsellors. Rymer, vol. x. p. 728.

We have, in Mr. Rymer's Collection, a full copy of the instructions given to the English plenipotentiaries on this occasion, of which we shall here give the substance, as it will serve to shew how the council of England stood disposed with regard to a peace; as also enable the intelligent reader to judge which of the two parties is to be blamed for breaking off the conferences. The chief heads were:

First, that they shall insist upon the king of England's hereditary right to the crown of France, and enforce it by mentioning the many signal victories obtained by the English against the French; and that they shall propose to leave Charles in possession of Languedoc, and as many other estates beyond the Loire as shall amount to twenty thousand pounds a year, to be held of Henry.

Secondly, that if this offer should be rejected, the cardinal, in his quality of a prelate of the church, and a mediator, should make pathetic representations to the assembly upon the miseries of war, and the damage which it has already entailed upon the whole Christian world; he is likewise to represent, that the indivisibility of the monarchy is a mere chimera, since both before and after the reign of Charlemagne, several princes had divided it among themselves: but that if those representations shall have no effect, the plenipotentiaries are to proceed to offer Charles all the dominions beyond the Loire (the duchy of Guienne, and the earldom of Poitou excepted, and those other estates which the kings of England were possessed of there before they succeeded to the crown of France.) But we are to understand that Charles is still to hold the same of Henry, as sovereign.

Thirdly, if this proposal should be likewise rejected, the plenipotentiaries were further empowered to offer all the territories beyond the Loire, excepting those places which Henry was then actually possessed of; and they were to expatiate greatly upon this concession, which gave up so many fair towns and fruitful provinces, &c.

Fourthly, if the last proposition should likewise be rejected, the plenipotentiaries are to offer, that their master shall accept of all that part of France, which his predecessors enjoyed, not as kings of France, but in their own private right, comprehending the towns and marches of Calais, the county, castle, and lordship of Guisnes, according to the limits and bounds specified in the treaty of Bretigny; but without holding them of the crown of France, or any other power.

They are likewise instructed, that, if the French plenipotentiaries should insist upon the crown of France being restored to the estates it held in Normandy, and other places, while they were possessed by the kings of England, they shall agree to the same, provided those estates are not already given or granted away to Henry's subjects; but that Henry will consent that Charles shall have the reversion of them, or purchase them from their present owners.

This last article seems to have been the ultimatum of the English plenipotentiaries, for the rest of their instructions proceeded upon two points, which were in the breast of the cardinal: the first of which was Henry's renouncing the title and arms of France; the other was the marriage between Henry and the daughter of Charles, upon which the plenipotentiaries were to say they had no instructions.

It is extremely plain, from the tenor of these instructions, that though the council were earnestly desirous of a peace, they durst not presume so far upon the patience of the people to purchase it too dear, for they descend no farther than what we have seen; but at the same time the plenipotentiaries are instructed at the end of the writing, to conclude a truce for any term of time, between forty and eight or ten years, in case that a final peace could not be agreed upon, and that towns should be exchanged for the better observation of the same. By the same instructions, likewise, the ransom of the duke of Orleans was fixed at one hundred thousand marks, of which Henry would accept of Harfleur, Dieppe, and Mount St. Michael, for one half.*

Very different were the instructions given to the French plenipotentiaries; all that they were empowered to offer, was "That the English should enjoy all they possessed in the duchy of Guienne, with the balliages of Evreux, Caen, and the Continentin, Calais and Guisnes, with their marches and dependencies, the sovereignty of the duchy of Alençon, and what they held in Picardy; but then Henry was, on his part to do homage and fealty to Charles for all those territories, to make an absolute renunciation of his claim to the crown of France, and to desist from bearing either its arms or titles†."

The duchess of Burgundy and the duke of Orleans saw very plainly that it was impossible peace could be concluded, whilst both sides continued so stiff, the English for the arms, titles, and crown of France, which they were required to renounce, and the French for the homage and superiority of the ceded territories, that, far from either yielding aught to the other, they would not agree to a suspension of their claims for fifteen, twenty, or thirty years, as proposed in a plan of accommodation drawn up by the duchess of Burgundy and the duke of Orleans. Accordingly, after the ambassadors had exerted their utmost sagacity and penetration, in order to discover the extent of each other's powers, but without effect, it was proposed to adjourn the conferences till both parties had the sense of their courts upon the heads in dispute: this was agreed to, but the terms proposed were so disagreeable to both parties, that the negotiation never was resumed.

Whilst this affair was in agitation, the court-divisions among the French arose to such an height as to endanger their newly recovered state. The dauphin and many of the princes of the blood were joined in a league against the king, which tended to no less than the dethroning him, and setting the crown upon the head of his son. The particular reasons that caused this commotion are foreign to our purpose to relate; we shall, therefore, only observe, that Charles, by his resolution and the assistance of the constable Richemont, reduced the refractory to obedience towards the latter end of this year; and that, though these disturbances continued in France for near twelve months, the English, either for want of strength to improve the opportunity, or from supineness and neglect, derived not the least advantage therefrom to their affairs in France.

Early in the year 1440 died Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, regent or lieutenant-general of France: he was succeeded by the duke of York, who was now sent thither in that quality, though he had been before recalled to give place to the earl. The duke was probably indebted for this honour to the cardinal-bishop, who had the sole management of Henry's government.

About this time the affair of the duke of Orleans was again resumed. This prince had, by his zeal for bringing about the late treaty to a conclusion, or by some other means, so recommended himself to the council of England, that they resolved to set him at liberty upon the payment of forty thousand nobles in hand, and giving security for fourteen thousand more, payable at different terms, and engaging not to bear arms against Henry, nor do any thing to his prejudice †.

The duke of Gloucester had always opposed the release of the duke of Orleans: the late king's brother's will was with him an inviolable law; besides, he was persuaded the giving Orleans his liberty, would only increase the number of the enemies of England; and now, when he saw this matter drawing towards an issue, he renewed his opposition with the greatest firmness; but finding all his endeavours in vain, and that the majority of the council were for admitting the duke to ransom, he drew up a formal protest against that measure, with the reasons for his opinion. The sum of the duke's protest was as follows:

"His chief reasons, he said, were taken from the known weakness of Charles VII. and the dauphin his son, and the dissensions between them, which, in all probability, would influence the states of France to trust the duke of Orleans, whose great and extensive knowledge has been well approved, with the administration of the affairs of the kingdom: the discouragement his enlargement would give to the estates of Normandy, which had hitherto contributed so largely, and with so much alacrity, to the defence of that country: the uncertainty whither the duke would not think himself more obliged to obey his sovereign's commands, than to observe his own oath; and the want of a remedy, in case the bonds and obligations for his ransom-money should not be paid: the danger of losing Guienne, that ancient inheritance of the crown, from the alliance between the duke of Orleans and the counts of Armagnac and Foix, and the lord d'Albret: the late reconciliation between the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, at Calais, during the negotiations, which ought to create a dread of their joining forces to drive the English out of France, instead of expecting any advantage by their dissention: the ill look it would have abroad, as if the crown of England (which had no alliance but with Portugal) could not maintain the war without raising money by a ransom, which would endanger the loss of all it as yet possessed in France: lastly, that it was known to every one, the late king, wisely weighing the danger which would arise from the enlargement of the duke of Orleans, forbade, upon his death-bed, to release that prince till a peace was concluded †."

These reasons, however, appeared to have no weight, and the duke of Orleans obtained his liberty, after an imprisonment of twenty five years, on much easier terms than those he had offered before the conferences at Arras; and, having taken an oath, before he left London, to perform all the conditions of his ransom, he was finally enlarged at Gravelines, on the twelfth of November: and being met there by the duke of Burgundy, went with him to St. Omer's, where he soon after married that prince's niece, Margaret of Cleves, agreeable to an agreement that had been made with the dukes of Burgundy, in her son's name, during the conferences at Calais.

Very little, besides what we have related, passed either in England or on the continent, during this year, if we except an attempt made by Charles, who had now taken a liking to military avocations, to recover Pontoise, which, being still in the hands of the English, greatly annoyed the Parisians. He laid close siege to this place for some months; but the duke of York arriving in France about the middle of August, with an army of twelve thousand men, advanced to the place, and offered the French king battle; and, upon his declining it, passed the river Oyse, in sight of the French army, in order to attack Charles's head-quarters at Maubesson; upon which that prince, whose unvarying maxim it was, never to fight the English but with the most decisive advantage on his side, thought proper to retreat, and the English entered Pontoise in triumph. After leaving a thousand fresh men in the place, they marched out, and again offered Charles battle at Poissy, but not finding themselves able to force him to fight, they were obliged to return into winter-quarters at Rouen.

But Charles could not easily digest the affront put upon his almost maiden arms at Pontoise; determined to retrieve his baffled honour and still the clamour of his people, who looked upon their late successes as earnest of their future invincibility. In this disposition he assembled a greater army than he had for many years commanded; the French historians tell us that it amounted to twenty thousand men. He was attended by the dauphin, the earl of Maine (or Anjou), and Richemont the constable; and, taking the field in the spring of the year 1441, his first attempt was against Creil, a town situate on the Oyse, which he carried without much resistance. He next formed anew the siege of Pontoise, with twelve thousand of his best troops. Charles was bent on the reduction of the place, but he had a great general to oppose. Talbot, commissioned by the duke of York to introduce a convoy into the town, despising the most difficult enterprises, marching up with only four thousand men, made such a seasonable and vigorous attack upon the enemy's quarters, that he obliged them to give way, and introduced his supplies into the place.

Charles, however, behaved on this occasion with equal bravery and conduct; he was the foremost in all posts of danger. The garrison, on their side, constantly harassed the French by their sallies; while the besiegers continued to batter the walls furiously with their cannon: at length, having made three breaches, and beaten down the church of Notre Dame, they attacked and took a fort, which, overlooking the town, enabled them to annoy the besieged with their long guns and culverins. Soon after Charles gave orders for a general assault, and, forcing his way in despite of all the efforts of the enemy, he mounted the battlements sword in hand, and was himself the first who planted the French colours on the walls. Sir Nicholas Burdet, with five hundred of the garrison, were slain in the defence of the breaches, and about as many more taken prisoners. Four days after the taking of Pontoise, the town of Evreux was surprized by the French, as was likewise Beaumont le Rayer. Thus, before the end of this year's campaign, the English were stripped of all their places of strength in the neighbourhood of Paris, excepting Vernon and Mante†.

Whilst these things were transacting in France, there passed a scene in England that attracted the whole attention of that people; a scene infamous by its agents, and more so by its motives. We have already observed, that the duke of Gloucester's credit sensibly declined; in short, he had no other footing in the cabinet than what his personal integrity gave him. But the cardinal of Winchester, his implacable enemy, not contented with having ruined his interest, concerted schemes even against his life, by endeavouring to fix upon him the imputation of high-treason; but the duke's known attachment to his sovereign getting the better of these arts, Winchester was obliged to change his battery. Eleanor, duchess of Gloucester, had formerly been that prince's mistress: she loved him with the greatest warmth of affection; the duke, however, was not strictly true to her bed. She was apprized of this; and a certain fanaticism, composed of superstition and ignorance, prompted her to apply to certain persons, who pretended to understand necromancy and to deal in love-powders and incantations. This coming to the cardinal's ears, who had planted emissaries to observe all that passed in the duke's family, he from thence took occasion to have the duchess seized, together with her accomplices, who had all along imposed upon her credulity; and a charge was immediately made out against her, for having practised sorcery against the life of the king, by making an image of wax to resemble Henry, and melting it gradually before the fire, in hopes that as this consumed, the king's constitution would decay. A slight indisposition under which Henry had for some time laboured, favoured this charge; the credulous populace, ready to adopt every idle tale, gave into the snare. Judges were appointed to try the duchess and her accomplices on this absurd charge: as there are always wretches to be found, in every degree, ready to sacrifice honour, virtue, truth, and religion at the altar of preferment, it was not long before she was adjudged guilty, and sentenced to do public penance for three days successively, by walking bare-footed and bare-headed, with a waxen taper in her hand, through the streets of London, to St. Paul's church, and then to be committed prisoner for life to Chester castle, under the custody of sir Thomas Stanley*. This sentence was literally executed: the enemies of the duke of Gloucester hoping that this public disgrace would either ruin his popularity, or provoke him to take some desperate measures against the government; but they were disappointed in part of their expectation; the duke was an enthusiast in loyalty, and bore his wrongs with the utmost resignation: however, this dreadful mortification shook his credit so much, that he could never again recover his ground.

As for the accomplices of the duchess, or rather her deceivers, who were one Roger Bolinbroke and Thomas Southwell, two priests, a woman named Margery Gurdeman, a pretended witch, with Hume and another priest, and one Woodham an esquire, the two former were hanged, and the woman was burnt alive; but Hume and Woodham received their pardon, which gave most people reason to believe that they had been in concert with the duke and duchess's enemies, especially as they kept up to the story of the image, thereby to serve the cardinal's insatiate malice, while the others disclaimed all knowledge of such a circumstance even with their dying breath.

Nor was this the only triumph which the cardinal gained over his antagonist, the duke of Gloucester: he shewed his superiority of interest in other affairs of more importance to the nation. He always seconded every proposal of accommodation with France, with which the court of England was continually amused; this occasioned a heavy desponding inactivity all the remaining part of this year, and the French were left in quiet possession of their late acquisitions.

But while England was suffering by these shameful dissensions, the state of affairs at the court of France wore not a much better face. Charles had scarcely time to repose himself after the siege of Pontoise, when he was alarmed by the strongest cabal of opposition that ever threatened his government. Almost all the princes of the blood were in a fresh league against him, with the duke of Orleans at their head. This prince was highly offended at the cold reception he received from the king, after a twenty-years captivity for the interest of France, and even during which he had done him signal services. Probably this league would have entirely ruined the king's affairs, if, by his prudent conduct he had not found means to gain over the head by considerable favours; the duke of Orleans deserting the faction, all their measures were broken, and they were forced to throw themselves upon the king's mercy, who, with a politic gentleness, gave them pardon, and thus put an end to their league‡.

In the year 1442, the English seemed to awake from their infatuation. At that time the duke of York was in France, and all the best officers in England served under him. It was resolved to take advantage of the before-mentioned dissensions in the French court, which lasted for several months: and the duke of York formed the army into three divisions, one of which he commanded in person, another he committed to the charge of the lord Willoughby, and Talbot was at the head of the third; while the earl of Huntingdon, who had a separate command in Guienne, was appointed to act in that province. By these dispositions the French found themselves extremely harrassed; but the chief and most vigorous operations were carried on by the lord Talbot, whom the king this year created earl of Shrewsbury ||, and the earl of Huntingdon, we shall therefore confine ourselves to the narrative of these.

Talbot's first operation was against the castle of Conches; and the count de Dunois seeking to divert him from his undertaking, sat down before Gaillardon: but the stratagem turned against the inventor, for Gaillardon making a better resistance than Conches, Talbot, after taking possession of the latter, marched to beat up the quarters of Dunois before Gaillardon; but this general knowing that he could not engage but under a disadvantage, retired before the other could come up. By this retreat Talbot found himself at liberty to pursue a more extensive plan which he had formed, and which he now began to put in execution by laying siege to Dieppe, which was defended by de Forêt, a brave French gentleman, who had under him several gallant officers. Talbot having made himself master of an eminence above the suburbs on the land side, erected a fort there, from whence he most furiously battered the tower of Polet and the walls of the place with almost two hundred cannon. Nevertheless it continued to hold out obstinately for above nine months, the count de Dunois having found means, during the siege to throw himself into it with nine hundred soldiers; but Talbot, having likewise gotten a new reinforcement, must at length have carried it, had not the dauphin, sent by his father Charles, arrived before the place, now almost in ruins, about the middle of August, and attacked the English with great fury: the earl of Shrewsbury was then gone to Rouen, and had left the care of the siege to his son, John Talbot, who made a most gallant resistance, but was taken prisoner, and the place relieved. On this occasion the dauphin behaved in so gallant a manner as gained him great reputation.

While the siege of Dieppe was carrying on, the earl of Huntingdon undertook that of Tartas, which lay in the lordship of d'Albret, in Guienne. The siege lasted for several months, with equal obstinacy on both parts, at last the garrison capitulated to surrender, if not relieved by Midsummer; but Charles, being strongly solicited by the lord d'Albret to march to the relief of the besieged, the latter began his march at the head of no fewer (says Monstrelet) than eighty thousand horse, and appearing before Tartas on the twenty-fourth of June, offered the English battle; but the latter being much inferior in numbers, broke up the siege, and Charles restored the place to d'Albret. After this, the French king attacking St. Sauveur, the strongest place the English held in Guienne, carried it by assault, and no less than eight hundred English were slain, and the governor, sir Thomas Rampstone, made prisoner. Following the tide of his success, he next laid siege to Acq, which held out five weeks, but at length surrendered. La Reole was carried by storm; and Marmande fell likewise into the hands of the now victorious Charles, who soon after put an end to the campaign on that side, and went himself to Montauban, where he passed the rest of the winter.

There happened about this time a civil transaction on the continent, which had great effects upon the affairs of England, and therefore claims a place in this work. The circumstance was this: John IV. count d'Armagnac, in consequence of a grant of the earldom of Comminges, made, for a valuable consideration, to his uncle John III. by Margaret, heiress of that estate, and countess of Comminges, claimed the succession of that county after her death; but Charles, after the breaking up of the last campaign, coming to Montauban, had delivered the old countess from a confinement in which she had been kept near twenty years by her husband Matthew de Grailly; in consideration of which, Charles procured from the lady a cession of Comminges in his own favour*; and not only stripped the count d'Armagnac of all he possessed from the Comminges family, but also compelled him to lay aside the title of Earl by the Grace of God. All this mortified the count to the greatest degree, and put him upon making a treaty with England, in the spring of the ensuing year, 1443, and upon offering one of his daughters in marriage to Henry, in hopes of succours from thence to support his title to the earldom of Comminges. Charles, getting some intelligence of his treaty with Henry, who had actually given orders to Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, to support the count†, laid a deep and well concerted scheme for defeating the confederacy; and, before the earl of Shrewsbury could raise the necessary supplies of men for taking the field, Charles sent his son Lewis, the dauphin, with the marshal de Loheac, at the head of a powerful army, to crush the count before he could receive the intended assistance from the English. Lewis used such diligence, that he appeared before l'Isle Jourdain ere Armagnac had the least notice of his march. This vigorous proceeding had its desired effect: neither the counts of Foix, Perche, nor Marche, who had entered into the confederacy, durst appear to support him, and the count d'Armagnac found it necessary to throw himself on the mercy of Charles, who sent him prisoner to Carcassonne, with all his family except his eldest son, who fled to Navarre. The dauphin, before the end of this year, entirely reduced the counties of Armagnac and Rosay, belonging to that count, excepting two fortresses, which were obliged some time after to capitulate likewise. Thus did the English, by an unaccountable supineness, suffer themselves to be deprived of an ally, who, if they had properly supported him, might have been as serviceable to them in the defence of Guienne, as his ancestors had been to the French towards the reduction of it.

In the beginning of this year a private negotiation was set on foot between Henry and the duke of Burgundy: the latter seeing that the dispute between the two kings was not likely to be decided, resolved to extricate himself from a ruinous war by concluding a separate peace with England. He was particularly excited to this by the behaviour of Charles, who betrayed an evident coolness towards him; and he was apprehensive, in case that monarch's affairs should be restored, either by peace or war, he might resume his old enmity against him; he therefore thought it his interest to desist supporting him in a war, which, if it should prove successful, might render him too powerful, and gave his duchess full powers to conclude a general truce for all his dominions, with the king of England*. There had been one already made, which related only to the commerce between the Low Countries and that kingdom; but this, which was concluded the twenty-third of April, comprehended Burgundy and all the duke's territories in general, and was to continue in force until one of the parties renounced the engagement, in which case he should give notice of his intention three months before the actual rupture.

The earl of Somerset was sent over this year to France, with an army, in order to assist the earl of Shrewsbury in the reduction of Dieppe; but, on his landing at Cherbourg, he received advice of the place being relieved; upon which all he could do, was to commit ravages in the open country: he took the castle of la Guerche, in Brittany, probably for the sake of plunder, since it belonged to a neutral prince, to whom it was soon restored. He afterwards made great depredations in Anjou, lying two months near Pouancé, without attacking the place, and though joined by such numbers from Normandy that his army amounted to above twelve thousand men, he continued these petty hostilities without doing any action worthy of notice, and at length returned to Cherbourg.

It is about this time we may date the beginning of that dissention between the houses of York and Lancaster, that afterwards drenched their unhappy country in the blood of its own natives. The duke of York, who had now acquired a great power, both in the nation and the cabinet, found his family interest strengthened by the birth of a son, whom we shall see hereafter mount the throne of England by the name of Edward IV†. He had prudently disguised those ambitious sentiments he really entertained, and appeared a devoted and zealous partizan of the court and its measures; he had entered into all the cardinal's pacific secrets, and therefore suffered the war in France to languish under his command; there was, moreover, a mutual animosity between him and the earl of Somerset, who had also a chief command in that country, and was particularly favoured by Gloucester; and as York foresaw that prince could never be brought to favour his schemes, however heartily he might be disgusted with the cardinal, he used all means to weaken that prince's credit with the nation, and rival it in the council. And here we cannot forbear taking notice of the great error in politics committed by the late duke of Bedford, in aggrandizing the house of York, of whose claim and pretensions he could not be ignorant. There is no accounting for this mistake, but by supposing him to have had a great personal friendship for, and an high opinion of that duke; and that he thought, by the kindness he shewed him, to cancel in his mind all family resentments and prejudices: a supposition, however, which does more credit to the duke's own goodness of heart, than to his knowledge of mankind.

On the twenty-eighth of August, this year died John V. duke of Brittany; and was succeeded in the sovereignty of that duchy by his eldest son Francis.

The cardinal-bishop of Winchester, who had now acquired the whole direction of state affairs, had taken care to fill the king's council with ecclesiastics, to strengthen his party. The cardinal-archbishop of York, an aspiring priest, was taken by Winchester for his colleague; the bishop of Bath and Wells, a professed courtier, was, upon the death of Chicheley, a prelate of great abilities and integrity, promoted to the archbishopric of Canterbury: in a word, the king and council were no better than cyphers to fill up the sum of Winchester's consequence, who had starved the English interest in France, and whose pride, insolence, and ambition had by this time rendered him odious to the whole nation. The common people could by no means relish his politics, nor could they bear the thoughts of any connection between England and the duke of Burgundy, who, they imagined, had so infamously betrayed them. The public discontents were so violent, that they broke out into several dangerous riots, particularly in Yorkshire and Norfolk, especially in the latter of those counties, where the citizens of Norwich attempted to fire the priory of that city, and proceeded to such outrages, that the court ordered the duke of Norfolk to march with some troops to suppress them: he succeeded in his undertaking, but ran into such impolitic severities on the occasion, that the common people in general were exasperated afresh.

The cardinal of England, however, not to be diverted from his purpose, called a great council in the king's name, which met soon after the Christmas holidays; and here Beaufort laboured with all his might to enforce his pacific plan, and supported his opinion by various arguments, which were more specious than solid. He alleged, that as matters were then situated, it was utterly impossible for the English to extend their conquests in France, or even to retain those which they had already made; the parliament, he observed, was extremely backward in granting supplies for the maintenance of the war; the English affairs in Normandy were involved in the utmost disorder and confusion; the power of the French king was daily becoming more formidable: and from all these circumstances he inferred, that it was absolutely necessary to stop the progress of the enemy's arms by a temporary suspension from hostilities, which might allow the English time to recruit their spirits, and retrieve their ruined fortunes.

The duke of Gloucester, naturally bold and ambitious, could not relish these dilatory measures; he could not be persuaded to resign all hopes of prevailing over France; nor could he patiently endure to see his own advice over-ruled by the superior power and interest of his rival. But all his opposition had no effect, for a fresh negotiation was set on foot for a definitive treaty, in January, 1444; and the English ministry was so tame as to consent to the congress being held at Tours, where Charles resided: the earl of Suffolk, Dr. Moleyns, keeper of the privy-seal, the lord Roos, sir Thomas Roe, secretary, and Reeve, a civilian, with John Wenlock, were plenipotentiaries for England; while the duke of Orleans and the count de Vendôme were the principal of those for France‡.

The conferences being opened, several propositions were started on both sides, on the subject of a general peace, but, as they were mutually rejected, the whole result of the negotiation was a truce for about two years between the two crowns, which was to commence at land the following first of June*, and at sea on the first of July ensuing, and to end the first of April, 1446†: it included the allies of both princes‡.

The powers given to the other English ambassadors, related only to the peace or truce, but Suffolk was entrusted with a commission of another nature, which was no less than chusing a queen for his sovereign; a point of far greater consequence than may be at first imagined. Henry himself was naturally of such weak intellects, and of such a milky disposition, that he seemed formed to be implicitly governed by any person who could gain the ascendancy in his affections.

The court of England, as we have seen, was divided into two parties, that of the cardinal of Winchester, and that of the duke of Gloucester; and though the former had greatly gained upon the latter, in point of influence and credit, yet the superiority was not so great but that it might be easily destroyed, and even the balance cast upon the other side, by the interest of a queen, provided she was a woman of capacity and address; each party therefore was extremely desirous of having the honour to provide their prince with a consort, as it was more than probable that this circumstance would for ever decide the victory between them. The duke of Gloucester had warmly recommended the match with the daughter of the count d'Armagnac, while the treaty was depending between that prince and the court of England; but the cardinal and his friends had fixed their eyes upon Margaret of Anjou, daughter to Regnier, duke of Anjou and Lorraine, a princess who possessed all the requisites they wanted in a wife for Henry, and a powerful protectress for themselves: she was of a lively and daring spirit; of great penetration, uncommon resolution, and not to be intimidated by opposition or difficulties.

The lady's father was brother to the queen of France, and enjoyed the pompous title of king of Naples, Sicily, and Jerusalem, but without being possessed of a foot of land in these kingdoms; he was still in debt to the duke of Burgundy for his ransom, and unable to give any dowry with his daughter: this defect, however, was looked over, and Suffolk took care to send such an animating description of her beauty and merit to his court, and to represent this alliance as the surest means of obtaining a lasting peace, which Henry extremely coveted, that the ductile monarch readily gave his consent to the match, nay he even empowered Suffolk to promise, in his name, to cede the duchies of Anjou and Maine, then in the hands of the English, to Charles of Anjou, brother to the lady's father, Regnier pretending that it was inconsistent with his honour to marry his daughter to the usurper of the estates belonging to his family. On these terms, then, the treaty was concluded, and the English plenipotentiaries returned home. Many of our historians have taxed the earl of Suffolk with having of his own accord proposed this match, in order to establish his own favour at court; but, from what has been said above, I think it is highly probable, that it was a scheme contrived between Suffolk and the cardinal before the former was appointed chief of the embassy.

However that might be, when, upon Suffolk's return home, the negotiation came to be laid before a council, purposely called on the occasion, the duke of Gloucester violently exclaimed against the whole of the proceedings, particularly the intended match; and exerted his utmost endeavours, as did all his party, to get the council to set it aside; the superior advantages that would arise by a marriage with a daughter of the count d'Armagnac, the poverty of the intended bride's family, and the important territory that was to be given up, were all strongly urged; but, in spite of all he could do or say, the contract was ratified at London; Suffolk was dignified with the title of marquis, and even received the thanks of the parliament for concluding the marriage, and sent over, in November this year, to Nanci, in Lorraine, where he espoused the princess Margaret by proxy, in presence of the king and queen of France, the dauphin, and a great number of the French nobility. She was conducted in the ensuing spring to England, attended by the marchioness of Suffolk, and an honourable train of English ladies; and being married, on the eighteenth of April, 1445, at the priory of Southwick, near Portsmouth, where she landed, was crowned, on the first Sunday after Trinity, May 30, in Westminster abbey||.

On this occasion a great promotion was made in the English nobility: John Holland, earl of Huntingdon, was made duke of Exeter, with precedence in parliament next to the duke of York; Humphrey, earl of Stafford was made duke of Buckingham; and Henry Beauchamp, son to the late earl of Warwick, created duke of that title. The king also granted this nobleman, in reversion, from the death of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, the isles of Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, and Alderney, and also the manor and hundred of Bristol; and, what is very extraordinary, crowned him king of the Isle of Wight with his own hands, in consideration of his father's great descent. Henry also granted him place in parliament next the duke of Norfolk, and before Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, which created great animosities between them: by a special act made in parliament, it was established, that they should have precedence by turns yearly, the duke of Warwick to begin the first year; but his death, which happened shortly after, put an end to this matter§.

The new queen had not been long in possession of her dignity, when she shewed her intentions of being mistress of her husband's conduct as well as his affections. The opposition which the duke of Gloucester had made to her marriage, had fixed her to a personal aversion for that prince; and she entered into close correspondence with the cardinals of Winchester and York and the marquis of Suffolk, who, strengthened by her friendship, and animated by their common hatred against Gloucester, resolved to effect the ruin of that worthy and patriotic nobleman, in which, as the sequel will shew, they succeeded but too well. But we must now attend to other matters.

The truce being made only in order to a peace, this whole year was spent in general negotiations concerning the time and place of a new congress. It was thought likewise, that an interview of the two kings might promote the conclusion of a peace, but Charles insisting upon the meeting being held within his dominions, this proposal was laid aside, and the archbishop of York, the duke of Buckingham, the marquis of Suffolk, with the lord Sudley, were appointed plenipotentiaries, to meet commissioners from France in London; but all they could agree upon, was a confirmation of the former truce, and a prolongation of the same for some months.

The parliament, which was assembled at Westminster on the twenty-fifth of February this year, was, on account of an epidemic distemper which raged in London and the parts adjacent, prorogued till the twenty-fourth of January, 1446, when the marquis of Suffolk made a speech to each of the houses, setting forth the benefits which the nation had already received from the truce, and expatiating on his own conduct, labours, and services in war, as well as his great prudence and discretion in treating for a cessation of hostilities, and settling the contract of marriage. His conduct thus favourably blazoned by himself, and supported by the court-party, who had now a majority in the parliament, was approved by both houses, who joined in an act declaring the marquis of Suffolk a true and faithful subject; and, to secure him from being called to an account in any future parliament for his advice or conduct in the affair of the truce, they repealed a statute made in the time of Henry V. that no peace or truce should be made with the common enemy, without the consent of the three estates of the kingdom. And in the same fit of good humour they granted the king a considerable subsidy for a vigorous prosecution of the war with France, as soon as the truce should be expired; and half a fifteenth to Suffolk, for the charges of going over sea to espouse and bring over the queen*.

The duke of York, having now little to do in France, returned to England in the beginning of this year, 1446, while the parliament was sitting. He met with a very gracious reception from the king, and the parliament thanked him for his services to the state: but, as he still wished to continue at the head of the army, which he was daily modelling agreeable to his own schemes, he took occasion to recommend a vigorous prosecution of the war, and in such terms as gave great offence to the cardinal and his party; and the earl of Mortaigne (Edmund Beaufort), who had succeeded to the title of earl of Somerset on the death of his brother John in the preceding year, and was the implacable enemy of York, and who had followed him over from France, took this opportunity to do him such ill offices, that, after he had procured a renewal of his commission as lord-lieutenant of France for five years, the same was revoked. This the duke of York could not but highly resent, and swore revenge against Somerset; and he even made some overtures towards a coalition with the duke of Gloucester.

The court seems to have foreseen and dreaded this event, and to have exerted themselves to the utmost to prevent the fatal effects that might arise therefrom to themselves. The queen, who was of a bold and enterprising genius, and who had a mortal hatred to Gloucester, encouraged this resolution, and it was determined to remove him, not only from all posts of profit and honour, but also from his place at the council-board. This resolution was no sooner taken than put in execution, and the duke was dismissed in form. But this barefaced proceeding against so great a subject, and one so very popular, raised such commotions in the nation, that the authors of his disgrace thought it necessary to colour over this step with a shew of justice.

With this view they plausibly gave out, that they would bring an impeachment against him before the parliament, and one was summoned to meet on the tenth of February, 1447, at Westminster; but the place being too near London, which was known to be devoted to the duke's interest, it was thought proper to alter the place of its meeting, which was fixed at St. Edmundsbury; and the term in January was put off†, and all pleas were adjourned till a fortnight after Easter, that the justices of the King's Bench might attend the parliament at St. Edmundsbury, as if articles of treason were to be exhibited against him; and the duke was summoned by writ to appear before the king in parliament on the day appointed.

The duke, secure in the consciousness of his own innocence, thought he might bid defiance to the malicious efforts of his enemies, and, in obedience to the writ, left his castle of Devizes, the chief place of his residence since he retired from court, and came, apprehensive of no danger, to Bury, where he was present, on the tenth of February, at opening of the parliament; but the very next day he was arrested by the viscount Beaumont, constable of England, assisted by Edmund, earl of Somerset, and Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, and put under a strong guard‡. To give a plausible colour to this severe treatment, care was taken to publish, that he was accused of conspiring to kill the king in order to seize the crown, and, with an armed force, to deliver his duchess from her imprisonment. This ridiculous charge, however, gained no credit with the people, though, indeed, it answered the end designed by it in one way, for, as it was universally believed, that he would exculpate himself upon his trial, there was no stir in his favour.

But a fair and open trial was by no means the thing designed or wished by his enemies; for the lords, who were to try him as his peers, did not appear so obsequious to the directions of the court as they generally had been: this circumstance, together with the ill-grounded charge set up against the duke, and which his persecutors were sensible they could not support, have given occasion to most of our historians, perhaps too rashly, to assert, that Winchester and his party had recourse to a more certain and sanguinary method of accomplishing their purpose, and by a secret and violent death

Of the truth of this assertion, however, we dare not to decide, because not warranted therein by any absolute fact, which, in such cases, ought to be the only guide of the impartial historian. Thus much is certain, that, after having been confined seventeen days without any trial, he was found dead in his bed, on the twenty-eighth of February; but, as it is unanimously granted by our historians, that the dead body of the duke was exposed for some time to public view, and that not the least mark of violence was found upon it, it may be presumed, that a man, endued with such strong passions he was, might feel such an excess of grief and resentment for the affront put upon his person and character, as might bring on an apoplexy, or some of those violent disorders which instantly stop the springs of life.

However this might be, the death of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, was bitterly lamented by the people in general, and particularly by learned men and ingenious artists, of whom he was a constant protector and patron*. After his death, his adversaries industriously circulated reports to the prejudice of his character, in order to impress the public with a notion of his being actually guilty of the crimes laid to his charge; and, to render these reports still more plausible, his domestics were, immediately after his death, apprehended on suspicion of being accomplices with him; and a commission of Oyer and Terminer granted to the marquis of Suffolk, and others, to try them for high-treason, when several gentlemen of the duke's family, and twenty-seven servants, were, after a confinement of several months, brought to trial at Deptford; and being charged with having entered into several dangerous consultations, and of having laid a design of surprising the parliament that was to meet at St. Edmundsbury, and afterwards to raise the duke of Gloucester to the throne, they received sentence of death. Suffolk, who conducted this trial, sought to recommend himself to the people by a popular act on this occasion: he suffered the convicts to be drawn through the city on sledges to the place of execution, and to be hung by their necks, but they were immediately cut down alive, and received their pardon, to the inexpressible joy of all the spectators.

But this affectation of lenity, which was no part of his character, did not save Suffolk from the general odium he fell into, by being deemed the author of Gloucester's death; and though the parliament, flattered by the false hopes given them of a speedy peace, and by a promise from the throne of consulting them about the terms on which it was to be made, complied with his desires in passing, on the third of May, the last day of the session, an act to exclude Eleanor, the late duke of Gloucester's widow, from her dower, on account of her misconduct, yet he did not long enjoy his power: nor did the cardinal of Winchester triumph long in the fall of his adversary, whom he did not survive above six weeks. This haughty prelate was seized with a distemper that brought him to his grave on the eleventh of April, this year, and he died in all the horrors of a man, who, placing his whole affections upon this world, had entirely neglected to make any preparation for his removal to the next.

Winchester's death deprived the queen and her favourite Suffolk of the great support his experience, his birth, his credit, his riches, and his order gave them, and left them exposed to the ill effects of the unpopular measures which they soon after pursued. As for Suffolk, finding that the parliament could not be brought to ratify the cession of Anjou and Maine, and that the murmurs among the people began to grow very loud and licentious on that head, he desired that he might be allowed to vindicate his conduct in that affair. This could not be denied him; and he appeared on the twenty-fifth of May this year, before the king and council, when, after much flourishing in his own praise, Henry gave him letters patent, declaring himself fully satisfied of his integrity, and the measures he had pursued‡. The world, however, was not to be convinced by this declaration; the general clamour still ran high against him; all the misfortunes which happened afterwards were charged to his account, and were, indeed, in a great measure the consequence of that transaction, which he got warranted by his master's consent.

On the twelfth of February, 1448, a parliament was held at Westminster, which granted the king a very large subsidy. Before the rising of this parliament, which seems to have sat very late in the year, Henry, at the queen's suggestion, raised Suffolk to the dignity of a duke; the like rank was also conferred on Edmund, earl of Somerset, who, at the same time, was invested with the sole command in France, in the room of the duke of York||, who could not fail being deeply affected with this indignity put upon him, and finding that the public discontents against the sole management which the queen and her favourites had assumed in the government, grew very ripe, he gave way to them, dropping, by his emissaries, some dark hints among the people concerning his family-pretensions to the crown; these were privately handed about, by way of manifesto, and had the desired effect; for every mouth was now open in praise of the virtues, abilities, and great services of the duke of York, though without any mention of his pretensions to

* His body was carried to St. Alban's, where a noble monument, afterwards erected to his memory, still remains in the conventual church. The vault wherein his body was deposited, and the exact place of which was, it seems, then unknown, was discovered in the late queen Anne's reign. He was called, The good duke of Gloucester. Having had his education in Baliol college, he became a great proficient in learning, and was a great favourer of learned men. He laid the first foundation of the famous library at Oxford, since known by the name of the Bodleian, from sir Thomas Bodley, by whom it was wonderfully increased. Sir Thomas Moor gives an instance of this duke's sagacity. The king coming one time in progress to St. Alban's, a beggar, born blind, as he said, recovered his sight at the shrine of St. Alban. The miracle being noised about, the duke being there with the king, desired to see him; the beggar being brought, he asked him whether he was born blind? he answered, yes truly. And can you see, says the duke? yes, I thank God, and St. Alban, replies the beggar. Tell me then, says the duke, of what colour is my gown? the beggar readily told him the colour. And what colour, says the duke, is such a one's gown? the beggar likewise told him; and so of several others. You counterfeit knave, says the duke, how came you that were born blind, and could not see till now, so suddenly to know the difference of colours? and thereupon, instead of an alms, ordered him to be set in the stocks. the crown. The particulars of this manifesto the reader will find in the note †.

Much about this time also the affair of the cession of Anjou and Maine came to a crisis. The court of France had taken no notice of this article in the marriage-contract, by which the province of Maine was to be ceded to Charles of Anjou, the queen's uncle, during the life of the duke of Gloucester, as they knew it would be dangerous, if not impossible, to carry it into execution; but his death having removed all obstructions to the performance, Charles (who had always enjoyed the title of count of Maine, and was the rising favourite and first minister of the king of France) now demanded to be put in possession of the county. To deliver it up, was to justify and heighten all the clamour made upon the subject: numberless excuses were therefore made to delay the cession, founded on a provision for some recompence to those who had grants of possessions in that county; but at length orders were sent, under the king's hand, to sir Francis Surienne, governor of Mans, the capital of the county, to deliver that city into the hands of count Charles of Anjou, pursuant to the private article of Margaret's marriage.

Surienne, by birth an Arragonian, had served the English for above twenty years, was a knight of the Garter, and governor of Lower Normandy: believing an English council could never be so wicked to agree to such a pernicious measure, he disputed the authenticity of the order, and absolutely refused to obey it, or deliver the town. Upon this the count de Dunois coming before it with a numerous body of forces, and a large train of artillery, laid siege to it in form. Surienne defended himself for a considerable time with undaunted bravery; but Somerset, who was then in Normandy with a large army, not taking the least step to succour him, and even disavowing his procedure, he was at last compelled to yield, and to deliver up not only Mans, but all ther fortresses of that province, which was thus entirely alienated from the crown of England.

The garrison of Mans, which consisted of two thousand five hundred men, was allowed to march out, with all their effects; and, retiring into Normandy, fell into great distress, no fortress caring to receive them, either by the duke of Somerset's directions, or for fear of offending the government of England, whose orders they had disobeyed. Upon this Surienne directed his march into Brittany, surprized the town of Fougères, repaired the fortifications of Pont Orson and St. James de Beuvron, committed depredations over the whole province, and in this way procured subsistence for himself and his followers.

Upon advice of this breach of the truce, in which Brittany had been included, the king of France sent immediately to the duke of Somerset, to demand restitution of the place and goods that had been seized, the duke of Brittany joining likewise in this demand. Somerset returned for answer, "That he was greatly concerned for this action, but that it had been committed without his knowlege or consent, nor had he any power over Surienne or his men, to call them to account." On failure of redress from him, application was made to the court of England, and the council promised redress; but the whole year was spent in delays, which the French thought affected; and that court promised the duke of Brittany, in case he would enter into a league against England, and would begin the war in his own name, that they would, as auxiliaries, powerfully support him. The duke thereupon published a manifesto, setting forth the reasons of his quarrel, which was followed by vast preparations for doing himself justice by force of arms. We shall make use of this interval to take a cursory view of the Scottish affairs, since the murder of their king.

James II. who had succeeded his father, was at this time in the eighteenth year of his age, and under the tuition of James, earl of Douglas, son of him slain in the battle of Vernueil. The dauphiness of France, daughter to the late, and sister to the present monarch, was by this time dead; the regent Douglas, therefore, began to cast about how he might best renew that family-alliance which had subsisted between the courts of France and Scotland, and ambassadors had been sent into France, to conclude a marriage for James with the princess Anne of Gueldres, daughter to that duke and the duchess of Cleves, and granddaughter to John, duke of Burgundy.

The English court, alarmed at this alliance, particularly when on the eve of a rupture with France, resolved to attack the Scots, with a view to force them to make a separate peace. Accordingly Richard Neville, earl of Salisbury*, and Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland were this year sent with an army into Scotland, where they burnt the towns of Dunbar and Dumfries. The Scots failed not to return the visit, by an irruption into England, where they burnt Alnwick, and ravaged some part of Cumberland. After mutual depredations of this kind, both sides at length came to a battle, in which fortune so far favoured the Scots, that the English were entirely routed, and lost, according to the Scottish historians ‡, three thousand men; the lord Percy, eldest son to the earl of Northumberland, sir John Pennington, the second in command, and sir Robert Hemington being taken prisoners.

France was at this time in a very good condition to recover those dominions which had been wrested from her by the victorious arms of the English. Charles had established an excellent reform of his military force in France; a long series of war had rendered the whole nation warlike: Charles, however, did not immediately run to arms upon the in-

† It was hinted, that the house of Lancaster had usurped the throne. That indeed the usurpation had been tolerable, whilst the kings of that house were princes of distinguished worth, and had acted for the welfare and honour of the nation; that even, during the non-age of the present king, there had been hopes of his treading in the steps of his ancestors, and his being a worthy follower of the king his father; but that since he became of age, nothing glorious was to be expected from him: that therefore the English could have no reason to support any longer the usurpation of the crown, for the sake of a queen, who, being sprung from the blood of their most mortal enemy, ruled the kingdom with an arbitrary power: that in viewing the posterity of Edward III. it was evident, the house of Marche had been unjustly deprived of the crown: that the duke of York, being the sole heir of that house, and descended from Edward III. by his paternal ancestors, ought to have his due right. In fine, that his noble qualities, his known virtue, and his signal services to the nation, very strongly supported the just title given him by his birth.

fraction of the truce committed by the English under Surienne, but affected to act for the duke of Brittany; however, he did not fail to take advantage of the invasion of Scotland (included in the truce as an ally of France) to set the insincerity of the English in a glaring light, and even sent to demand satisfaction for the same; but not being able to obtain any answer thereto, nor with regard to the affair of Fougères, he resolved to have recourse to the way of retaliation.

Accordingly, on the first of May, 1449, a party of the garrison of Louviers surprized Pont de l'Arche, taking prisoners the lord Fauconberg, who was governor, and all his garrison, amounting to one hundred English. Soon after, Gerberoy and Conches in Normandy, and Cognac and St. Megrin in Guienne, were surprized in the like manner: upon which the English, in their turn, complained of infractions of the truce, and demanded reparation. The French offered to restore all these places, if Fougères was restored to the duke of Brittany, and satisfaction made for the losses his subjects had sustained at the taking of that place; but these losses being swelled to the enormous sum of one million six hundred thousand crowns, the English would not listen to the proposal.

Charles had not yet come to a determinate resolution for making war in his own name, though most of his council were for improving the opportunity that the defenceless condition of Normandy offered him for an easy reduction of that province; Charles's hesitation was owing to the low state of his finances, but Jaques le Cœur, one of his subjects, and the greatest merchant in Christendom, exerted himself on this occasion, and readily advanced two hundred thousand gold crowns towards defraying the first expences of the war, and undertook to provide the necessary supplies. It is, perhaps, one of the greatest blots upon the memory of Charles VII. that he suffered so useful a member to be afterwards persecuted and banished his native country: we do not know the reason of this; for, indeed, who can discover the secret causes of the unjust dealings of men? It was to this merchant that the French owed the reduction of Normandy, which, without his seasonable assistance at this juncture, they would never have been able to retake.

The truce expiring in the month of June this year, and Charles freed from all manner of obligation to act any longer as an auxiliary only, he declared war in his own right and name, after publishing a kind of manifesto, setting forth his earnest desire for a peace, and his constant endeavours for its continuance, with all the advances he had made for that effect.

After Charles had thus declared war in his own name, his conquests were almost too rapid for the pen of history to attend them: Vernueil en Perche, one of the strongest places in all France, Pont Eau de Mer, and Beuvron, which had been lately improved by the English, together with Lisieux, Mantes, and Vernon, with several other fortresses on the confines of Normandy, either opened their gates to the French, or surrendered after the appearance only of a siege.

The brave Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, was, indeed, in the field, but what could he do? He had but few hands, and no hearts to attend him: he made an attempt to interrupt the siege of Vernueil, but the count de Dunois getting between him and the besiegers, he found it impracticable, and therefore was obliged to retire to Rouen.

Unhappily for the English, at that time all Europe was strongly prepossessed against them, as it was plain that they had broken the truce. The government at home was so miserably divided, and the queen's faction in the council so thoroughly detested, that their interest in France could expect but little support now the war became general. Charles was perfectly well acquainted with all these circumstances, and with the advantage they gave him, and resolved to prosecute his success with unremitting assiduity. Accordingly, having the barrier of Normandy now laid open, he invaded that province with four different armies; one commanded by himself in person, another by the duke of Brittany, or his brother the constable de Richemont, a third by the duke of Alençon, and a fourth by the count Dunois, whom Charles had lately made count of Longueville.

As the English had not a body of troops sufficient to oppose them in the field, they proceeded in their conquests with amazing rapidity, and the towns were so poorly supplied with garrisons, that they had little else to do but receive the submission of the inhabitants. In a few weeks, Nogent, Chateau Gaillard, Pont l'Eveque, Neufchatel, Gisors, la Roche Guion, Feschamp, and Harcourt, were made to acknowledge Charles as their master. The duke of Brittany, with his brother the constable, falling into the Contentin with an army of Bretons, reduced Coutances, Valagnes, St. Lo, Torigny, Carenton, Gavré, and Pont d'Euve, with all the lesser places in those parts: Fougères, indeed, held out six weeks, but was at length carried by assault. The duke of Alençon, with his body of troops, took Fresnay; and, entering Normandy on the side of Maine, surprized Condé, and reduced Alençon, the capital of his own dominions, together with Belesme, Epay, and Ysmes, with the adjoining country. But no one appeared more zealous in this war than Regnier, king of Sicily, Margaret of Anjou the queen of England's father, and her brother John, duke of Calabria; they brought a gallant body of troops to the assistance of the French, and, having acted with the duke of Alençon in some of his enterprizes, joined Charles's division with his forces, who, thus strengthened, resolved to form the siege of Rouen, the capital of Normandy.

The earl of Shrewsbury had advised the duke of Somerset, who acted as lord lieutenant of France for Henry, to make the great stand in that city, as the duke of Bedford had formerly done in Paris, and with that view most of the native English had been drawn thither from the other garrisons, which may in some measure account for the speedy reduction of so many places by Charles and his generals, they being defended only by French natives of Normandy and Gascony in the English pay, and most of them perhaps, under French officers. The reason of Shrewsbury and Somerset's shutting themselves up in Rouen, was the belief that the approaching winter-season would disable Charles from undertaking the siege of that capital this year, and that in the mean time succours might arrive from England sufficient to regain great part of what they had lost.

But they were deceived: Charles was aware of their views, and sought to frustrate them. Having ing assembled all his forces, making a body of fifty thousand men, he came before the place in person, on the eighth of October, and summoned it to surrender; but receiving no answer, he returned after some days stay to Pont de l'Arche: he had advice there sent him, on the sixteenth of the month, that if an attack was made upon the tower of St. Hillary, a post guarded by the citizens, the latter would introduce his troops. The count de Dunois was accordingly ordered to form that attack, while the rest of the army made a false one on another part of the city: the feint had well-nigh succeeded; Dunois, and several of his men had already entered, but the vigilant Shrewsbury, having a suspicion that some design of that kind was on foot, kept so strict an eye upon the different forts, that he soon found what was going on in that quarter; and, marching up suddenly, attacked those who had entered with such fury that only two escaped being put to the sword by leaping into the ditch; of these the count de Dunois was one, who, finding his attempt thus baffled, sounded a retreat.

Two days after, the citizens grew clamorous for a treaty, and the archbishop joining with them, the duke of Somerset went to the town-house, and agreed to send deputies to Charles to settle the terms of a surrender. The conditions offered by the French were, a general pardon for all the inhabitants, and liberty for the English, and all who chose to follow them, to retire whither they pleased, with their effects. Somerset rejected these conditions, though it is certain they were as good as could be expected, since the place was not tenable against the will of the inhabitants, who so greatly out-numbered the English garrison, consisting in all of no more than three thousand men. Accordingly, on Sunday the nineteenth of the month, the whole city rose in arms with one consent, seized the walls and ramparts, and forced the English to retire into the palace and the castle; after which they introduced the French army into the town. The king fixed his head-quarters in fort St. Catherine, after the same had been taken by assault, and the garrison, consisting of one hundred and twenty men, most of whom were put to the sword.

Somerset would now have accepted the terms he had before rejected; but the case was altered: the fortifications of the palace and castle were in bad repair, and were very ill stored with provisions; thus he could neither hold out, expect succours, nor make his escape; he therefore desired to speak with the king: but the best terms he could get for himself, his duchess, and his garrison, were either to remain prisoners of war, or purchase their liberty by giving up all that the English as yet held in Upper Normandy. A treaty was carried on for some days, and it was at length agreed, "That he should retire, with all the English, to Harfleur, upon the payment of fifty-six thousand crowns, and engaging to deliver up the castles of Arques, Tancarville, and Lislebonne, with the towns of Caudebec, Montvillers, and Honfleur: for the performance whereof the earl of Shrewsbury, with James Butler, son to the earl of Ormond, and other persons of quality, were to be left as hostages."

Somerset marched out with his English on the fourth of November; but Charles, staying till some regulations were made in the city, did not make his solemn entry into it till the twenty-fifth of that month. All the places stipulated to be given up, were punctually delivered, except Honfleur, whose governor, Curson, refused to comply with the duke of Somerset's orders to evacuate the place in favour of the French: this gave occasion to the earl of Shrewsbury and the other hostages being detained prisoners. Curson made a bold and vigorous defence, but was finally obliged to yield to the superior forces of the count de Dunois. Evil fortune, perhaps the consequence of their own neglect, attended the English in all places: Gaston, count de Foix, made himself master of Maudouville en Soule, the strongest fortress in Guienne, which the duke of Suffolk had lately got intrusted to his custody: it was now given up by the treachery of Lewis de Beaumont, constable of Navarre. Thus ended the year, though not the campaign, so glorious to France. But we are now to attend the transactions in of England.

The universal confusion of their affairs in France, the negligence of the court in that respect, the loss of almost all Normandy in one single campaign, the conquest whereof had cost so much blood, began at length to provoke the impatient spirit of the English: the party of the duke of York, and the other enemies of the administration, instead of contributing to calm the rising discontent, or retrieve the national disgraces, were busied in distressing the government, and opposing its measures. This could be no secret to the queen and the duke of Suffolk, who now cast about for a pretence to remove York out of the kingdom: the way they took to do this, was, however, the most impolitic they could have adopted.

A commotion having happened in Ireland, which threatened serious consequences, the only person thought proper to restore tranquility to that country was the duke of York, who was, in his family-right, earl of Ulster and Corke, lord Connaught, Clare, Trim, and Meath, in Ireland; and the queen now ordered his commission to be made out as lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. York was at no loss to fathom their design in this measure, but, foreseeing it would turn to his advantage, he accepted his commission with a good grace; and having procured from the council very advantageous powers, he set out to take upon him his new post; and so conducted himself therein, by his mild and gentle behaviour, that the Irish were won to their duty without his being obliged to use force: what is more he made them so much his friends, that from thenceforth they were always devoted to the service of him and his family, even in the midst of their greatest misfortunes.

Margaret and Suffolk having thus, as they thought, got rid of a troublesome opponent, and having the sovereign direction of all public affairs, thought to govern the nation in Henry's name without controul; but the general discontent grew loud and intractable: it was every where openly said, that the queen and Suffolk were in concert to ruin the nation. They were charged with being the contrivers of the duke of Gloucester's death, and of having entered into an agreement with the enemies of England for betraying Normandy and Guienne into their hands; nor did the people stop at exclamations only, a great number of severe libels were daily published, and fixed on the doors of churches and all public places.

It was dangerous for the ministry to call a parliament at a time when the nation was in so ill a humour; mour; but the necessities of the crown were so urgent, that one met on the sixth of November this year, at Westminster. It proved very backward in the point of a supply, and strongly disposed to call the duke of Suffolk to an account: to ward off this blow, the parliament was prorogued to the twenty-second of January, 1450, then to sit for the dispatch of business. In the mean time the popular discontents broke forth into tumults in several places, and Adam Moleyns, bishop of Chichester, was murdered by the rioters.

In this disposition were the people when the parliament met, in the beginning of the year 1450; and as to that assembly, it was rather more exasperated than before, by some declarations of the murdered bishop, who, in the agonies of death, charged Suffolk with a traitorous conduct in regard to the delivery of the county of Maine, and with having boasted, "that he had as great interest in France as he had here, and was equally trusted in the cabinet of Charles as in that of Henry."

The duke of Suffolk, perceiving that the tide of national rage ran strong against him, and that no business would be done till the houses had levelled their stroke at him, thought it best to put a good face upon the matter, and desired leave of the lords to vindicate himself from the treason charged upon him by the deceased bishop of Chichester. His speech on this occasion was little more than an enumeration of his own and his family's merits, urging his father's death at Harfleur; his elder brother's being slain in the field of Agincourt, and that two other of his brothers were likewise in that action, wherein he was himself taken prisoner, and paid twenty thousand pounds for his ransom; a fourth brother's dying in hostage for him; his own serving thirty-four campaigns, seventeen years abroad without coming home, and fifteen years since, about the king's person, and being thirty years knight of the Garter: from all which he inferred, that he could not be suspected to have been debauched by French promises; and so, asking God's mercy as he had been true to the king and the realm, he required his purgation.

The commons, however, were not to be drawn from their purpose by this parade; for, on the Monday following, January 26, they drew up a petition to the crown, desiring that the duke of Suffolk might be committed to safe custody till he should clear himself of the crimes charged upon him by common fame and report: however, it was adjudged by the king's council, that he should not be committed till the specialty should be declared. The commons then, by their speaker, sent up a charge, on the seventh of February, to the lords, accusing the duke of several articles of treason, contained in a bill then delivered, importing,

I. That he had treated with the count de Dunois, Bertrand de Preigny, and W. Cousinot, the king's enemies, advising them to persuade the French king to invade England, dethrone Henry, and bestow the crown upon his son John de la Pole, who, by marrying Margaret, daughter and heir to John late duke of Somerset, might justly claim it in her right, as next heir to Henry, who had no issue.

II. That he had received money and promises from the duke of Orleans, to induce the king to agree to his release, that he might assist Charles in the recovery of France.

III. That he had encouraged the French king to break the truce, and renew the war in Normandy.

IV. That he had, without sufficient authority, promised to yield le Maine; and, after his return, performed that promise, in consequence of which the English were deprived of the province of Normandy.

V. That he betrayed the secrets of the king's council, to the count de Dunois and other French ambassadors.

VI. That he had acquainted them with the state of all the French fortresses belonging to the English.

VII. That he disclosed the secret instructions of the English ambassadors, and sent to treat of a peace between the two crowns.

VIII. That he had boasted his interest was as good at the French court as here.

IX. That he had received bribes from the enemy, for preventing reinforcements being sent to the continent; and, in the truce which he made, not only omitted to comprehend the king of Arragon, the old ally of England, but included the duke of Brittany, as ally of France; a circumstance which had deprived the English of that assistance which they might otherwise have derived from the friendship of that prince.

The lords presented this bill of articles against the duke of Suffolk to Henry on the twelfth of February, and were for giving a copy thereof to the judges for their consultation and opinion; but he desired that this might be respited till he should be otherwise advised. Thus the matter rested for near a month, till the seventh of March, when the greatest part of the lords agreed that Suffolk should be called to his answer; but the commons, fearful that they should find it very difficult to bring the peers to find him guilty, as many of the king's counsellors had been parties in the measures of which he was accused, by approving them, they therefore framed a fresh set of articles against him, and such as more immediately affected his person, independent of any other privy-counsellor: those articles, however, amounted only to misdemeanors. In these they accused him,

I. Of having, in quality of a privy-counsellor, persuaded the king to make such lavish grants of the crown lands, that a sufficient fund was not left for defraying the expences of the household.

II. Of having obtained grants of privileges and franchises, to obstruct the execution of the laws, and screen offenders from justice.

III. Of having procured for the capital de Buche, his son in law, the earldom of Kendal, and lands in Guienne to the value of a thousand pounds a year, taken by force from the lawful owners.

IV. Of having prevailed upon the king to alienate so many castles and lordships in Guienne, as had greatly weakened the power of the crown in that country.

V. Of having acquainted the French court with the secret negociation for concluding a treaty between England and the count of Armagnac; by which means the project was defeated, the count ruined, and the Gascon lords oppressed, until they were obliged to submit to the French government.

VI. Of having procured offices and commands in France and Normandy for unqualified persons.

VII. Of

VII. Of having advised the king to grant a toll on wine and merchandize brought down the Seine, to Peter de Brezé, an enemy to the English nation.

VIII. Of having procured, without the consent of the council, a grant of Evreux, Longueville, and other signories in Normandy, for the count de Dunois, Pressigny, and the said Brezé; grants, in consequence of which the great towns were taken without opposition.

IX. Of having brought the France ambassadors to a private conference with Henry, in which he agreed to a personal interview with Charles, and other articles stipulated without the knowlege or consent of the privy-council.

X. Of having misapplied and embezzled subsidies.

XI. Of having given thirteen hundred pounds of the public money to the queen of France, and very considerable sums to the ministers of Charles.

XII. Of having divided, between himself and his adherents, sixty thousand pounds, being the produce of subsidies left in the Exchequer by the lord Sudely, when he resigned his post of treasurer.

XIII. Of having procured for himself a grant of the county of Pembroke, the reversion of Haverfordwest, and other castles in Wales, together with the wardship and marriage of Margaret, daughter of John, duke of Somerset.

XIV. Of having embezzled the bonds of the duke of Burgundy, and other persons, bound for the ransom of the duke of Orleans.

XV. XVI. XVII. XVIII. And of having likewise embezzled writs, prevented justice, maintained bad causes, and weakened the ancient friendship subsisting between the crown of England and the princes of the empire.

The same day that these additional articles were presented, Suffolk was brought to the parliament-chamber before the lords, and required to give in his answer. He desired a copy of the articles; and the Tower of London being thought too remote, he was, for the greater dispatch and readiness, committed to a tower in the royal palace of Westminster. Being sent for by the lords, on Friday the thirteenth of March, to give in his answer, he kneeled down, and made a general one to the nine articles of high-treason, asserting them to be false and groundless; but more particularly to the first, he maintained, "that it was impossible that article should be true, since the lady Margaret was not next heir to the crown by law; and that several lords (to whom he appealed) were privy to his design of marrying his son to the duke of Warwick's daughter, if she had lived: as to the rest, he referred to acts of the council and parliament, and to the king's orders, for his justification, and particularly with regard to the release of Anjou and the giving up of Maine, to which other lords, he said, were privy and assenting as well as himself: that he had not spoken the words in the form as represented in the eighth article, but to a different intent."

On the seventeenth of March, Henry sent for all the lords, spiritual and temporal, that were in town, to his chamber. Suffolk being brought before them, kneeled down, and the chancellor asking him what he had to say for himself, he again protested he was innocent, affirmed the articles to be false, and submitted himself to the king's pleasure. Then the chancellor gave him to understand, "that the king did not hold him convicted on the first bill of articles of high-treason; and as to the second, charging him with misprisions and misdemeanors, the king, by virtue of his submission, out of his own royal motive, and not by way of judgment, banished him the realm for the term of five years, during which he should not abide in France, or any country under the French dominion; nor should he, by word, deed, or writing, by himself or his adherents, shew malice to the commons in parliament."

This transaction, which was certainly a furious stretch of prerogative, occasioned, on the part of the lords, a very strong protest; a proof that the exercise of protesting is much older than is imagined. This protest was entered by the viscount Beaumont, importing, "that the sentence pronounced on the duke of Suffolk was not the result of their advice, but purely the king's own act, which should not at all derogate from their liberties in case of peerage*."

The duke of Suffolk bore his sentence without repining; nay, rather looked upon his banishment as the surest method of securing him from the fury of the people; besides, he did not doubt of being recalled as soon as the present storm should be a little blown over: he therefore made all expedition to prepare himself for his departure, and soon after embarked at Ipswich for Flanders; but the vessel being brought to, in the Channel, by an English man of war, named the St. Nicholas of the Tower †, and it being discovered that Suffolk was on board, the captain of the man of war, who had imbibed the current hatred to the duke, took him on board his ship, and putting into Dover road, he there instantly caused his head to be struck off. His body, being thrown upon the sands near Dover, was taken up and interred in the collegiate church of Wingfield, in Suffolk ‡.

The commons were so displeased at being thus baffled in their impeachment, and at seeing a corrupt minister, whose crimes they thought deserved the severest punishment, sheltered by the unconstitutional interposition of regal authority, that, though they continued to sit for some time after Suffolk's sentence, and the crown was never in greater necessity, they would not grant a supply. Upon this the parliament was prorogued to the twenty-ninth of April, at Leicester, in hopes they would meet in a more compliable humour; but the contrary happened, and they began, the very first day of their session, to examine into the management of the revenue and household expences of the crown; and finding it very heavily in debt, they declared they were utterly unable to raise the necessary sum for making good the same, and advised a resumption of all grants made by the king since the first day of his accession. They were proceeding in this manner, when news came of the untimely fate of the duke of Suffolk: the death of this detested minister seems somewhat to have mollified the commons, for they granted a subsidy at the end of the session, though far short of the wants of the court.

The parliament had scarcely broken up before the discontents of the people appeared in various commotions in different parts of the kingdom. A desperate fellow called Thomas Thany, but nicknamed Bluebeard, had attempted, in the beginning of the year, to raise an insurrection in Kent, but had been taken and executed at Canterbury; but these petty commotions served only as the prelude to a great scene of national calamity, which we are now to open.

The duke of York, who still remained in Ireland, being, by Suffolk's fate, freed from a powerful antagonist, and though he himself was absent from England, yet his friends served him effectually by extolling his merit, and representing to the people the king's incapacity, and the queen's maladministration, not without seasonable hints of the fitness of the duke of York to be at least regent of the kingdom, both on account of his blood, and his abilities, and that nothing else could save the nation, or retrieve her credit and glory.

These discourses, added to the alarming reports of the court's sending an army to lay waste the whole county of Kent, in revenge for the duke of Suffolk's murder, committed by one of that county, had put the inhabitants there into such a ferment, that every thing seemed ripe for a revolt. At this time there dwelt, or rather skulked about, in those parts a desperate fellow called John or (more commonly) Jack Cade, a native of Ireland, who, having been outlawed for a rape and murder committed by him in Suffex, had taken sanctuary, and been forced to abjure the realm. This fellow, who did not want sense, hoped to enrich himself by the disturbances he saw on the point of breaking out; and observing that the country-people, uneasy under the present government, were continually talking of one of the house of Mortimer as the right heir of the crown, and the only person who could redress their present sufferings, Cade assumed to himself the name of John Mortimer, pretending that he was a son of sir John Mortimer, who had been beheaded in the beginning of this reign, and consequently a near relation to Richard, duke of York, the popularity of whose name he doubted not would procure him a number of followers. This seems to have been the only reason for suspecting the duke of York of having any way encouraged this insurrection, founded chiefly on events which he could not foresee, and raised by a man he did not know, whilst himself was at a distance in Ireland. The present disposition of the greatest part of the nation with regard to the court, aiding this bold and artful rebel in his design he soon found himself at the head of such a numerous train of followers, that he was enabled to advance as far as Blackheath, giving out as he advanced, that he was coming to reform the government, and ease the people of their taxes.

Henry being apprized of this proceeding, sent a message to the insurgents, demanding the reason of their hostile appearance: Cade replied, that they had no design to hurt the person of the king, but only desired to present a petition to the parliament, that the evil ministers, who oppressed the people, might be removed from the royal presence. At the same time he gave the deputies two papers, setting forth the grievances of the nation: among other things, they prayed that the duke of Somerset might be punished, as being the principal author of the loss of Normandy: that the king's council might be filled with the princes of the blood, and other prudent and judicious persons; and not with vicious and profligate men of ill principles and manners, and utterly incapable of managing the affairs of state: in a word, these petitions, which are to be found at large in Stowe, appear to have been the composition of heads much better furnished than those of the rabble who attended their low-bred leader. It is not improbable that some of the duke of York's friends and agents, thinking this insurrection favourable for their purpose, might have secretly abetted Cade with their assistance and advice: thus much is certain, that the grievances they complained of, were but too well founded. The government, however, deeming itself highly insulted by those petitions, resolved to quell the rebellion by force of arms; and an army of fifteen thousand disciplined men were sent against the insurgents, under the command of sir Humphrey Stafford (a cousin of Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham.) Cade, affecting to be afraid of this general's approach, retired to Sevenoak; and Stafford following him too incautiously, fell into an ambush, which the artful rebel had prepared for the purpose, and a great number of his men being cut to pieces, the rest sought their safety in flight, leaving their commander lifeless on the field.

Cade, animated by this success, returned to Blackheath on the twenty-ninth of June, from whence he again sent petitions to the king and council, demanding, "that the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, should be recalled to court; that the murderers of the good duke Humphrey (Glocester), with all who had contributed to the loss of the English territories abroad, might be punished; that the lord Say, the treasurer, and his son-in-law, Cromer, high sheriff of Kent, might be taken into custody, the grievances of the nation be redressed, and the authors of them brought to condign punishment." The government, alarmed at the late defeat of their troops, and well knowing the duke of York's secret friends were by this time on the point of declaring themselves openly, resolved, if possible, to purchase its general safety by the sacrifice of some particulars; Say and Cromer were committed to the Tower, and the archbishop of Canterbury and the duke of Buckingham were sent to treat with Cade and his followers. They found him very complaisant, but resolute not to lay down his arms until the king should in person come and grant their requests. The archbishop and the duke, on their return, reported this conference so little to the encouragement of the court, that the king and queen, leaving the Tower under the command of the lord Scales and sir Matthew Gough, set out for Kenilworth castle.

Cade no sooner heard of their retreat, than he directed his march towards London: the citizens, alarmed at the success of the rebels, opened the gates at their approach, and Cade entered in triumph at the head of his troops, and had the insolence to strike his sword against London-stone, uttering these words, "Now is Mortimer lord of London!" However, he forbade his men, on most severe severe penalties, to be guilty of any outrage, or to give the inhabitants the least cause of offence; this gave the citizens a very favourable opinion of him; but it was not long before the mask dropped off, and rebellion stood avowed in all its diabolical colours.

For, on the third of July, the day after their entering the city, the rebels sent to demand that the lord Say and Cromer should be brought from the Tower; and the constable was mean enough to comply with this demand, and Cade caused them both to be put to death, without any form of trial; after which the rebels retired to the borough of Southwark. For some days Cade continued the practice of entering the city in the morning and quitting it at night, that he might not give umbrage to the inhabitants, with whom he and his followers lived at first in very good understanding; but the insurgents having plundered the houses and effects of two wealthy aldermen, even after they had entertained Cade at their tables with bounteous hospitality, and growing daily more and more licentious, the citizens plainly saw there was a necessity of uniting with the king's troops in the Tower, for their common preservation: for this they took the opportunity of Cade's return by night to Southwark; and the mayor and aldermen sent a message to the lord Scales, offering to arm the citizens, and guard the bridge against the return of the rebels, if he would support them with a detachment from the Tower. The lord Scales thereupon sent sir Matthew Gough with the detachment, upon which the citizens, immediately rising, seized upon the bridge, and cut off the rebel party that guarded it.

Cade and his followers returning the next morning, as usual, found the bridge gate shut and barricadoed against them; attempting to force a passage, a battle ensued between them and the citizens, both sides maintaining the fight with equal obstinacy until night put an end to the conflict: Gough himself, with the aldermen Sutton and Hazard, lost their lives.

The archbishop of Canterbury and the chancellor, who was then the archbishop of York, and had both taken refuge in the Tower, being informed by their emissaries that the insurgents were greatly dispirited by this repulse, drew up a general pardon for the rebels, provided they would lay down their arms; as also one for Cade in particular, if he would desist from his rebellious projects; these pardons they confirmed by putting the great seal to them, which was in the archbishop of York's custody, and found means to publish them by night in the borough of Southwark. This wise and critical measure had amazing success, for the next day Cade saw himself abandoned by the greater number of his followers, and retreated to Rochester, where the rest of them dispersed, notwithstanding all his remonstrances and artful speeches, in which he endeavoured to persuade them, that the pardon which had been sent them, being without authority of parliament, was of no effect: but, unable to keep them together, Cade fled into the Wild of Suffex, with a few who chose to share his fate; and Alexander Iden (or Eden), at that time sheriff of Kent, with the posse comitatus, attacked and took him, after a most obstinate defence, in which he received several mortal wounds, of which he soon after expired. Iden sending up his head to London, was, for this service, made governor of Rochester castle, besides receiving a gratuity from the court of a thousand marks.

While the peace of England was interrupted by this and other insurrections, the war continued in France, but still to the disadvantage of the English. The indefatigable Charles had continued his winter-campaign to the month of March this year; and though the season was excessively severe, he kept the field in person, and acted with so much courage and intrepidity, that he obliged the garrison of Harfleur to surrender, though consisting of two thousand men, and to give up the two towers of Havre de Grace, which the English had built to command the mouth of the Seine. Thus, when the French army went into quarters, the latter end of the month of March, the English possessed in Normandy but few places of importance besides Caen, Bayeux, Cherbourg, Vere, and Falaise.

These losses made the English ministry think at last of sending over succours. Sir Thomas Kyrle (Kiriel some of our historians call him) landed in the spring, with about four thousand men, at Cherbourg; and being reinforced from the neighbouring garrisons, took Valanges, after a siege of three weeks; but being defeated, and taken prisoner with about fourteen hundred of his men, by the count de Clermont and the constable de Richemont, in a pitched battle, near Fourmigny, the loss of the rest of Normandy seemed inevitable: above three thousand English were slain in that action, drawn a great part of them from the garrisons of Vere, Bayeux, and St. Sauveur le Vicomte, all which places fell thereupon an easy prey to the victors, together with Valanges, Avranches, and Tombelaine.

Charles, eager for completing the reduction of Normandy, and the way being open to Caen, that place was invested on the fifth of June, by the constable and the count de Clermont, assisted by the famous Dunois and a numerous army. The duke of Somerset was shut up in the place, and had with him four thousand men, inured to service; but the besiegers, having a proportionable force, made such vigorous attacks, that, on the fifteenth day of the siege, the duke capitulated to surrender the place, if not relieved by the first of July, the duke and the garrison being allowed to retire, with all their effects, to England. Upon the very day that Charles made his public entry into Caen, Xaintrailles invested Falaise with part of the French army, as the constable and the count de Clermont did Cherbourg with another part. Falaise belonged to the earl of Shrewsbury, who still remained a prisoner in the hands of the French; and this garrison, in fifteen days, was obliged to capitulate: one of the articles granted them was, that their master, the earl of Shrewsbury, should be set at liberty. Two days after the reduction of Falaise, the French laid siege to Domfront, which surrendered on the tenth of August: and the taking of Cherbourg, which submitted on the twelfth of the same month, completed the entire conquest of Normandy, all effected within the space of a year, though there were an hundred fortified towns and castles in that province.

The dissensions of the English nation doubtless furnish one obvious cause for their losing Normandy; but we think it is going rather too far to say, with many of our English historians, that this loss was was contrived between the French king and the queen of England, or at least connived at by the latter. It cannot, with propriety, be supposed, that a princess of such spirit, discernment, and ambition, should not have looked upon her husband's glory as her own, and to have preferred his interests to those of France, to which she was now an alien: we may rather suppose, that as all things return easily into their natural channel, when the force which diverted their course is removed, this easy and rapid conquest was owing in a great degree to the affection the Normans had to the French government, and their aversion to the English.

But the case was the very reverse in respect to Guienne, the conquest of which Charles now undertook: the Gascons, who had lived so long under the English government, were not near so averse to it as the Normans; and the country itself was situated at a greater distance from the seat of Charles's power; nevertheless, the conquest of this province, though more difficult than that of Normandy, was at length effected, the tide of success continuing to run rapidly in favour of the French. In the next month after Cherbourg was taken, the count de Dunois, entering Guienne with a numerous army, reduced Bergerac, and Jonzac, on the Dodogne, together with Montferand, St. Foix, and Chalons; but the winter-season setting in severely, the French were obliged to desist from pursuing their conquests, and to retire into winter quarters: and thus ended this year, no less fortunate to the French and disgraceful to the English than the preceding.

When the duke of Somerset returned to England, he found the parliament sitting, and the outcry against him was so loud and universal, that the commons could not help taking some notice of his conduct: they preferred an address against him, in which they desired the king that he might be sent to the Tower, till he should give an account of his conduct in France. The court, desirous to keep well with the parliament, acquiesced in their desire, and the duke was accordingly taken into custody: in the mean time, the mob, rising in a tumult, plundered his house at Black-friars, demolishing what they could not carry off. The commons next petitioned Henry to remove from his presence Edmund, duke of Somerset; Alice, duchess dowager of Suffolk; William Booth, bishop of Chester; John Sutton, lord Dudley; and others: but Henry amused them with an equivocal answer. Then they brought in an act of attainder against the late duke of Suffolk; but this act was rejected by the king; and the humour of the commons growing every day more and more obstinate, the parliament was dissolved in the beginning of June, 1451, after having sat from the sixth of November in the preceding year, without having granted any supply. Immediately after their separation, the duke of Somerset was released, and made, in the duke of Buckingham's stead, governor of Calais, a post of the greatest trust, power, and profit belonging to the crown of England.

This was all brought about by the queen's management, in whose favour and confidence the duke had succeeded Suffolk; and she was continually representing to the king, that Somerset was the only man that could ballance the power of the duke of York, concerning whom the court began now to grow very uneasy. The term of that prince's government in Ireland being near expired, and his friends having given out, with a confidence that had something alarming in it, that he would soon come over to England, where he would not be a quiet spectator of the mismanagement of the queen and her cabal, it was thought necessary to take every precaution to secure her power: with this view she prevailed on the king to send orders to all the officers on the sea coast to oppose the duke of York's landing, should he attempt it with any considerable number of attendants.

This was a very impolitic precaution, as it not only published the apprehensions the court entertained of the duke of York's credit and influence, which it was their interest to conceal, but it alarmed the duke so as to put him upon his guard, and furnished him with a plausible pretext for taking up arms afterwards for his own defence. When the time of his government in Ireland was expired, he embarked for England; but when he would have landed at Beaumaris, in the Isle of Anglesey, in Wales, he was refused admittance; notwithstanding all the vigilance of the sheriffs, he found an opportunity of landing in another place without opposition, and repaired to London, where he was to hold a meeting with his friends, in order to confer with them in relation to his interests, and the plan he had formed, of ascending a throne to which he pretended a better right than its present possessor.

The court being on a progress to the western counties, the confederates had an opportunity of concerting their measures without molestation, and the state of public affairs at this time gave but too plausible an handle for cabals of this kind. But before we proceed to give an account of the proceedings of this junto, it will not be amiss to sketch some outlines of the characters and connections of those who formed it, as this will serve to shew us the motives and causes which induced them to declare in favour of Richard, duke of York, against Henry VI.

The family of Neville was at this time, as well by the large estates possessed by its different branches, as from the valour and abilities of the several noblemen placed at their heads, one of the most powerful that ever appeared in England; for, not to mention the earl of Westmoreland, the chief of the family, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, the lords Latimer, Fauconbridge, and Abergavenny were of that name, and were of themselves, on many accounts, the most potent barons in the kingdom.

Richard Neville, earl of Salisbury, brother-in-law to the duke of York (who had married his sister Cicely), was the eldest son, by a second marriage, of the earl of Westmoreland, and enjoyed, in right of his wife Alicia, daughter and heiress of Thomas de Montacute, earl of Salisbury, killed at the siege of Orleans, the title and estate of that great family. He was a person of consummate knowledge, wisdom, and experience, and had gained in the wars of France an high reputation for his valour and conduct in the service; he was likewise governor of Carlisle, and warden of the East and West Marches towards Scotland.

His eldest son, Richard Neville, had espoused Anne, daughter and heiress of Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, who died governor of France, and possessed the title and estate of that ancient family, mily, which, in point of wealth, antiquity, and influence, was inferior to none. But these two noblemen depended less upon the largeness of their estates and the splendor of their families, than upon their own personal merits and abilities: Warwick in particular (who, from the great share he had in the ensuing revolutions, was commonly distinguished by the title of the King-maker) was the most popular man of his age, and deserved all the popularity he enjoyed, as well by his bravery in war, as his hospitality in peace, by his strict adherence to the principles of honour and virtue, and his declared hatred and aversion to every kind of treachery and deceit, and by his frank, open, and generous behaviour: in a word, the prodigious number of his tenants, attached to him by the obligation of their tenure, the splendor of his manner of living, the tenor of his conduct, the nobleness of his spirit, and his many amiable qualities, joined to an excellent understanding, rendered him at once the object of respect and love to the whole nation.

Besides the family of Neville, the duke of York had many other friends among the great nobility: John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, espoused his cause, on account of his being the son of Catherine, sister to the earl of Salisbury, but more from a resentment of his father's wrongs, who had been banished by the house of Lancaster; and those of his uncle, who had been beheaded in the reign of Henry IV. Courtney, earl of Devonshire, sprung from the royal blood of France, was warmly attached to the same cause, out of resentment to the duke of Somerset, whose sister he had married, and who had nevertheless given him great cause of disgust. Edward Brook, baron of Cobham, was another member of this confederacy, but it does not appear what induced him to declare against Henry VI.

The head and animating principle of these, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, was a man of courage and capacity, prudent in his conduct, and gentle in his disposition: in right of his father, the earl of Cambridge, beheaded in the reign of Henry V. he enjoyed the rank of the first prince of the blood; and by his station he added a fresh lustre to his title, derived from the family of Mortimer, which, though one of the most ancient in the kingdom, was equalled by other families, and was eclipsed by the royal descent of the house of Lancaster. By the union of the estates of Cambridge, Mortimer, Clarence, and Ulster, he was possessed of an immense fortune; and by his marriage with Cæcilia, daughter of Ralph Neville, earl of Westmoreland, he had greatly increased his interest among the nobility, and procured many strong connections in that formidable body*.

But, notwithstanding this prince's great power and interest, the reigning family was by no means destitute of friends and adherents: the earl of Northumberland was attached to the present government: the earl of Westmoreland, notwithstanding his connections with the duke of York, and with the family of Neville, of which he was the head, leaned to the side of Henry; and by means of these two noblemen, the whole North of England, the most warlike part of the kingdom, was engaged in the cause of the house of Lancaster. Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerset, and his brother Henry, were zealous friends of that party; as were likewise Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, John Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, and the lords Clifford, Dudley, Scales, Audley, and many other noblemen.

It behoved the duke of York, therefore, to proceed with great caution in the mighty work he had undertaken, and, before he appeared personally in support of his pretensions, to prepare the nation, by rendering the royal family and its favourites as obnoxious to it as possible. It was with this view that the present consultation between the duke and his family had been held; and the result of their deliberations were, to proceed in all their schemes with submission to the royal person and authority, but at the same time to make alarming representations of the grievances of the nation: it was resolved that the duke of York should write a respectful letter to the king, laying before him "the abuses of the government through evil counsels; and offering himself as an assistant to the king, in bringing the authors of the late disgraces which had befallen the English arms, to justice, and the duke of Somerset in particular, who, having been impeached by the commons, was restored to favour without any examination."

It was easy for the ministry to perceive the duke of York sought an occasion to quarrel; but, as their present situation required them to act with precaution, it was judged proper that the king should send a civil answer, as the most effectual method of disappointing his designs. Accordingly the king, in a letter to the duke, told him, "that he had been sensible, for some time, of the necessity of reforming the government, and proposed nominating a council for that purpose, of which the duke of York should be the head; and that, until this could be done, such precautions should be used, as that the duke of Somerset should be ready, when called upon, to take his trial." It was supposed that such an instance of condescension would have deprived the duke of York of all pretence of taking up arms; but this answer was declared unsatisfactory by the cabal, and they resolved to proceed in their scheme early in the ensuing spring.

While these things were transacting in England, the king of France, having raised money for defraying the expences of the approaching campaign, gave the command of the army, which was to act in Guienne, and consisted of forty thousand good troops, to the count de Dunois and Longueville. That general, taking the field in May this year, presently made himself master of Montguyon, Blaye, Bourg, Fronsac, Libourne, and Castillon, in Périgord; Bourdeaux was likewise surrendered by capitulation, because not relieved before Midsummer. The same was the case with all places in that neighbourhood: Dax was reduced by the counts of Foix and Armagnac; and, on the first of August, the city of Bayonne was invested by the count de Dunois. The castle was defended by sir John Beaumont, but it was so vigorously pressed, that he was obliged to surrender himself and all his men prisoners of war. The town was then summoned, and the French inhabitants obliged the rest to demand a capitulation likewise, which was granted; and on the twenty-ninth of August the place was given up.

Thus the whole province of Guienne fell under the dominion of Charles, after it had been united three hundred years to the crown of England, and had for above double that time been dismembered from that of France. It is certain that the great towns were well affected to the English government, and dreaded the oppression of the French, and yet the whole province was conquered even in less time than that of Normandy; but the great lords, tempted with the hopes of preferment at the court of France, co-operated with the efforts of Charles in wresting this county from the king of England, who was now dispossessed of every foot of land which his ancestors had acquired in France, except Calais and its dependencies.

This event, though at that time esteemed the most disgraceful and unhappy that could have befallen the nation, will appear different in the eye of a modern Englishman; since it is very certain, that, had an English king entirely subdued France, his constant residence must necessarily have been in that kingdom, not only on account of its being the greater and finer country of the two, but for other political considerations, and particularly because the royal presence there seems to be absolutely requisite, for the retaining so numerous and active a people as the French, in due subjection; England, therefore, would in that event have necessarily become a mere province of the French monarchy, than which nothing could have been more ungrateful or disadvantageous to this nation, as well in respect of its commerce and opulence, as of the liberty and independence of the people. How much soever, therefore, most of our historians have exulted on the conquests of Edward III. and Henry V. in France, it must be allowed, that the death of the latter at the juncture it happened, and the expulsion of the English in the feeble reign we are now recording, were real blessings to England, though not so well understood then, as in our days. But to return.

Early in the spring of 1452, the duke of York, who was then in Wales, and his friends, in pursuance of the plan they had concerted the preceding winter, were in motion, and gave out that the reason for their rising was the good of the realm; the release of the oppressed subject; and the bringing to justice a corrupt administration. The people, who were indeed horribly oppressed by the ministry, gladly joined him for effecting such purposes, and he soon saw himself at the head of an army of ten thousand men, with which he began his march towards London. On this occasion the queen and Somerset exerted themselves in a manner York did not expect: for they levied an army in Henry's name, and the duke was no sooner on his march, than he heard that the king was advancing against him; upon which, not chusing to risque a battle, he altered his route, and by forced marches, got before him, and presented himself at the gates of that capital, which, to his great mortification, he found shut against him, instead of being received therein with open arms as he expected.

It was some days before Henry had intelligence that the duke had got past him; upon which he turned about, and made the best of his way towards London. The duke hearing that the king was so close after him, with a superior army, passed the Thames at Kingston, and, being joined by Thomas Courtney, earl of Devon, and the lord Cobham, encamped on Brentheath, near Dartford, twelve miles from London. He probably made this march into Kent with some expectations of the country rising in his favour; but Henry, having made a progress into that county the preceding year, had put to death several that had been concerned in Cade's rebellion, the people seemed to be so terrified by these examples, that they did not chuse to stir on this occasion. The king followed him close, and, marching over London bridge, encamped on Blackheath.

The duke of Somerset, who attended the king on this occasion, and seems to have been an able man, advised Henry to crush this rebellion in its nest, and not to wait till it should gather strength to become formidable: he observed, that this was the time, as the chief and the fomentor of it was yet weak, and might be attacked with ease and success, to rid himself of all future uneasiness, by giving his rival battle, as the great superiority of the royal army ensured a victory: but Henry was so impolitic to neglect this counsel, and to listen to the advice of some timid, or perhaps treacherous, noblemen, to apply to the ways of negotiation. This counsel suited best with Henry's pacific genius, and with that aversion he always entertained to spilling his subjects blood. A commission was given to the bishops of Winchester and Ely, and the earls of Warwick and Salisbury to go and know the reasons of the duke's appearing in arms, or upon what terms he would lay them down.

This treating saved York: the two lay commissioners from the king were his intimate friends, though they had not yet declared themselves. York put on a shew of great respect and moderation on this occasion: he urged the bringing to justice the duke of Somerset, and others of the council, who had made it their business to trample on the nobility and clergy, and to oppress the poor people, as the motive of his taking up arms; and offered to disband his forces, and throw himself at Henry's feet, if they were taken into custody, and brought to answer the crimes he was ready to prove against them in parliament. The duke certainly did not expect his demand would be granted, since the king and queen were solely guided by him who was most concerned to have it rejected; and he hoped, from a refusal on the part of the court, to load them with all the blame, and to demonstrate to the people, that the ministry, rather than part with their power, would expose the nation to all the horrors of a civil war. But here he was, for once, the dupe of his own policy: Henry took him at his word; Somerset was put under confinement, and the duke of York deprived, by this condescension, of all excuses for keeping up an armed force, dismissed his troops on the first of March, and, as a test of his sincerity, came to court unarmed, unattended, and without a passport: when he came into Henry's presence, he openly professed the cause of his taking arms, and insisted upon the duke of Somerset's being immediately brought to trial, when, to his great astonishment, that minister (who had been arrested in shew, but immediately after set at liberty) stepped forth from a private closet in the presence-chamber, and, bitterly reviling York for his treasonable practices, the other

other replied, and both parties poured out a torrent of indecent invectives even before the king: but the duke of York, finding that he had been duped, and was now entirely at the mercy of his enemies, out of regard to his own safety, moderated his pretensions.

Had Somerset had his will, the duke would have been instantly put to death; but the more dispassionate of the council were fearful of carrying matters with too high an hand, and their advice prevailing, no violence was offered to his person: and, indeed, any attempt of that kind would probably have occasioned very disagreeable consequences to the government. The duke of York was the idol of the people, who would not have failed to revenge his death upon the authors of it, however dignified by rank, or secured by authority. He had likewise many friends in the king's army, whom it would not have been prudent to incense at the present juncture of affairs; besides, his son Edward, earl of Marche, a brave sprightly young nobleman, was actually in arms on the borders of Wales, and the offering any violence to his father would be a sufficient motive for him to declare immediate war against the government. From these, and the like considerations, it was resolved to dismiss the duke of York, on condition that he should, in St. Paul's church, make a formal submission to the king, and acknowledge his title by oath, the tenor of which condemned his late proceedings; but Richard, glad to get himself out of the hands of the court upon any terms, readily acquiesced, and the ceremony was performed on the tenth of March, before most of the principal lords of the kingdom*: and then the duke of York retired to his castle of Wigmore, on the borders of Wales, leaving Somerset master at court, and director of all public affairs.

But there was another incident which contributed to York's release: the turbulent Gascons had sent deputies into England, offering to revolt from the French government, if they were properly supported. As the court had no money to defray the expence of a civil war, which the duke of York's death might have occasioned, and as the supporting the Gascons was the only popular pretext by which they could get money from the parliament, it was resolved to make their revenge give way to their more immediate interest.

The purport of the embassy from Guienne being laid before the council, and approved of there, the earl of Shrewsbury received a commission constituting him governor of all Guienne, with very full powers. The public having vast expectations from the abilities of this great general, he soon got together five thousand men, with whom he landed on the isle of Medon, in the beginning of September; and, being joined by the lord of l'Epais, soon made himself master of that country. Bourdeaux, which had already begun to feel the burden of French taxes, opened her gates to him; and all the Bourdelois followed her example: in a word, the English arms were attended with a train of conquests as rapid as those of the French had been against the English in the same country. Old Talbot, being joined by a reinforcement of four thousand men, under his son the lord Lisle, from England, he closed the year with the reduction of Fronfac and Chastillon, on the Dodogne; while all the French king could do this winter, was to dispatch the marshal de Jalognes, and some other officers, for the security of the places yet unsubdued, till the count de Clermont, his governor of Guienne, could take the field with an army in the spring.

By the month of March, 1453, the last-mentioned nobleman had gathered together an army of twenty-two thousand men; with a detachment of these the marshal de Lohac undertook the siege of Chastillon, while Chalais was taken by assault. It was the fifteenth of July before the French army formed the siege of Chastillon; on hearing of which the earl of Shrewsbury advanced, with eight or ten thousand men, to relieve the place, and, on the twentieth of that month, early in the morning, drove the French out of their post in an adjoining abbey, the body which defended it making their retreat to their main body, strongly encamped in the park of Chastillon. Talbot would never have thought of attacking them there, but being deceived by a false account that the enemy were retiring in great disorder, he marched up to their camp; and though, upon his approach, finding the intelligence false, he would have retreated in time, yet being unable to restrain the ardour of his troops, he set the best face upon the matter, and gave orders for attacking the entrenchments. The contest, which was extremely bloody, lasted for near three hours; and though the enemy's artillery made a terrible havock among the English, the latter continued the attack with that intrepid resolution for which they have been always so noted, and the fortune of the day seemed at last ready to declare for them: but a body of Bretons, all of them cavalry, who had never yet been engaged, passing their own entrenchments on the opposite side, took a compass, and fell upon the rear of the English just time enough to prevent the overthrow of the French.

The old English general now saw the total defeat of his troops inevitable; he found himself hemmed in on every side, while the French, having new pointed their artillery, plied him with greater fury than ever. At length, after having his horse shot dead under him by a cannon-ball, he himself was transfixed to the ground by a spear, which put an end to his life. His gallant son, the lord Lisle, after many acts of courage, was killed by his father's side, the generous youth disdaining to seek safety by flight. The English now looked upon themselves as a desolated herd; each shifted for himself, some towards Chastillon, and others towards Bourdeaux.

Thus fell Talbot, the brave earl of Shrewsbury, the honour of England's arms for the last twenty-five years of his life, who, in matters of war during that time, had no equal among his countrymen. Besides the earl and his son, sir Henry Talbot, the earl's bastard brother, with sir Edward Hall and about twelve hundred English, fell in this battle and pursuit: the lord Molyens and about sixty soldiers were taken prisoners†.

The consequences of this defeat were very fatal to the English interest, for Chastillon surrendered the next day; and Charles VII. coming up with the rest of his forces, several places were besieged at the same time; but few of them made any re-stance, except Cadillac, which was taken at last by assault: St. Millian, Libourne, St. Macaire, Langon, Fronzac, Rious, Chateaneuf, and other places, despairing of relief, submitted readily; and in the mean while the blockade of Bourdeaux was formed both by sea and land, under the marshal de Loheac, the count de Penthievre, and other French officers. The garrison held out till the seventeenth of October, when the besieged, being miserably distressed by famine, and without the least prospect of being relieved, desired to capitulate, which Charles, with his accustomed moderation, granted, and even agreed that the English might have liberty to depart, with all their substance, safely into England or Calais, and the Gascons enjoy their goods and possessions. The surrender of Bourdeaux completed the conquest of Guienne, and all hopes of reannexing that duchy to the crown of England were for ever extinguished.

Whilst the French were thus successfully employing their arms on the continent, Henry was, towards the beginning of this year, seized with a long and dangerous illness, during which the queen and Somerset ruled every thing more absolutely than ever. This, added to the news of the misfortunes in France, arriving in England, blew the discontent of the people into a violent flame: they exclaimed with great virulence against the treachery and misconduct of the ministry, who had neglected to furnish the earl of Shrewsbury with the necessary reinforcements. The court and the country of England were filled with the duke of York's friends, who did not fail to keep up the ill humours of the nation as the most likely means of bring about their own ends. But the duke's hopes received a violent blow, by the queen's being delivered of a son (named Edward), on the thirteenth of October. This event destroyed all prospect of the quiet succession of the duke of York, who was otherwise, in the right of his father, and by the laws enacted since the accession of the house of Lancaster, next heir to the crown, and rather tended to widen than repair the breach between the two parties, and the duke of York was now reduced to employ his natural and acquired interest for obtaining his end.

We have already given the characters of some of the nobility who were attached to his interest: the two principal of these, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, did not chuse to declare themselves till they could be sure of a majority in the council; and advised the duke of York likewise carefully to conceal his aim, at the present juncture, beneath the mask of submission and quiet demeanor; the frankness wherewith he had disbanded his troops, and his late oath to the king, having lulled the court into a perfect security on his account.

The parliament, which had been summoned in the beginning of this year, had been several times prorogued, on account of the king's illness: the secret friends of the duke of York laid hold of this interval to insinuate to the queen and Somerset (who thought them to be of the court party), that, considering the present disposition of the people, they had very little reason to expect much complaisance from the parliament, but, on the contrary, there were good grounds for supposing, that it would, in compliance with the sense of the nation, appoint a new ministry: in order to prevent this misfortune, they observed, that it would be necessary to admit into the council the duke of York, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and some other popular noblemen, to convince the public that they had no intention to make their own wills the sole rule of government. This advice appeared so plausible, that the queen and her favourite ran headlong into the snare, and these noblemen were appointed members of the council before the meeting of the parliament, which, after repeated prorogations, was to sit on the fourteenth of February, 1454; but, as soon as the duke of York and his cabal got a footing in the council, they found means to have it yet farther adjourned to the fifteenth of March, in order to gain time to concert measures with the members; meanwhile the Yorkists, who, from the instant they gained admission into the cabinet, superseded the credit of their adversaries, began to renew their prosecution against Somerset, and even ventured to arrest him in the queen's chamber, and from thence sent him to the Tower.

The king still continuing so ill as to be unfit even for the shadow of business, the council, now entirely at the duke of York's devotion, taking into consideration the destructive state of the kingdom, and Henry's helpless condition, thought it necessary to appoint the duke of York, by a commission, dated the thirteenth of February, 1454, lieutenant of the kingdom, with powers to open and hold the ensuing session in the king's name. He made use of this great power to the full: the office of chancellor being then vacant by the death of Kemp, archbishop of Canterbury, he conferred the same upon his friend and ally the earl of Salisbury.

The session opened with a petition from the house of commons, for a conservation of their privileges, and that Thomas Thorpe, their speaker, and Walter Reut, another of their members, might be released and set at liberty: it seems the duke of York had caused them both to be arrested. This petition, however, was refused; and the commons, returning to their house, chose sir Thomas Charleton their speaker. The curious reader will find upon what principles this arrest and detention was founded, under the article of Laws respecting this reign.

The next step of the commons was to appoint the duke of York lord-protector of the realm; and on the third of April, the king's letters patent were issued, confirming him in that title, and also constituting him defender of the kingdom and church of England, and principal counsellor of the king; a post which he readily accepted, being the same titles and power as the duke of Gloucester formerly enjoyed; and a salary of two thousand pounds per annum was allotted him, for the maintenance of his new dignity, and an act passed for investing him, with it (on a supposition of Henry's incapacity) till Edward, prince of Wales, should come to years of discretion. The duke of York, thus possessing all but the name of royalty, in the plenitude of power constituted himself captain-general of Calais, in the room of the duke of Somerset: but the latter, it seems, not chusing to resign that post without an express order from the king, a writ for that purpose was made out, and York was confirmed in the government of Calais by the parliament.

In this parliament Edmund (Tudor) of Hadham, and Jasper (Tudor) of Hatfield, sons of Catherine of France, Henry's mother, by her second husband, Owen Tudor, a gentleman descended from the ancient princes of Wales, were declared the king's uterine brothers, and were created, the first earl of Richmond, and the other earl of Pembroke, with a right of precedence above all other earls, and next to dukes, in all councils and parliaments. To conclude the transactions of this parliament, it seems that the earl of Devonshire, Somerset's son-in-law, was, by the secret practices of the York party, accused of treason, but was honourably acquitted.

The duke of York did not long enjoy the exercise of the new dignity which he procured with so high an hand; for Henry appearing to be a little better, his commission was superseded; Somerset admitted to bail on the fifth of February, 1455; and, on the fourth of March, the king took from the duke of York the command of Calais, which was soon after restored to the duke of Somerset, who re-entered into the administration, and, in conjunction with the queen, directed all the affairs of the realm as formerly, without controul, making use of Henry's name to warrant all his proceedings.

These proceedings, which were all effected by the queen, drove the duke of York once more into arms. Having concerted measures with his friends, he retired again to Wales in order to assemble forces. The proceedings of the court, in releasing the duke of Somerset, without giving the nation any satisfaction, gave him a plausible handle for renewing his former popular pretext of reformation, in which he imagined, from the disposition of the people, he should be strongly supported: nor was he deceived in his expectations; for, in a very short space of time he saw himself at the head of three thousand men, with which force he thought to surprize the king in London; but Henry, aware of his design, marched out of that city to meet the insurgents, though not with more than two thousand men, but all of them brave, and determined to serve their king. The chief officers of the royal army were, Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerset; Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, and the earl of Stafford, his eldest son; Henry Piercy (son of Hotspur), earl of Northumberland; James Butler, earl of Wiltshire and Ormond; John Beaufort, earl of Dorset; Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke; Thomas lord Clifford; the lords Sudley, Barnes, Roos, and other noblemen: with the duke of York were John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk; Richard Neville, earl of Salisbury; Richard Neville, earl of Warwick, his son; William, lord Falconbridge; Edward, lord Cobham, and others.

On the twenty-first of May the royal army lay at Watford; and the next day they reached St. Alban's, where the king took up his head-quarters, in St. Peter's street; while the duke of York and his followers lay encamped at Keyefield. This latter, on his arrival at Royston, in the course of his march, had wrote a letter to the king, with one to the archbishop of Canterbury, desiring him to deliver that for the king into his own hands*; but this was secreted by Somerset and Thorpe†, two of York's sworn enemies, who took it from the archbishop's messenger: in it the confederate lords made strong professions of duty to Henry, and of zeal for his service and the good of the state: and desired "admission to his presence, to vindicate themselves from the calumnies of their enemies, and to lay before him the ill conduct of his ministers, in order to their being brought to examination according to law, and treated as their misdemeanors should be found to deserve." This was also the substance of a demand they sent to the king, on the morning of the twenty-third of May; but Henry, with a spirit he never before discovered, told the duke of York's agents who delivered his message, that he would sooner deliver up his crown than the least soldier in his army, to please a set of such insolent rebels; and that he would treat as a traitor every man that should presume to fight him in the field.

Upon receipt of this answer from the king, the confederates began a furious attack upon the town; and the earl of Warwick, with a body of men, breaking down a garden-wall, which stood between the Key and the Chequer, in Holywell street, a hot dispute ensued between the insurgents and the royal party; while the duke of York, marching up with his division, attacked the vanguard of Henry's army, under the lord Clifford: the king's army, being not only pent up in the town, but inferior in number to that of the duke, was at last totally routed. The duke of Somerset, the earls of Northumberland and Stafford, the lord Clifford, with many knights and gentlemen of great eminence, were killed on the spot: the duke of Buckingham, receiving a wound, retired out of the battle; the earl of Wiltshire, and Thorpe, chancellor of the Exchequer, escaped; and about eight hundred of the king's best troops lay dead on the field of battle. Henry himself was wounded in the neck with an arrow, but was the last to retire from the fight (for he did not naturally want courage, though conscientiously he hated bloodshed), and then took refuge in an adjacent hut: there he was found out by York, Warwick, and Salisbury, who, approaching him with all the external humility imaginable, beseeched him to forgive what they had done, assuring him that, the enemy of the nation and them being now dead, he should hereafter find them the most obedient of his subjects, at the same time requesting him to trust his person with them; which Henry, not able to help himself, complied with, and York, carrying him to London, caused writs to be issued on the twenty-sixth of May, for calling a parliament.

It met on Wednesday, the ninth of July, and sir John Wenlock, who was of the royal party, was chosen speaker. The duke of York appearing in the house, laid before the members a long detail of his conduct: he accused the duke of Somerset, Thorpe, and one William Joseph, with concealing from the king the letters which he and his party had written from Royston, and which, if the king had read, might have prevented what afterwards happened: he declared, that, when he came to St. Alban's, his intention, and that of the lords who were with him, was only to have thrown themselves at the royal feet with their dutiful petition; and that the duke of Somerset's obstructing their access had occasioned the bloodshed which followed. All this was confirmed by deeds procured from the king himself, who was no more at liberty to follow his own counsels in this juncture than when he was under the guardianship of the queen and the duke of Somerset; and, on the twenty-third of July, the duke of York's acquittal, with that of his whole party, was confirmed in full parliament, which was then adjourned to the twelfth of November, at Westminster, after having passed a general pardon for all offences committed before the first day of the session. On this occasion, every prelate present laying his hand on his breast, and every temporal lord taking the king by the hand, renewed their fealty to him*.

The parliament reassembling on the day appointed, the commons presented a petition, praying the lords to move the king "to appoint an able protector and defender of the realm, seeing his highness would not attend the same, and that the commons might have knowledge of him†." Whereupon, five days after, the king signed letters patent, in which he declares, that, "having been petitioned by his parliament to nominate a protector, he appointed the duke of York for that important office; but he should be removed by the parliament, or when the young prince of Wales should be capable of it‡." The duke accepted the post, with the same powers and privileges as before, but with a larger allowance|| for supporting the honour and charge of the dignity.

The immediate occasion or pretence for the petition of the commons for York's being appointed protector, was the hostilities lately committed in the West between the earl of Devon and the lord Bonneville, who had come to an engagement, in which a great number of the followers on each side had been slain, and the whole country was harassed by continual riots and depredations, so that there was an absolute necessity to put a stop to these outrages; and the duke of York being determined to repair thither in person, the parliament was, on the thirteenth of December, prorogued to the fourteenth of January following, having first passed an act for the resumption of all grants since the death of Henry V. and appropriated a sum for the expences of the household.

While the duke of York thus enjoyed his triumph, the queen did not behold his success with idle resignation. Henry Beaufort, the new duke of Somerset, son of him who fell at St. Alban's, glowed with impatience to revenge the death of his father; Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, breathed no less vengeance for the loss of his son, who fell on the same occasion; and all the princes and nobles allied or attached to the house of Lancaster, perceiving the duke of York taking large strides towards the throne, resolved to exert all their endeavours to stop his progress. Notwithstanding this opposition, he lived in such seeming security as astonished his enemies. He thought he should run too great a risk in pretending openly to the crown, which had remained near sixty years in the house of Lancaster, and therefore he waited for some favourable opportunity to broach his pretensions: his chief aim was to acquire the favour of the people, without which he foresaw all his efforts would prove ineffectual; and, that they might see his conduct was not influenced by passion or interest, he affected a great attention to, and reverence for, the royal family: he provided a decent maintenance for, and settled the household of, the king's eldest son§; he also left the king and the queen at perfect liberty to act as they should think proper. He thought it was not in their power to divest him of the dignity of protector, which, according to his patent, could not be revoked but by the parliament; but the queen was too active and enterprising to be deterred from her purpose by such slender obstacles.

The king having recovered his health, the enemies of the duke, with the queen at their head, resolved to seize this opportunity to deprive him of his protectorship. The parliament reassembling at the appointed time, on the twenty-fifth of February, 1456, Henry came to the house, and declared from the throne, that, as he now enjoyed perfect health, and was in a condition to resume the reins of government, he did not think the kingdom had any further occasion for a protector; he therefore desired the parliament would discharge the duke of York from that office. Whether the two houses thought the request reasonable, or that, during the recess of the holidays between the fourteenth of December and fourteenth of January, the queen and her party had brought over the majority of the members, it is certain that the parliament agreed to a final repeal of the duke's powers as protector of the kingdom; and a writ was directed to him, notifying his suspension. He was no sooner exonerated from this charge, which he enjoyed only three months, than the earl of Salisbury was deprived of his post of chancellor, to which he had been advanced in the first session of this parliament, as the earl of Warwick had to the government of Calais; but this last, being the darling of the soldiery, it was not an easy matter to turn him out of his post.

Had Margaret been satisfied with this success, she might perhaps have enjoyed her authority for some time, without any disturbance; but, puffed up with this favourable turn of fortune, she resolved to ensure her future tranquility by arresting the persons of York, Salisbury, and Warwick. With this view the court was removed, early in the following year, 1457, to Coventry, where she thought she could execute her purpose with greater ease than in London; and letters were sent, under the privy-seal, to those three noblemen, requiring their attendance upon the king, upon affairs of importance to the state.

As the duke of York had taken no step towards publishing his designs upon the crown, he deter-

|| Namely, four thousand marks per annum. Stat. 33 Hen. VI. c. 7.

§ What this was will appear from the following words of the record, "The king by his several letters patent, confirmeth to his son Edward, prince of Wales, and to his heirs, kings of England, his creation of the principality and earldom of Chester, with all the particular dominions and hereditaments belonging thereto; and for that the said prince, the king's first begotten, the day of his birth, ought to be duke of Cornwall, the king granteth to the said prince livery of the same, and of all other hereditaments belonging of common consent. And farther, it is enacted, that the said prince shall be at diet, and sojourn in the king's court till the age of fourteen years; for the which diet the king shall take yearly all the revenues and profits of the said principality, earldom, and duchy of the said prince, until he come to the age of fourteen years, allowing yearly to the said prince, towards his wardrobe and wages, ten thousand pounds until his age of eight years; and from the said age to the age of fourteen years, twenty thousand marks yearly." Rymer, vol. xi.

mined to obey the order; accordingly he and his associates set out for Coventry: but when they were within a few miles of the place, they received, from some of their secret friends, intelligence of the design formed against them, and it came so late that they had not a moment to lose, but were forced to fly in all haste; York, with only a groom and a page, to his estate of Wigmore, on the borders of Wales; Salisbury to his own castle of Middleham, in Yorkshire; and Warwick to the sea-side, where he got shipping, and passed over to his government of Calais*. The queen was greatly chagrined at this disappointment, but comforted herself with the thoughts that these three lords, by being separated, would be less formidable.

This treacherous attempt, however, put an end to all manner of confidence: court invitations and promises were looked upon as snares for the ruin of the opposite party, and occasioned such a breach among the nobility in the different interests, that they left all visiting and correspondence with each other; and this strangeness proving habitual, turned in a short time to such an inveteracy, that, when they came under the names of Yorkists and Lancastrians to engage in a civil war, it was carried on with an unusual degree of fury and cruelty. Upon the retreat of the three confederate lords, the dukes of Buckingham and Somerset acted as chief ministers, and, with the queen, governed all at court.

But the mutual jealousy and machinations of the two parties were at this time interrupted by other considerations. The French having intelligence of the distractions in England, sought to avail themselves of them, and Charles began to think of repaying one of the many dreadful visits he had received from this country. A French historian† will have it that Charles received an invitation from queen Margaret for that purpose, who knew no readier means of effecting the duke of York's ruin; but this assertion does not appear sufficiently authenticated by cotemporary writers, for us to adopt it as fact. It is certain, however, that, about this time the French king entered upon a project to invade England, in concert with the Scots, who, agreeable to the plan adjusted between them, actually entered the northern counties, about Midsummer this year, under their king James II. notwithstanding the truce subsisting between the two nations, and carried off a considerable booty: and the earl of Northumberland, with the Scottish earl of Douglas, then a refugee in England, marching against them, were defeated with some loss by the Scottish generals, the earl of Angus and sir James Hamilton. On this occasion the duke of York, nobly sacrificing his private pique to the interest of his country, got together a powerful force, with which he joined the earl of Northumberland, and both generals marching against the invaders, drove them before them into their own country, whither they followed them, and laid great part of their borders waste with fire and sword. The French, slower in their attempt, through the necessity of equipping a fleet, were not ready to sail from Honfleur, in Normandy, till the twentieth of August. On the twenty-eighth of the same month, the marshals de Brezé and de Loheac, with about seven thousand men, landed near Sandwich, and plundered the place; but the militia of the country assembling in great numbers, and shewing a noble resolution of defending their properties, the French were glad to reembark with the booty they had made. In their return they made a descent in the West, and plundered the village of Fowey, in Cornwall, and also some places in Devonshire; but this predatory expedition redounded little to the glory of Charles's arms.

This storm being happily blown over, Henry who was of a pacific disposition, and equally dreaded the rage of foreign and domestic war, was very anxious to make up the feuds among the nobility, in order to unite them all in the defence of his person and government. Great part of this year was therefore spent in endeavours for that salutary purpose; but the late treacherous attempt against the Yorkists had put that party so much upon their guard, that neither the duke nor his associates could be brought to listen to any proposal of a meeting, till Henry condescended to write them a letter with his own hand, in which he promised, upon his salvation, they should receive no injury, and earnestly requested that mutual animosities should be buried in mutual forgiveness. Henry, though a prince of mean capacity, had, by the innocence of his life, and the piety of his devotion, acquired, if not the esteem, at least the good will of his subjects, so that when these his cordial invitations were made public, the nation had so high an opinion of his candour, that the opposing lords could no longer stand out, with any shadow of decency. Perhaps they did not think their scheme yet ripe for an open revolt against the established king, so they agreed to meet at London, to settle the articles of their reconciliation: but as each side seemed still to entertain a distrust of the other's sincerity, it was agreed by the mediators (who were Thomas Bourchier, archbishop of Canterbury, with several other prelates) that they should come, attended with proper retinues.

Accordingly, on the fifteenth day of January, 1458, the earl of Salisbury arrived first, with a body of five hundred men; as York did, on the twenty-sixth, with four hundred, taking up their quarters near each other, the former in Cold-harbour, and the latter in Baynard's castle; Warwick came over from Calais with six hundred followers, and chose the Grey-friars for the place of his residence; and the rest of the Yorkists lodged in different parts within the city.

Of the Lancastrian party, Somerset, Exeter, Northumberland, Egremont, and Clifford came with a pompous train of followers, who quartered in the suburbs; and sir Godfrey Bulleyn, the lord-mayor of London, at the head of ten thousand men, patrolled through the streets, for preventing all disturbances that might happen between the numerous retinues of the treating lords.

The conferences met with great difficulties, occasioned by the heats, animosities, and jarring interests of the two parties, insomuch that it was the twenty-fourth of March before every thing was adjusted, when at length the following terms were mutually agreed to.

I. That there should be a general pardon for all parties concerned in the late disturbances, on the part of the duke of York as well as the king; and that both should equally be held thenceforth as subjects: but that the duke of York, with the earls of Warwick and Salisbury, should settle forty pounds a year upon the abbey of St. Alban's, for suffrages and obits to be kept, and alms to be employed, for the souls of the noblemen and others killed in the late battle there.

II. That the duke of York should pay five thousand pounds to the duchess of Somerset, which was to be divided amongst her youngest children: and that the earl of Warwick should pay two thousand marks, for the use of the younger brethren of the lord Clifford.

III. That whereas sir Thomas Piercy, the lord Egremont, and Richard Piercy, sons of the countess of Northumberland, were fined to pay to the earl of Salisbury, his wife and sons Thomas and John Neville, fourteen thousand eight hundred marks for trespasses, found by Richard Bingham and Ralph Pool, the king's judges, to be done to the said earl of Salisbury and his sons, it was agreed the said sums should be released by them to the said offenders; yet upon condition that the said lord Egremont and his brothers should enter into recognizance in Chancery, to keep the peace with the said earl of Salisbury, his wife, children, servants, and tenants: and the said earl should discharge the tenants of the said earl of Northumberland and lord Egremont from the obligations to stand to their order and government.

The IVth article contains general releases on all sides: and expresses, that all matters of property shall stand upon the same footing as they were before the troubles. The other articles of this agreement relate only to the security which all the parties were obliged to give to its performance.

This agreement being settled, nothing remained but to notify it to the public; to do which with all possible solemnity, a public procession was made, in great pomp, by all parties, to St. Paul's cathedral, the duke of York leading the queen, followed by the duke of Somerset, the duke of Exeter, and the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, one of each party walking abreast, hand in hand, with every appearance of a cordial reconciliation and undisguised confidence: but, unhappily, there was little sincerity on either side; instead of labouring cheerfully in the great ends of the reunion, instead of taking their places at the council-board, to which they were now entitled, the confederate lords suddenly retired to where their several interests lay; the duke of York to the borders of Wales; the earl of Salisbury to the North; and the earl of Warwick, who had contracted for the guard of the sea, to take the command of the fleet. While the latter was on a cruise in the channel, he fell in with some merchant-ships belonging to the Genoese and Lubbeckers, who then made a great figure in the commerce of Europe; and a dispute arising in consequence of the foreigners refusing to pay the proper compliment to the English flag, the earl attacked them, sunk some, and carried the rest into Calais, on board of which he found an immense booty. These two republics, however, making vigorous remonstrances at the English court against this outrage, as they termed it, the king appointed commissioners to enquire into the particulars, and Warwick was obliged to come over to justify his conduct.

During his stay in London on this account, a fray happened between one of his servants and a domestic of the queen's, in which the latter, who was the aggressor, was desperately wounded. The companions on each side took part in the quarrel, the streets of London were filled with blood and confusion, and matters went so far, that the queen's attorney-general was killed in one of these frays; and it was with great difficulty that, in another on the like occasion, the earl himself escaped with life, by taking to his barge. He failed not to represent this as a premeditated attack, contrived by the queen, in order to assassinate him; and set out soon after for Yorkshire, where he had an interview with his father, the earl of Salisbury, and the duke of York, when it was resolved again to appeal to arms for satisfaction upon the violation of the late agreement. Warwick made but a short stay with his friends, posting over in all haste to Calais, for fear of some attempt on the part of the court to seize it during his absence.

It being discovered soon after, that the queen, to justify the late attempt upon the earl's life, had procured an order to arrest and throw him into the Tower, where it was supposed effectual methods would have been taken for removing so powerful an adversary; the duke of York and the earl of Salisbury made their complaints to Henry of these treacherous proceedings, insisting that he would dismiss from his council all such who had a share in them, or had advised the breach of the agreement. But Henry, wholly under the guidance of his wife and her cabal, took no notice of their remonstrances: upon which the confederate lords began to make provision for taking the field in case of necessity.

Early in the year 1459, the duke of York and his party were in arms; and it was agreed by them, that, whilst the duke was strengthening his interest in Wales, the earl of Salisbury should advance to London, at the head of five thousand men, and openly demand satisfaction for the injury done to his son. But as these measures could not be taken without the knowledge of the court, the lord Audley*, who had a great family interest in the counties through which Salisbury was to march, was ordered to raise troops, and had a commission as commander in chief of the royal army. Audley in a short time was at the head of ten thousand men, and in a condition to march against the earl of Salisbury, who was advanced as far as the borders of Shropshire and Staffordshire. There the two armies met; and though Salisbury had not above half the force which his adversary brought against him, he would not retreat, and, by a stratagem, gained a victory which he had no reason otherwise to expect.

The river Sow, a small stream but of a considerable depth, ran between the two armies, and its banks were lined by the lord Audley's troops. Salisbury ordered a detachment of his best archers to advance briskly to his side of the river, and to pour a discharge of arrows upon the royalists on the opposite side. The latter, upon this, coming up in their turn, the earl of Salisbury ordered his men to retreat, which they did with the appearance of precipitate confusion: this had the effect Salisbury wished; the royalists, deceived by this feint, and thinking the enemy flying, began to pass the stream, with lord Audley at their head, in order to complete the rout of the Yorkists. The earl of Salisbury had made all the necessary dispositions for their reception; before half the royalists were passed over, he charged them with his whole force upon a plain called Bloreheath, and gave them a total defeat. The lord Audley was killed at the head of his men*: his chief officers who fell with him were Hugh Venables, of Kinderton; Thomas Dutton, of Dutton; Robert Molineux, of Sisson, with many more, in all to the number of two thousand four hundred. In this battle, which was fought on the twenty-third of September, the Cheshire men were the greatest sufferers, who wore this day little silver swans, which the queen had ordered to be distributed to all the gentlemen of that county; no doubt with a view to put them in mind of Henry's descent from Edward III. who wore the same for his device†.

The duke of York, encouraged by this success, raised all the forces he could in the Welsh Marches, appointing Ludlow for the place of rendezvous, where all their friends from different quarters were to join him and Salisbury; and the duke, now unable to keep on the mask any longer, was obliged to avow his pretensions of claiming the crown. This attack upon Henry's person and dignity raised all the friends he had in the nation; the dukes of Somerset, Exeter, and Buckingham, all of them riveted by blood and inclination to the Lancaster family, had great interest in the kingdom, and saw now more than ever the necessity of their entering heartily upon the defence of Henry's title; in short, they bestirred themselves so effectually, that Henry in a few days got together an army far superior to that of the confederate lords. On the ninth of October writs were issued for the meeting of a parliament at Coventry, on the twentieth of the following month. The duke of Somerset was appointed governor of Calais, in the room of the earl of Warwick, who, upon advice of this, left that place under the care of William Neville, lord Fauconbridge (his uncle), and taking with him part of the garrison, of which he gave the command to sir Andrew Trollop, who had signalized himself in the wars in France, and to sir John Blount, another experienced general, he crossed the sea, and joined his friends at Ludlow.

To this place, where the lords were encamped, it was resolved by Henry's council immediately to advance. When the royal army came to Worcester it made a halt, and Henry sent Richard Beauchamp, bishop of Salisbury, with an offer of pardon to the rebels, if they would lay down their arms; but these were slighted; for, after so many repeated breaches of faith, no one would trust the court. The king, therefore, continued advancing; and, on the thirteenth of October, he came to Ludford, a few miles distant from Ludlow, with a fixed resolution to give the Yorkists battle: they, on their side, made a shew as if they would resist to the utmost. The two commanders from Calais, and the troops they brought over with them, imagined they were only to rescue their king out of the hands of a wicked ministry; but now, finding the duke of York's intention was to wrest the crown from him, whom they looked upon as the rightful possessor, they deserted by night to the royal army; and the chiefs of the Yorkists, apprehending that their men might be discouraged by that revolt, or be tempted to follow the example, thought fit to separate the next day; York, with his second son, the earl of Rutland, making the best of their way, through Wales, into Ireland; and the earls of Marche, Warwick, and Salisbury into Devonshire, where sir John Denham provided ships, which carried them over to Calais, into which place they were received by lord Fauconbridge, notwithstanding the duke of Somerset being appointed governor thereof by the king‡.

As soon it was found that the rebels' forces were dispersed, several troops of light horse were dispatched in pursuit, who took a great number of stragglers, none of whom, excepting those capitally concerned, suffered; but the town of Ludlow, for its remarkable attachment to the cause of the confederates, was plundered by the king's troops; and the duchess of York, with her two younger sons, were made prisoners in the castle.

The parliament meeting at Coventry, on the twentieth of November, agreeable to its summons, passed an act of attainder against the duke of York, the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, with their chief adherents, who were all declared traitors, their estates forfeited, and their heirs disinherited. The reader will find in the note § an abstract of the proceedings of the house on this occasion, with a particular

§ The attainder of Richard duke of York, wherein are contained these matters ensuing: First, a commemoration of the king's great care in bringing the said duke up, and the manifold benefits to him shewed. The confederation of the said duke with Jack Cade, to be advanced to the crown. The duke's coming out of Ireland with force, to the king's court and presence. The duke's practices to be protector. The duke's intent to have raised an army against the king, at Dartford, in Kent. His submission, and oath to the king, in Paul's, after the same. The duke's oath at large. The duke's confederacy with the earls of Salisbury and Warwick. A rehearsal of the king's sundry benefits shewed to the two said earls. The battle of St. Alban's, at what time the duke of Somerset, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford were slain; and the pacification made by the king between the heirs of the said duke and earls, and their promises of due obedience; with renunciation of sundry benefits to them afterwards, shewed the ambition of the said duke and earls. Their new oaths and promises made to the king. Their politics in not coming to the council, for their readiness in coming together, being far asunder. The expedition of the earl of Salisbury, with Thomas and John Neville, knights, sons of the said earl Thomas; and Thomas Oringe, of Tounge, in the county of York; with five thousand men, with banners displayed, on Bloreheath, on the feast of St. Matthew, anno 1437. James, lord Audley, slain on Bloreheath, in Staffordshire, by the said earl; and John Dudley, with sundry others taken prisoners, the king pursuing them by the space of thirty days and nights. The king's pardon to them offered, and their refusal. The assembly of the said duke, the earl of Marche; Richard, earl of Warwick; Richard, earl of Salisbury; Edward, earl of Rutland; John, lord Clifton; John, lord Wenlock; James Palering; John Conies, and Thomas Parr, knights; John Bouchier and Edward Bouchier, esquires, nephews of the said duke: Thomas Colt, of London, gentleman; John Clay, of Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, esquire; Roger Egerton, of Shrewsbury, esquire; ticular recapitulation from records of all the duke's conduct, and an account of his principal abettors by name, much more particular than we have in almost any history.

The queen seemed now to have set her foot upon all opposition: all grants, posts, or pensions which had been given to any of the duke of York's adherents, were revoked and cancelled by order of parliament; the Scottish earl of Douglas, who had been for some time an exile in England, was gratified with a pension during life, for his eminent services to the house of Lancaster. But, in this distressed condition of their affairs, and in the height of the triumphs of the Lancastrian party, the Yorkists found a resource in the admirable genius of the earl of Warwick: that nobleman was still in possession of Calais, and refused to deliver it up, on pretence that he held it from the parliament; upon which, Henry, duke of Somerset, to whom that government had been granted, sailed over to take possession of it, with a mere handful of men, imagining that, after the decisive blow lately given to the confederates, he should meet with very little difficulty in entering upon his charge. But the earl of Warwick was so universally beloved by the whole garrison, that, when Somerset appeared before the place, and summoned it to surrender, he had no other answer than what came from the mouth of its cannon. Being in no condition to force his entrance, he retired to Guisnes, where he resided in expectation of farther supplies. Having gone ashore, he left his ships, with some of his friends on board, at sea; but the mariners were so well affected to the duke of York's interest, or rather to the earl of Warwick's person, that they rose and carried the ships into Calais, where the duke of Somerset's friends were barbarously put to death by Warwick's orders†.

The queen, incensed beyond measure at this monstrous insult, and determined to wrest this important fortress out of the hands of her enemies, equipped a fleet for the assistance of Somerset, and ordered a considerable body of troops to be put on board, under the command of the lord Rivers and his son Anthony Woodville (afterwards lord Scales in right of his wife.) While the fleet lay in the harbour of Sandwich, waiting for a fair wind, the earl of Warwick, having intelligence of their destination, gave sir John Denham the command of the ships that had lately deserted from Somerset, and a body of troops on board, who sailed to Sandwich, where he found Rivers and all his officers, who were carried to Calais, together with their ships, the sailors themselves favouring the enterprise.

Warwick, having now got a fleet, sailed for Ireland in the beginning of the year 1460, in order to consult the duke of York about the measures to be taken for another insurrection in England, where the people espoused their cause, and their friends expected them with impatience. The duke agreed with him, that the lords at Calais should make a descent in the county of Kent, which abounded with their adherents and well-wishers, and proceed directly to the capital, which they did not doubt would receive them with open arms. The earl of Warwick, in his return to Calais, fell in with the English fleet, commanded by Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, who had lately been appointed admiral of England in the earl's stead, and been sent out to intercept him in his passage: but the mariners and soldiers on board the duke's fleet refusing to fight against their old and beloved commander, he, in order to prevent a total revolt, sailed into Dartmouth, where the greater part of his men deserted for want of pay and provision.

The queen and the ministry doubted not that the interview between the duke of York and Warwick was the forerunner of a fresh rebellion, and resolved to leave nothing untried to prevent the bad consequences of their landing in England. James Butler, earl of Wiltshire, the lords Scales and Hungerford were sent down into the counties supposed to be in the duke's interest, particularly those of Kent and Hampshire, with a commission to imprison and try all whom they judged to be of that party. They executed their commission with great rigour, putting to death many who were only suspected of favouring the duke of York; others were deprived of their offices, plundered, and otherwise ill treated, which much inflamed the animosities of the two parties: add to this, that the castle of Denbigh, which had belonged to the duke of York, was taken by assault by the earl of Pembroke, who had a commission to be Henry's general in Wales and upon its Marches.

In short, the prospect of ruin which the confederate lords had, as to their own private estates, did not, perhaps, a little quicken their resolution of a second invasion: they sent over the lord Fauconbridge with a manifesto, which he had orders to disperse throughout the kingdom, and to send a copy of it to the archbishop of Canterbury. It was to the following purpose: "that the duke of York, the earls of Marche, Salisbury, and Warwick, had divers times offered, and sent, to come into the king's presence, to have declared for their duty to God, his highness, and prosperity of the realm, these following matters, viz.

" I. The great extortions, murders, robberies, and oppressions to the church, and ministers of it, against the laws both of God and man.

" II. The poverty and misery of his highness himself, who, being cheated and defrauded of the revenues of the crown, which might, and would, support his royal grace, by the destroyers of the esquire; and Robert Bold, brother to Henry Bold, knight; who, with several others pitched their camp in the fields of Ludlow, in the county of Hereford, on Friday, the vigil of the Translation of Edward, in anno 1438: the duke pretended to his company that the king was dead, for whose soul mass was said in the said duke's camp. The king's expectation of the said duke: the duke's ranging in battle; the fortifying his ground with carts, and his guns set, before the skirmish made: his ambush laid; and his meaning to have suddenly surprized the king's host. The departure of the said duke and earls out of the field about midnight, under cover to repose themselves at Ludlow, and their flight into Wales; for that their army fainted, and submitted themselves unto the king, who granted their pardon. The attainder of the said duke, earls, and other aforesaid persons as traitors. Alice, wife to Richard, earl of Salisbury; William Oldhall, knight; and Thomas Vaughan, esquire, of London; were attainted as traitors, for procuring the treasons aforesaid. All and singular the hereditaments of the said duke and others, attainted, in fee or fee-tail, are forfeited. Richard Gray, lord Powis, Walter Radford, knight, being in the field with the duke at Ludlow, were pardoned; but all their hereditaments, as before, and other profits, forfeited. commonwealth, was forced to oppress and spoil his subjects.

“ III. That the laws were partially and unjustly executed, and made to support their injustice and oppression by such as should most love and tender them.

“ IV. That the commons were marvellously taxed, and their goods taken from them without payment; because he premitted the destroyers of the land to live upon his own revenues, suffering all the king's possessions in France to be lost.

“ V. That the people begin to have new impositions laid upon them, viz. every town to find men for the king's guards, after the example of the French, our adversaries; which, if continued to our heirs, will be a charge and bondage none of our ancestors were subject to.

“ VI. That divers lords had caused the king to write letters to his enemies in Ireland and France, to conquer the said kingdom, and take Calais; which letters were shewn to the duke of York by the Irishmen, with detestation of their villiany.

“ VII. That, since the barbarous and shameful murder of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, at Bury, it hath been studied and conspired to have destroyed and murdered the duke of York, and his issue of the royal blood; as also the earls of Warwick and Salisbury; for no other cause but for the true heart they have ever borne, and do bear, to the king's profit and wealth of the realm.

“ VIII. That the earls of Shrewsbury and Wiltshire, that the lord Beaumont, the mortal enemy of the said duke and lords, having the guiding of our sovereign lord, would not suffer the king to receive and accept them, as he would have done in his presence, dreading the charge which would have been brought against them for destroying the nation.

“ IX. That the said earls of Wiltshire, Shrewsbury, and lord Beaumont, not satisfied with the king's revenues and goods, had stirred up and excited his highness to hold his parliament at Coventry, where an act was made, to destroy the said duke of York, earls of Marche, Rutland, Salisbury, and Warwick, and their issue, and estates, and tenants, were given up to their hands, who robbed them, and hanged many of them without the king's consent or approbation.

“ These mischiefs they declared they could not but behold with grief; and therefore now proposed again to offer themselves to the presence of their said sovereign lord, to declare them to him in the most reverend manner, that he may have pity and compassion on his miserable subjects, and not suffer these mischiefs still to reign; to the effecting of which, they required all people, to whom their declaration should come, in God's behalf and their own, to assist them in doing their duty to their sovereign, his person and dignity, to whom they have been and ever would be, true as any of his subjects alive, to which they call God, and the Virgin Mary, and all the saints in heaven to witness.”

We must not forget to relate, that as Fauconbridge was on his passage over, he met at sea sir Simon Munford, who was appointed to guard the coast, attacked him, and taking him prisoner with many other officers, he sent them all to Calais. Upon their arrival, the earl of Marche, York's eldest son, ordered Munford with twelve of his captains to be beheaded, by way of retaliation for the severities exercised upon his father's adherents in England. Such are the cruelties almost constantly annexed to civil wars! But to return.

The lords in Calais being punctually apprized of the favourable effects which their manifesto had on the minds of the people, the earls of Marche, Salisbury, and Warwick, leaving Calais in a good posture of defence, came over into England with fifteen hundred persons in their retinue. Immediately on their landing (at Sandwich), they were joined by the lord Cobham, with four thousand men; but their greatest accession of strength was in the archbishop of Canterbury (Bourchier), who joined them, and suffered their manifesto to be affixed to the doors of his cathedral, and engaged several other prelates in the same cause.

They now began their march towards London, where they were sure of a welcome reception from the citizens. They reached that capital on the second of July, being about forty thousand strong, and on the same day had peaceable admission into the city, being welcomed by the lord-mayor and aldermen in their formalities. The queen was then at Coventry, where her army rendezvoused, and Henry at Northampton. Upon the first news of the Yorkists landing and progress, the royal army was ordered to march for London; but the confederates were so quick in their motions, that on the morning of the ninth of July, only seven days after their entry into London, the king's troops saw them advancing, in three divisions, towards Northampton; the first was led by the earl of Warwick; the second, which was the main body, by the earl of Marche (now in his twentieth year); and the lord Fauconbridge, with the troops under his command, formed the rear. The queen, who was herself really general of the royal army, since every thing was done by her orders, though the king was present in person, pitched her camp on a plain near Northampton, with the little river Nyne behind her: the earls of Marche and Warwick encamped between Towcester and Northampton. Marche was for immediately attacking the king's camp, but the archbishop of Canterbury and the other prelates were of a different opinion, and proposed to attempt a reconciliation: the lords submitting to their advice, the bishop of Salisbury was sent, in their name, to the king, requesting admittance to his presence, in order to compromise differences without bloodshed. But the court, falsely imagining that this offer proceeded only from the sense the confederates had of their own weaknesses, rejected, with equal haughtiness and bad policy, these overtures. In this the queen was the dupe of too great security. The bishop, finding his mediation refused, returned to the camp of the Yorkists, and both parties prepared for battle.

Whether this rejecting of all means of an accommodation had an effect on Edmund, lord Grey of Ruthyn, who commanded Henry's vanguard, or whether his conduct was owing to any other motive, he deserted to the earl's party soon after the engagement began, and contributed not a little to the victory of the malecontents. The battle began about two o'clock of the afternoon of the tenth of July, and was maintained with equal courage and obstinacy on both sides till seven in the evening, when the royalists were completely routed with a terrible carnage: the duke of Buckingham, the earl earl of Shrewsbury (son of the great Talbot), who performed wonders that day, the lord Egremont, the lord Beaumont*, and sir William Lucy were among the number of the slain: the queen, the prince of Wales, and the duke of Somerset, with difficulty escaped and fled northward. As to Henry, that empty shadow of a king, he once more fell into the hands of the Yorkists, who, nevertheless, treated him with the exterior of profound respect; and this deference served in some measure to console him for his late misfortunes, which would have been to any other prince worse than death itself; but Henry's natural imbecility seems to have made him equally insensible of good or bad fortune.

He was immediately conducted to Northampton, where he reposed himself for three days, and then set out for London, where he arrived on the sixteenth of July, attended by a crowd of noblemen and others, who had lately appeared in arms against him. The success of the confederate lords had so elated the Londoners, who were well affected to their cause, that they broke out into several outrages against many persons of the Lancastrian party. The lord Scales, governor of the Tower for Henry, who had refused to deliver it up to the earl of Marche before the battle of Northampton, now finding his master in the power of his enemies, thought proper to abandon his charge, and privately took water, in order to seek sanctuary in the abbey of Westminster; but being discovered, was most barbarously murdered, and his body thrown into the river. No enquiry being made after the perpetrators of this vile deed, it gave encouragement to carry on a kind of proscription; and among others who suffered death by the violence of the mob, was Thorpe, formerly speaker of the house of commons, but now a baron of the Exchequer.

The king, soon after his arrival, called a parliament, to meet in the beginning of October following: in the mean time the great-seal was given to the bishop of Exeter; the earl of Warwick was confirmed, by a new commission, in the government of Calais, to which was added that of Guisnes, which was still held by the duke of Somerset; and on the first of August the earl of Salisbury received a commission as warden of the Northern Marches, with power to raise an army to oppose the progress of James II. king of Scotland, who, taking advantage of the intestine troubles of England, had laid siege to the castle of Roxburgh; but while the earl was preparing to set out on this expedition, news arrived that James had been killed before the place, by the bursting of one of his own cannon; and that his queen, a woman of a masculine spirit, had pushed the siege with such vigour, that the castle of Roxburgh had capitulated; after which she laid siege to, and carried that of Werk, and then ravaging a great part of the English borders, she returned into Scotland before the earl of Salisbury could assemble his army. James II. of Scotland was succeeded by his son James III. then but seven years old.

In the course of the same month (of August) died Charles VII. king of France. It is pretended he starved himself, through an apprehension of being poisoned by the dauphin, his son, who now ascended the throne by the name of Lewis XI.

The confederate lords, who had now the king and government entirely in their power, failed not to give the duke of York, who was still in Ireland, continual notice of what was transacting, and that prince was now preparing to come to England, and put the finishing stroke to his grand project. The meeting of the parliament had been purposely delayed by his friends here, to give him time for being present at the opening; but, by the unforeseen accidents of wind and weather, he did not arrive in London till the third day of the session (viz. the fifth of October), when, without waiting even to refresh himself, he posted directly to the house of peers, who were then sitting, and, placing himself under the canopy of state, with his hand laid upon the throne, he gave a broad hint, that he expected the assembly would invite him to seat himself in the royal chair; but herein his own vanity, or the flattering insinuations of his creatures, had miserably deceived him; the majority of the members were far from entertaining any such thought, as they evinced by keeping a profound silence: at length the archbishop of Canterbury, a truly good man, who had joined the opposition merely because it tended to reformation, and at the same time had a sincere regard for Henry on account of his virtue and piety, came up to the duke, while he was standing in the manner already described, and asked him if he had as yet waited on the king, or whether he designed so to do? So sudden and unexpected a question involved the duke in the utmost perplexity: he had not yet openly avowed his claim to the crown; the silence of the house shewed him his intention was not universally approved: after some hesitation, during which the different changes of his countenance betrayed the tumult in his mind, he without giving a direct answer, said, that he knew no person in the realm to whom that compliment was due from him. This sudden declaration so greatly alarmed the whole assembly, that they broke up in some confusion.

Richard, however, was not to be discouraged by this rebuff. He went again the next day to the house of lords, and boldly seated himself upon the throne; but rising up soon, claimed the crown "as the next lineal heir of Edward III. and rightful successor to Richard II. who had been barbarously murdered by Henry of Derby, duke of Lancaster and Hereford, who wrongfully styled himself king Henry IV. as his own father had by Henry V. to secure the usurpation in his family: he put the lords in mind of the blood which had been shed by the first of those usurpers; of the loss of France, Normandy, and Guienne, with the many other disgraces and calamities that had befallen the nation, from the weakness and incapacity of the reigning king, Henry VI. and the corruption of the administration: he then exhorted them to shake off the government of an usurper and his issue, that peace might be restored to the land, and the crown recover its pristine glory†." The lords sitting like silent statues after the speech was ended, Richard rose up again, and desired them to consider what he had said, and the justice of his claim.

* He was the first viscount in England, so created 18 Hen. VI. Dugdale.

† Hollinghed, p. 1300—1302.

On the fifth day of the session the proceedings of the parliament of Coventry against the duke of York were annulled; and it was not before the eighth day of the parliament that the duke had it moved in the house of peers to be heard by his council touching his right and claim to the crown of England and lordship of Ireland: this claim was presented in writing on the sixteenth of October, by his council.

The duke of York's own account of his pedigree, as we find it on record, is as follows. "That the right noble and worthy prince Henry III. king of England, had issue and lawfully begotten, Edward his first begotten son, born at Westminster the fifteenth calend of July, on the vigil of St. Martin and Marcellanus, in the year of our Lord 1239. The which Edward (who, after the death of the said king Henry his father, was entitled and called king Edward I.) had issue Edward his first begotten son, entitled and called (after the decease of the said Edward I. his father) king Edward II. who had issue, lawfully begotten, the right noble and honourable prince Edward III. true and undoubted king of England and France and lord of Ireland. Which Edward III. had issue, and lawfully begotten, Edward, his first begotten son, prince of Wales; William of Hatfield, second begotten; Lionel, third begotten, duke of Clarence; John of Ghent, fourth begotten, duke of Lancaster; Edmund of Langley, fifth begotten, duke of York; Thomas of Woodstock, sixth begotten, duke of Gloucester; and William of Windsor, the seventh begotten. The said Edward, prince of Wales, who died in the life of the said king Edward, had issue, lawfully begotten, Richard, who succeeded king Edward III. his grand-father, in the regal dignity, and was entitled and called Richard II. and died without issue. William of Hatfield, the second begotten son of the said king Edward, died without issue. Lionel, the third begotten son of king Edward, had issue, and lawfully begotten, Philippa, his only daughter and heir, who was married unto Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, by whom she had issue, lawfully born, Roger Mortimer her son and heir; which Roger had issue, and lawfully begotten, Edmund, earl of Marche, Roger Mortimer, Anne, and Eleanor; which Edmund, Roger, and Eleanor died without issue; and the said Anne, being married unto Richard, earl of Cambridge, son of the said Edmund of Langley, fifth begotten son of the said king Edward III. as it is specified, had issue, and lawfully born, Richard Plantagenet, commonly called duke of York. The said John of Ghent, the fourth begotten son of the said king Edward III. and younger brother of the said Lionel, had issue, and lawfully begot, Henry, earl of Derby, who, immediately after that the said king Richard II. did resign the crowns of the said realms and the said lordship of Ireland, unrighteously entered upon the same, there being yet alive Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, son to Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, son and heir to the said Philippa, daughter and heir to the said Lionel, third son of the said king Edward III. to which Edmund the legal title of the said crowns and lordship belonged †." And from hence he concluded, that it was evident, that, in right of blood, he, the said duke of York, claimant, had a priority to all living, in succession to Edward III. the right of female succession to the crown of England being always admitted.

It was not without some difficulty that the lords would even permit this claim to be read in the house; but they came to a resolution to proceed no farther without communicating it to the king. Accordingly the lords spiritual and temporal waiting upon Henry, to acquaint him with the same, received for answer from him, that "it was his pleasure the affair should be referred to his judges, serjeants, and attorney-general, to consider upon the matter of right."

In consequence of the royal pleasure thus notified, on the morning of October 18, the lords sent for the king's justices, saith the record (the words of which we shall quote at large, as the best authority) "to defend his title against the claim of the duke of York, and in the king's name, strictly commanded them to find all objections as might be laid against the same, in fortifying the king's title; who, on Monday following, on the twentieth of October, answered, That the matter was so high, and touched the king's high estate and regalia, which is above the laws, and passed their learning; wherefore they durst not enter into any communication of the same, for that it pertained to the lords of the king's blood, and the appurage of this his land; and therefore besought all the lords to have them utterly excused. Then the lords sent for all the king's serjeants and attorney, and gave them strait commandment, in the king's name, that they sadly and wisely should search and take all things, as might seem best and strongest to be alleged for the king's avail, in objection and defeating of the title and claim of the duke: they answered, That if this matter passed the learning of the justices, it must needs exceed their learning, and also that they durst not enter into any communication in that matter; and prayed and besought all the lords to have them excused by giving any advice or counsel therein: but the lords would not excuse them, and therefore, by their advice and assistance, it was concluded, by all the lords, that the articles following should be objected against the claim and title of the duke.

"I. It is thought that the lords of the land must needs call to their remembrance the great oaths the which they have made to the king, the which may be laid to the said duke of York, and that the lords may not break their oaths.

"II. It is thought also, that it is to be called to remembrance the great and noble acts of parliament of divers of the king's progenitors, the which acts be sufficient and reasonable to be laid against the title of the said duke of York, the which acts be of much more authority than any chronicle; and also authority to defeat any manner of title made to any person.

"III. Item, It is thought that there is to be laid against the title divers entails made to the heirs of Henry IV. as for the crown of England, as it may appear by divers chronicles and parliaments.

"IV. Item, it is thought to be alleged to the title of the said duke, that the time that king Henry IV. took upon him the crown of England, he said he entered and took upon him the crown as right inheritor to king Henry III. and not as a conqueror."

To which articles the duke answered:

"Ist, That no oath, being the law of man, ought to be performed, when the same leadeth to suppression of truth and right, which is against the law of God.

"To the IId, and III, That in truth there being no such acts and entails made by any parliament heretofore, as it is surmised, but only in the seventh year of king Henry IV. a certain act and ordinance was made in a parliament by him called, wherein he made the realms of England and France, among other, to be unto him, and to the heirs of his body coming; and to his four sons, and to the heirs of their body coming, in manner and form as it appeareth in the same act; and if he might have obtained and enjoyed the crowns, &c. by title of inheritance, descent, or succession, he neither needed, or would have desired or made them to be granted to him in such wise, as be by the said act, which taketh no place, neither is of any force or effect against him that is right inheritor of the said crowns, as it accordeth with God's law, and all natural laws; how it be that all other acts and ordinances made in the said parliament sithen being good and sufficient against all other persons.

"To the IVth, That such saying of king Henry IV. may in no wise be true; and that the contrary thereof, which is truth, shall be largely enough shewed, approved, and justified by sufficient authority, and matter of record; and over that his said laying was only to shadow and cover fraudulently his said unrightwise and violent usurpation, and by that mayen to abuse deceivably the people standing about him*."

These, and many arguments of the like nature, having been debated for nine days together, with great learning and capacity, the lords agreed unanimously in opinion, that the title of the duke of York was indefeasible†; but, as a mean, to prevent inconveniencies that might ensue, they proposed, that, as Henry had now reigned thirty-eight years, and had all along led an innocent life, without giving any person cause to complain, he might retain the crown during his life, and the duke, with his heirs, succeed him. The argument against stripping Henry of his dignity seemed very strong; but the managers for the duke of York observed, that as Henry himself was altogether incapable of managing the reins of government, such a measure would only tend to the advantage of the queen and her ministry, who abused his name and authority; that, out of tenderness to him, they ought not to ruin the whole kingdom, nor commit a flagrant act of injustice from a principle of charity." Nevertheless, the duke of York, willing to pay deference to the authority of the parliament, and desirous to prevent the effusion of blood in prosecuting the immediate possession of a title which had been adjudged him, and out of regard to the peace and good of his country, agreed to a compromise, which contained the following articles.

"I. That Henry should be reputed king of England, with the royal dignity annexed, during his natural life.

"II. That Richard, duke of York, without prejudice to his own right, should honour him as such.

"III. That the said Richard should succeed therein, immediately after Henry's decease or resignation.

"IV. That all the lords in parliament should swear to maintain the succession of the said Richard, duke of York, and oppose, to the utmost of their power, all that should attempt to break this agreement.

"V. That Richard should be declared immediately the true and rightful heir to the crown, and have a grant of ten thousand marks per annum in land and castles, to support the dignity.

"VI. That the compassing the death of the said duke should be made high-treason.

"VII. And lastly, it was enacted that all the acts of Henry IV. and V. for settling the succession of the crown should stand repealed, and be held annulled, void, and invalid‡."

The duke of York and the earls of Marche and Rutland, his two elder sons, came in person to the parliament house, on the thirty-first of October, and there, in presence of the lords spiritual and temporal, bound themselves by oath to observe this agreement, provided it was duly kept by Henry; who, on his part, promising so to do, both these engagements were entered upon record under the guardianship of the parliament; and the next day, being the first of November, this accommodation was celebrated by a solemn procession to St. Paul's, at which Henry and the lords assisted. It was also notified by Henry's letters patent to the nation, and the duke of York was proclaimed protector of the realm and heir apparent of the crown, on Saturday the eighth of November, in the city of London, amidst the repeated acclamations of the populace||. As for Henry, he did not appear to be in the least affected with this sudden revolution in his affairs: satisfied with the present tranquillity which he was suffered to enjoy, he devoted his whole time to exercises of devotion, and committed the administration to those who acted under the sanction of his name and authority.

Very different were the sentiments of his queen Margaret, who was now, with the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, in the North, where the whole strength of the Lancastrian party lay: she was filled with inexpressible fury and indignation when she received the news of the compromise between her husband and the duke of York, which at once excluded her from power, and her son from the succession. By the advice and assistance of the last-mentioned noblemen, she set about levying forces, for undoing all that the parliament had done, and, in a short time, she got together a considerable army of fighting men, all determined to stand by the house of Lancaster.

The duke of York was soon apprized of the impending storm, and trembled for the consequences. Having the king entirely at his disposal, he prevailed on him to sign an order for the queen to repair immediately to London: but no regard being paid on her part to this extorted summons, York, putting the king under the care of the earl of Warwick and the duke of Norfolk, set out, at the head of an army, on the second of December, and advanced by easy marches towards the North; while his son Edward, earl of Marche, was dispatched to the borders of Wales, to raise an additional body of forces, with which he was to join his father. The queen appears to have had exceeding good intelligence of his motions, and having her army ready, under the command of Somerset and Exeter, she marched southward, with twenty thousand men, to fight the duke before he could be reinforced, whose whole force at present did not exceed seven thousand men. Upon hearing that the queen was in full march to attack him, the duke, conscious of his inferiority, retired to his castle of Sandal, until he should be joined by his son Edward.

Queen Margaret, whose knowledge in military matters, and profound policy, so superior to her sex, might have done honour to the most experienced general, had recourse to every method she could devise for luring the duke from his retreat: she pretended to continue her march towards the south; she posted the greatest part of her troops in ambush, and, with only a part of her army, presenting herself before the castle of Sandal, challenged the duke to battle by the most insulting messages. Whether the duke was provoked by her reproaches, or was straitened for want of provisions, or, what is more probable, from former defeats of the royal party had acquired a contempt for his enemy, certain it is he drew out his men, on the thirty-first of December, determined to venture a battle, and advanced in excellent order towards Wakefield Green*, on each side of which the queen's ambushes were placed, under the command of Butler, earl of Wiltshire, and Courtney, earl of Devonshire, while the dukes of Somerset and Exeter led her main body.

The duke of York had scarcely marshalled his troops, when his ears were struck with shouts on each side of him, and the two corps in ambush suddenly starting up, he found both his flanks and his rear inclosed. He now, too late, found his error in trusting to appearances, or building upon former success in arms; he saw no probability of escaping, far less of victory: he resolved, therefore, to sell his life and newly affianced crown as dear as possible, and his courage being converted to fell despair, he rushed furiously on to the charge. The enthusiastic valour with which he was fired seemed to communicate itself to all his followers, who pursued the track of slaughter he marked out in a firm, resolute, and well-compact body: but all their efforts availed little against the numbers with which they were overpowered: the bloody contest did not last above half an hour, each second of which, however, was marked by some distinguished death; and, in the short space above-mentioned, two thousand eight hundred of the duke's army were cut in pieces. The duke himself fell, transfixt with numberless wounds, after fighting valiantly on foot; sir Thomas Harrington, sir David Hall, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Thomas Neville (third son of the earl of Salisbury) sir John and sir Hugh Mortimer, with many other gentlemen, signed the royalists' victory in their own blood: but no fate was more truly deplorable than that of Edmund Plantagenet, earl of Rutland, son to the duke of York, a youth of about thirteen years of age, who was inhumanly butchered on Wakefield bridge, as he was attempting his escape, by the lord Clifford; that nobleman, inflamed with revenge for the loss of his father, who had been killed in the battle of St. Alban's, had made such carnage with his own hands, that those even of his own party unanimously gave him the name of the Butcher; and now espying one Aspil, the duke of York's chaplain, conveying the young Rutland out of the field, he pursued them, and, notwithstanding all the entreaties of the priest, or the more melting eloquence of youthful innocence, the implacable Clifford plunged his dagger in the breast of the defenceless child. Returning reeking from this slaughter, he fell upon the dead body of the duke of York, and cutting off the head, carried it to the queen, who crowned it with a diadem of paper, by way of derision of his pretensions, and then sent it to be fixed on the walls of York.

Thus fell, in the fiftieth year of his age, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, a prince endowed with many great and amiable qualities, and of whom the duke of Somerset, his chief opponent, said, "that if he had not learned to play the king by his regency in France, he had never forgot to obey as a subject in England." He had issue, by Cecily, daughter of Ralph Neville, earl of Westmoreland, eight sons: Henry, who died young; Edward, earl of Marche, afterwards king Edward IV. Edmund, earl of Rutland; John, William, and Thomas, who all died young; George, duke of Clarence; and Richard, duke of Gloucester, afterwards king Richard III. He had also four daughters: Anne, married to Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, but afterwards divorced from him, and married a second time to sir Thomas St. Leger; Elizabeth, married to John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk; Margaret, married to Charles the Hardy, duke of Burgundy; and Ursula, who died young.

The queen had a farther triumph by the earl of Salisbury, sir Ralph Stanley, and some other persons of quality, being made prisoners, who were soon after sent to Pontefract, and there beheaded; their heads were afterwards set upon poles on each side that of the duke of York. As to the loss of the victorious army, it is not mentioned; we can only say that the victors disgraced their success with shocking instances of the most savage barbarity. Short lived, however, were these bloody triumphs; for the hands of the son soon plucked down the trophies erected over the grave of the father, and cruelly repaid the sufferings of his party.

Edward Plantagenet, hitherto styled earl of Marche, but now, by this fatal event, possessor of the title of duke of York, was raising forces in the Marches of Wales when he received the news of his father's death: far from being discouraged by this dreadful accident, he was inspired with the most implacable resentment, and determined to risque his life and fortune in revenging the untimely fall of the author of his birth, and asserting his pretensions to the crown. All the great qualities of the third Edward's race seem to have united in his person: the beauty of his figure is described to us by cotemporary historians as fair as fancy could form; his constitution was active and hardy; he had a quick and penetrating judgment; his fame as a soldier was surpassed by none, equalled by few, in his time; and success had hitherto waited on every martial exploit in which he had been engaged: in a word, this young prince seemed formed to re-establish the affairs of his family, and to add the right of glorious conquest to that of blood: but while we are relating his virtues, we must not conceal his failings; unhappily they were such in the course of his life as obscured the fair dawn that ushered in his youthful days. Like most of his ancestors, he was cruelly vindictive; and the laurels which he gained in the field, were stained and disgraced by the streams of noble blood which he caused to be shed, as well in the field as on the scaffold. Such as he was, however, we shall soon see him mount the English throne over the neck of all opposition.

After he had completed his levies, Edward began his march for London, at the head of twenty-three thousand men, intending to join the earl of Warwick, who had been left with another respectable body of forces, to secure the capital, and then go in quest of Margaret, whose cruel treatment of his friends he eagerly wished to retaliate. On his march he was met by Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, and James Butler, earl of Ormond and Wiltshire, who had been sent by the queen, with a body of Welsh and Irish troops, to intercept him in his route. The two armies were in sight of each other on the second of February, 1461, at a place called Mortimer's cross, in Herefordshire: a battle ensued; but the army of the two earls being far inferior to the duke of York's, either in number or discipline, were routed with the loss of above four thousand men; and all those who had the misfortune to be taken prisoners, were put to death with unrelenting barbarity. Thus, with more than savage rage, did Englishmen bury their daggers in the breasts of their countrymen, contending with each other for the horrid palm of brutality: among others who suffered on this occasion, our historians have mentioned Owen Tudor, the husband of queen Catherine, and father to the earls of Richmond and Pembroke.

Mean while the queen, with her son the prince of Wales, the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earls of Northumberland, Devonshire, and Shrewsbury, and several other of the nobility and gentry well affected to her cause, was on her march towards London, at the head of a very numerous army. The earl of Warwick, distrusting the affection of the Londoners, which he knew to be guided by every breath of success, did not chuse to be shut up within the walls to wait the queen's arrival, to whom the citizens might possibly open their gates, resolved to go forth, meet, and fight her. Accordingly, taking Henry along with him, he advanced as far as St. Alban's, though with a force much inferior to that of the queen.

The two armies met on Shrove Tuesday (February 17), and joining battle upon Barnard's Heath, the earl had at first the better, till the lord Lovelace, who commanded the main body, mostly made up of Londoners, treacherously delaying to come up to the support of the vanguard, that body was almost cut in pieces, and in a short time the whole army of the Yorkists was put to the rout: however, the earl, rallying his men, made an excellent retreat, with the loss of about two thousand common soldiers, but not one officer of distinction. King Henry was left alone in the field, without any one to protect him from the outrages of a brutal soldiery, flushed with victory and bent on slaughter: there he was found by the queen, who received him with more joy than affection, and carried him to her army, at the head of which he knighted his son, the prince of Wales. Henry had given his promise to two gentlemen, the lord Bonnevill and sir Thomas Kiriell, to whose care he had been committed during the action, that, in case the queen's party obtained the victory, he would ensure their safety: trusting to the royal word, they had neglected to make their escape with the rest of the defeated corps: but being now taken, Margaret, without regard to her husband's honour, ordered both their heads to be struck off, in revenge for the blood of Thorpe, that zealous partisan of the Lancaster family.

The chief advantage resulting to Margaret from this victory, was the getting the king her husband into her hands, whose name she could now make use of to authorize her transactions. But she certainly committed a gross blunder in not advancing immediately to the capital, where the consternation her victory had thrown the citizens into, would, in all probability, have procured her an easy admittance. The citizens, indeed, were under great apprehensions of being plundered by her northern troops, who committed the most intolerable ravages in their march, and had already plundered the town of St. Alban's; but they were still more afraid of incurring the displeasure of a victorious army, whom they could not oppose: but Margaret, giving them time to recover themselves, and the ravages of her troops being represented in the most glaring light, the citizens now determined at all events to oppose her entrance; nay, they even went so far as to seize several waggons loaded with provisions that the mayor was sending to her army at St. Alban's, and killed those of her party who were detached to escort them. Margaret denounced vengeance against the Londoners for this insult, and had actually sent a detachment to force admittance into the city, intending to follow with her whole army; but the detachment was cut in pieces, and at the same time she received intelligence that the duke of York and the earl of Warwick had joined their forces at Chipping Norton, in Oxfordshire, and begun their progress for London. This news obliged her to retire back to the North, where she hoped to increase her army to such a formidable number, as would ensure success against all opposition.

On the twenty-fourth of February, the duke of York and the earl of Warwick entered the city, and were received as its guardian angels: nor was it in London only where Edward had ever been the idol of the people, nor yet in Kent or Essex, which had long declared their attachment to the house of York, and whence they repaired in incredible numbers to his standard, but from almost all the other counties in the east, south, and west of England:

Warwick and the duke of Norfolk, set out, at the head of an army, on the second of December, and advanced by easy marches towards the North; while his son Edward, earl of Marche, was dispatched to the borders of Wales, to raise an additional body of forces, with which he was to join his father. The duke himself fell, transfixt with numberless wounds, after fighting valiantly on foot; sir Thomas Harrington, sir David Hall, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Thomas Neville

(third son of the earl of Salisbury) sir John and sir Hugh Mortimer, with many other gentlemen, signed the royalists' victory in their own blood: but no fate was more truly deplorable than that of Edmund Plantagenet, earl of Rutland, son to the duke of York, a youth of about thirteen years of age, who was inhumanly butchered on Wakefield bridge, as he was attempting his escape, by the lord Clifford; that nobleman, inflamed with revenge for the loss of his father, who had been killed in the battle of St. Alban's, had made such carnage with his own hands, that those even of his own party unanimously gave him the name of the Butcher; and now espying one Aspil, the duke of York's chaplain, conveying the young Rutland out of the field, he pursued them, and, notwithstanding all the entreaties of the priest, or the more melting eloquence of youthful innocence, the implacable Clifford plunged his dagger in the breast of the defenceless child. Returning reeking from this slaughter, he fell upon the dead body of the duke of York, and cutting off the head, carried it to the queen, who crowned it with a diadem of paper, by way of derision of his pretensions, and then sent it to be fixed on the walls of York.

Thus fell, in the fiftieth year of his age, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, a prince endowed with many great and amiable qualities, and of whom the duke of Somerset, his chief opponent, said, "that if he had not learned to play the king by his regency in France, he had never forgot to obey as a subject in England." He had issue, by Cecily, daughter of Ralph Neville, earl of Westmoreland, eight sons: Henry, who died young; Edward, earl of Marche, afterwards king Edward IV. Edmund, earl of Rutland; John, William, and Thomas, who all died young; George, duke of Clarence; and Richard, duke of Gloucester, afterwards king Richard III. He had also four daughters: Anne, married to Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, but afterwards divorced from him, and married a second time to sir Thomas St. Leger; Elizabeth, married to John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk; Margaret, married to Charles the Hardy, duke of Burgundy; and Ursula, who died young.

The queen had a farther triumph by the earl of Salisbury, sir Ralph Stanley, and some other persons of quality, being made prisoners, who were soon after sent to Pontefract, and there beheaded; their heads were afterwards set upon poles on each side that of the duke of York. As to the loss of the victorious army, it is not mentioned; we can only say that the victors disgraced their success with shocking instances of the most savage barbarity. Short lived, however, were these bloody triumphs; for the hands of the son soon plucked down the trophies erected over the grave of the father, and cruelly repaid the sufferings of his party.

Edward Plantagenet, hitherto styled earl of Marche, but now, by this fatal event, possessor of the title of duke of York, was raising forces in the Marches of Wales when he received the news of his father's death: far from being discouraged by this dreadful accident, he was inspired with the most implacable resentment, and determined to risque his life and fortune in revenging the untimely fall of the author of his birth, and asserting his pretensions to the crown. All the great qualities of the third Edward's race seem to have united in his person: the beauty of his figure is described to us by cotemporary historians as fair as fancy could form; his constitution was active and hardy; he had a quick and penetrating judgment; his fame as a soldier was surpassed by none, equalled by few, in his time; and success had hitherto waited on every martial exploit in which he had been engaged: in a word, this young prince seemed formed to re-establish the affairs of his family, and to add the right of glorious conquest to that of blood: but while we are relating his virtues, we must not conceal his failings; unhappily they were such in the course of his life as obscured the fair dawn that ushered in his youthful days. Like most of his ancestors, he was cruelly vindictive; and the laurels which he gained in the field, were stained and disgraced by the streams of noble blood which he caused to be shed, as well in the field as on the scaffold. Such as he was, however, we shall soon see him mount the English throne over the neck of all opposition.

After he had completed his levies, Edward began his march for London, at the head of twenty-three thousand men, intending to join the earl of Warwick, who had been left with another respectable body of forces, to secure the capital, and then go in quest of Margaret, whose cruel treatment of his friends he eagerly wished to retaliate. On his march he was met by Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, and James Butler, earl of Ormond and Wiltshire, who had been sent by the queen, with a body of Welsh and Irish troops, to intercept him in his route. The two armies were in sight of each other on the second of February, 1461, at a place called Mortimer's cross, in Herefordshire: a battle ensued; but the army of the two earls being far inferior to the duke of York's, either in number or discipline, were routed with the loss of above four thousand men; and all those who had the misfortune to be taken prisoners, were put to death with unrelenting barbarity. Thus, with more than savage rage, did Englishmen bury their daggers in the breasts of their countrymen, contending with each other for the horrid palm of brutality: among others who suffered on this occasion, our historians have mentioned Owen Tudor, the husband of queen Catherine, and father to the earls of Richmond and Pembroke.

Mean while the queen, with her son the prince of Wales, the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earls of Northumberland, Devonshire, and Shrewsbury, and several other of the nobility and gentry well affected to her cause, was on her march towards London, at the head of a very numerous army. The earl of Warwick, distrusting the affection of the Londoners, which he knew to be guided by every breath of success, did not chuse to be shut up within the walls to wait the queen's arrival, to whom the citizens might possibly open their gates, resolved to go forth, meet, and fight her. Accordingly, taking Henry along with him, he advanced as far as St. Alban's, though with a force much inferior to that of the queen.

The two armies met on Shrove Tuesday (February 17), and joining battle upon Barnard's Heath, the earl had at first the better, till the lord Lovelace, who commanded the main body, mostly made up of Londoners, treacherously delaying to come up to the support of the vanguard, that body was almost cut in pieces, and in a short time the whole army of the Yorkists was put to the rout: however, the earl, rallying his men, made an excellent retreat, with the loss of about two thousand common soldiers, but not one officer of distinction. King Henry was left alone in the field, without any one to protect him from the outrages of a brutal soldiery, flushed with victory and bent on slaughter: there he was found by the queen, who received him with more joy than affection, and carried him to her army, at the head of which he knighted his son, the prince of Wales. Henry had given his promise to two gentlemen, the lord Bonnevile and sir Thomas Kiriell, to whose care he had been committed during the action, that, in case the queen's party obtained the victory, he would ensure their safety: trusting to the royal word, they had neglected to make their escape with the rest of the defeated corps: but being now taken, Margaret, without regard to her husband's honour, ordered both their heads to be struck off, in revenge for the blood of Thorpe, that zealous partisan of the Lancaster family.

The chief advantage resulting to Margaret from this victory, was the getting the king her husband into her hands, whose name she could now make use of to authorize her transactions. But she certainly committed a gross blunder in not advancing immediately to the capital, where the consternation her victory had thrown the citizens into, would, in all probability, have procured her an easy admittance. The citizens, indeed, were under great apprehensions of being plundered by her northern troops, who committed the most intolerable ravages in their march, and had already plundered the town of St. Alban's; but they were still more afraid of incurring the displeasure of a victorious army, whom they could not oppose: but Margaret, giving them time to recover themselves, and the ravages of her troops being represented in the most glaring light, the citizens now determined at all events to oppose her entrance; nay, they even went so far as to seize several waggons loaded with provisions that the mayor was sending to her army at St. Alban's, and killed those of her party who were detached to escort them. Margaret denounced vengeance against the Londoners for this insult, and had actually sent a detachment to force admittance into the city, intending to follow with her whole army; but the detachment was cut in pieces, and at the same time she received intelligence that the duke of York and the earl of Warwick had joined their forces at Chipping Norton, in Oxfordshire, and begun their progress for London. This news obliged her to retire back to the North, where she hoped to increase her army to such a formidable number, as would ensure success against all opposition.

On the twenty-fourth of February, the duke of York and the earl of Warwick entered the city, and were received as its guardian angels: nor was it in London only where Edward had ever been the idol of the people, nor yet in Kent or Essex, which had long declared their attachment to the house of York, and whence they repaired in incredible numbers to his standard, but from almost all the other counties in the east, south, and west of England:

multitudes strove who should be foremost to offer their persons to fight his battles, and their purses to contribute towards the exigences of his military operations: in a word, the tide of affection ran so rapidly in his favour, that it seemed to carry away with it all remembrance of Henry or the line of Lancaster.

The duke's friends were encouraged by these marks of general zeal and attachment to improve so favourable an opportunity, and resolved to save him the trouble and uncertainty of a parliamentary decision, and advance him to the throne by the consent of the people and the nobles. Accordingly, on the first of March, as the lord Fauconbridge was exercising a body of four thousand men in the fields near Clerkenwell, and an infinite crowd of people were assembled to amuse themselves with the spectacle, the earl of Warwick, attended by his brother, George Neville, bishop of Exeter, rode into the midst of the multitude, holding in his hand the agreement made between Henry and the late duke of York, and ratified by the parliament, which he read aloud, and then appealed to all present, whether Henry had not incurred the forfeiture expressed in that accord, by countenancing and joining the queen in her rebellion against his own deed and that of the estates of the land? This was answered in the affirmative by a loud peal of assent. The bishop of Exeter next addressing them, asked if they would still have Henry of Lancaster for their king? the whole multitude exclaimed against the proposal; but when he demanded if they would acknowledge Edward, duke of York, for their sovereign? all present, shouting and clapping their hands, cried out, as with one mighty voice, "King Edward for ever!"

The experiment thus succeeding to the wish of the party, a great council was called in Baynard's castle, where the archbishop of Canterbury and several other prelates, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Warwick, the lords Fitz Walter, Ferrers of Chartley, and others of the temporal nobles were present; and it being resolved, "that Henry had, by breach of the late agreement, forfeited all claim to the benefit thereof, or to the possession of the throne in which he had been indulged; and that Edward, duke of York, ought to be acknowledged king, according to his right of blood;" they waited upon him, on Tuesday the third of March, and petitioned him to assume the exercise of the government, to which petition he gave his assent.

The next day he rode in procession to St. Paul's, and there made his offering, Te Deum being sung with great solemnity. From thence he proceeded, with the like state to Westminster hall, and, sitting on the throne, with the sceptre of Edward the Confessor in his hand, was again recognized by all present. He next went to the abbey church, where he received the homage of all the nobility that were present. Then, returning to the city by water, he took up his quarters in the bishop of London's palace, the ordinary place where our kings were wont to reside when they lodged within the city: and the same day, being the fifth of March, he was proclaimed in London and Westminster, by the name of Edward IV.

Thus ended the reign of Henry VI. which had lasted thirty-eight years and a half, without his having ever intermeddled in all that time with the administration of public affairs. He was about thirty-nine years and a quarter old when he was dispossessed of a crown, which he had worn almost from his very birth. He still lived long enough to be the sport of fortune, as will appear in the history of the following reign, where we again shall see him vested with the regal power.

Henry was possessed of many virtues: he was compassionate, devout, religious; but these qualities fitted him rather for a cloyster than a throne: of weak and narrow intellects, and of an unsteady and irresolute temper, he was easily drawn into every cruel or oppressive measure that the passion of his wife, or the views of his ministers, suggested; and yet so free was he from cruelty in his disposition, that he could not, without extreme reluctance, consent to the punishment of those malefactors who were sacrificed to the public safety, and would suffer the grossest insult offered to his own person without the least mark of resentment. He was remarkably continent, insomuch that, before marriage he would hardly allow any of the female sex to enter the court, who were single women. He was so inoffensive in the whole of his conduct, that the bishop who had been his confessor for ten years, avowed that, in all that time, he had not committed any crime deserving of penance. Yet, after, all it must be confessed, that this king was rather respectable for those vices he wanted than for the virtues he possessed; nay, these very virtues proved sometimes pernicious, by making him the dupe of those, who, under the sanction of his name and authority, committed the most flagrant acts of violence and injustice: and we cannot help subscribing to the opinion of a modern writer, that "a wise people could no more chuse to have their throne filled with a fool than a tyrant."

Henry had issue by his queen, Margaret of Anjou, only one son, Edward, prince of Wales, who, at the time of his father's deposition, was but in the eighth year of his age.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

In the course of this reign queen Margaret began Queen's college, Cambridge, which was completed by the consent of Edward IV. Archbishop Kemp erected the Divinity school in Oxford, as it now stands; together with St. Paul's Cross. William Estfield, mayor of London, built, at his own charge, the water-conduit in Fleet-street; and John Wells, while he filled the same post, laid the conduit, commonly called the Standard in Cheap. In the year 1446, sir Simon Eyre, mayor of London, built Leadenhall, and allotted it as a common granary for the city. And in 1453, sir John Norman, while he enjoyed the same office, went by water to Westminster to take his oath: he was the first mayor that ever went in that manner, all his predecessors had rode thither on horseback. Stow's Survey.

In the fifth year of this reign, on Saturday, being the eve of St. Michael, in the morning between two and three o'clock began a very dreadful earthquake, which, being accompanied with thunder and lightning, struck terror into every one.

In the thirteenth year of his reign, on the twenty-fourth of November began a violent frost, which lasted till the tenth of February, and with so great violence that the Thames was frozen over, so that the merchandize and provisions brought to the Thames Thames mouth were conveyed to London by land through Kent.

In the seventeenth year of his reign there was so great a dearth, that wheat was sold for two shillings and six pence the bushel, and malt at eight pence; and in some parts of the nation they were so straitened, that they made bread of ferne-roots and ivy-berries. On the twenty-fifth of November, 1438, there was such a terrible wind, that it blew off the leads of the Grey Friars church, and almost beat down the whole side of a street call the Old Exchange.

THE first act of Edward's reign was marked with blood: two days only after his being proclaimed, a tradesman of London was taken up, and executed for saying he would make his son "heir of the crown*," meaning only, as it is said, his own house, which had the sign of the Crown. It is probable, however, that this man might have been a favourer of the Lancastrian party, and have spoken contemptuously of the new king. However this might be, an execution upon so slight an account, was by many considered as a melancholy presage of those scenes of slaughter which were yet to follow, during the quarrel of the two contending houses. In order, however, to conciliate the affections of the generality of his subjects, he issued a proclamation, by which he declared himself ready to receive into favour all those who had adhered to Henry, upon their coming in, and submitting to the new government; an offer which was embraced by very few; a convincing evidence of the sincerity of each party in the cause it espoused; and though both could not be in the right, yet both are praise-worthy for their inviolable loyalty and unshaken constancy.

Edward, though he had assumed the title and authority of king, was far from being established in the quiet and undisturbed possession of the throne: he had a powerful adversary to encounter in the person of Margaret, Henry's queen, who possessed every qualification that constitutes the true heroine. An utter stranger to despair, she considered repeated defeats as so many motives to renew her endeavours to make a fresh stand. The lords of her party, the chief of whom were of the Lancaster race, were all riveted to her interest; and she had rendered herself so extremely popular in the northern counties, whither she had retired after quitting St. Alban's, that she soon collected an army of six thousand determined veterans.

The new king was no sooner informed of this, than, neglecting the ceremonies of his coronation, and the rejoicings attending it, he set out, on the twelfth of March, accompanied by the earl of Warwick, with an army of forty thousand men, to oppose the queen's progress, scarce resting till he came to Pontefract. From thence the king detached a body of troops, under the command of the lord Fitz Walter, to make themselves masters of Ferrybridge, a pass in Yorkshire upon the river Eyre, being convinced that the great push for victory must be made somewhere about that quarter. This body executed their commission with great success, and took post on the north side of the river. On the other hand, the queen committed the care of her army to the duke of Somerset, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, all of them noblemen of high courage, and fast friends to her and her family: she, with her husband Henry, and their young son, the prince of Wales, retired to York city, in expectation of an event which was finally to decide their fate.

Clifford, by an admirable conduct, in part repaired the disadvantage Henry's army was likely to sustain by the surprisal of Ferrybridge; for, setting out with a party on the night of the twenty-eighth of March, he attacked the enemy's detachment so suddenly and critically, that he recovered the pass, the lord Fitz Walter himself being slain, with the bastard of Salisbury, and the greatest part of their men.

This loss might have proved fatal to Edward, at a time when a general battle was every moment expected, had it not been for the admirable courage and presence of mind of the earl of Warwick, who, immediately hearing of this disaster, rode up to the king, to acquaint him of it, who was then employed in reviewing his troops; and dismounting in sight of the whole army, he drew his sword and stabbed his horse, after which, kissing the hilt of his weapon, he swore to die in the field or conquer. This noble declaration of an officer so idolized by all the soldiery, seemed to awaken in every breast an insuppressible ardour; they rent the heavens with shouts of Long live king Edward, and the noble earl of Warwick! and when Edward, taking advantage of this disposition, caused proclamation to be made throughout his camp, "That every man who was unwilling to stay, or was afraid to fight, had leave to depart," they cried out, as with one voice, to be led on, declaring their resolution to gain the day, or die at the feet of their king and general. Nor were the officers less zealous than the private men: Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, hereditary earl-marshal of England, who had by his office the leading of the vanguard of the king's army, happening then to be sick, his post devolved to William Neville, lord Fauconbridge, who, with sir Walter Blount, his friend and companion in arms, disdaining to be out-done in hardiness of enterprise by the enemy, undertook to regain Ferrybridge; and, with that view, passing the Eyre at Cailleford, three miles above, they marched with such secrecy and expedition, that they came upon Clifford before he had the least notice of their design; and being thus surprized in his turn, his men put to the rout, and he himself was slain, together with the lord John Neville, son to the earl of Westmoreland, and almost the whole party.

The next day, being Palm Sunday, March 24, Edward crossed the river by day-break, and advanced towards the Lancastrians, who, to the number of sixty thousand, occupied the fields between Towton and Saxton. Whether it was because the enemy were so much superior in numbers, or out of resentment for the cruelties exercised by them at the battle of Wakefield, Edward now published an order through his army, that his soldiers should not encumber themselves with prisoners, which seems to have been the principal cause of the carnage of that day. The van of Henry's army was led by the earl of Northumberland and the brave sir Andrew Trollop, who had served many years in France; the other divisions were commanded by the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earl of Westmoreland, the lords Dacre, Grey, Wills, and other noblemen and officers. The lord Fauconbridge commanded Edward's vanguard; the main body was headed by the earl of Warwick: and sir John Wenlock, with sir John Denham, had the bringing up of the rear; while Edward himself, confined to no post, held himself ready to fly on every occasion where counsel or danger demanded his presence.

The battle began about nine o'clock in the morning, at which time a thick snow falling, was driven by a brisk wind full in the faces of the Lancastrians*, who were thereby prevented from observing the just distance of the enemy. The lord Fauconbridge, an old and experienced officer, made an admirable use of this accident; for he ordered his men to advance as near as they conveniently could, and to discharge a flight of arrows upon them, and then retire with all speed out of the reach of those of the enemy. This stratagem had a wonderful effect: the Lancastrians feeling the arrows, and thinking their enemies were not many yards distant, emptied their quivers by repeated discharges, Edward's men all the while keeping theirs in reserve; and the lord Fauconbridge perceiving the Lancastrians shot was near spent, and that they were advancing, as was customary, sword in hand, to begin a close fight, he plied them with another furious discharge, which obliged them to fall back to the main body. The earl of Northumberland and sir Andrew Trollop seeing the disadvantage under which they laboured in this way of fighting, pressed on to nearer combat, and then the battle became firm, obstinate, and bloody: the deathful contest raged with unremitted fury for ten hours equal dispute, and, after great numbers of Englishmen, lay dead in the field, towards the evening the Lancastrians began to give ground, and retreat towards Tadcaster bridge, all the while preserving their ranks, and facing about occasionally as they retired. Edward, who this day exhibited such proofs of surprizing courage, activity, and conduct as not a little inclined the victory in his favour, now endeavoured, in conjunction with the earl of Warwick, who had nobly seconded his royal master, to animate his men to render the action decisive; the voice of their king, the presence of their beloved general, inspired every breast with manly resolution; they redoubled their efforts, and charged the Lancastrians with such impetuosity, that these latter could no longer keep themselves unshaken; the rout once begun, became general. Henry's men flying to gain the bridge, great numbers of them were drowned in attempting to pass the narrow but deep river, or rather brook, of Cock, which lay in their way. Edward followed close at their heels, dealing death to thousands of the fugitives: the pursuit lasted the greatest part of the night and the next day; and, dreadful to relate, many miles of the country round were stained with the blood of six-and-thirty thousand Englishmen, slain in the action by the hands of — Englishmen! Henry's party made by far the greatest number of the killed; they lost, besides private men and officers of inferior note, the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, the lords Dacres and Wills, sir John Neville, brother to Westmoreland, sir Andrew Trollop, and many other knights and gentlemen; the earl of Devonshire (Courtney), who had lately espoused the cause of Henry, was taken prisoner, and brought to York, where he was soon after beheaded by martial law, and his head placed on a pole over one of the gates of that city; while the head of the duke of York, Edward's father, and that of the earl of Salisbury, were taken down and interred with their bodies.

After this signal victory, Edward marched directly to York, hoping to find Henry and Margaret there, and by their captivity to crown the success of his arms; but this unhappy pair were no sooner informed of the defeat of their army, than they fled to Berwick, accompanied by the dukes of Exeter and Somerset, and, leaving that fortress under the care of the latter, they set out directly for Scotland. That kingdom was then under a wife and politic administration, who governed during the minority of James III. (son of James II. slain before Roxburgh castle), and were perfectly disposed to make the best advantage to themselves of the miseries of England. Notwithstanding the connexion between the royal family of Scotland and the house of Lancaster, by the young king's grandmother, who was a daughter of the earl of Somerset, Margaret soon found that some considerable sacrifice of interest must be made to engage such a ministry heartily in the cause of her husband; she therefore offered to cede to them the important fortress of Berwick and the city of Carlisle, to be reannexed to the crown of Scotland, and to affiancé her son, the prince of Wales, to a sister of king James: the bargain was soon struck; and we find by the rolls of parliament†, that, so early as the twenty-fifth day of April this year, Berwick was actually delivered to the Scots; but the intended marriage never took effect. This convention made, and the Scots having engaged to exert their utmost efforts in order to restore her family to the throne of England, the queen left her husband in the Grey Friars, at Edinburgh, a retirement which his love of solitude made agreeable, and embarked for France, to solicit supplies from Lewis XI. who then sat on that throne. In the mean while Edward continued to keep his head-quarters at York, from whence he made all the necessary dispositions for preserving the northern parts in awe.

Having, as he thought, fully provided for the peace, quiet, order, and security of those parts, by a pretty long stay in them, he returned, on the first of June, to his palace of Shene, near London; and was crowned, on St. Peter's day, Monday, the twenty-ninth of June, at Westminster. The king's younger brothers, George and Richard, who, being very young, had been sent, near six months before, to Bruges, as a place of safety during the war, came back to England on this occasion, and were created dukes †, the first of Clarence, and the other of Gloucester: Henry, lord Bourchier, was made earl of Essex; as the lord Fauconbridge was of Kent; and the lord John Neville, brother to the earl of Warwick, was created viscount Montagu; and others were raised to the dignity of barons.

The corruptions which prevailed universally, during the late reign, had produced an infinite number of disorders in all places, particularly in the courts of judicature. Edward applied himself with great assiduity to the correcting of these grievances; sat frequently in the courts of justice, to observe their methods, and the behaviour of the judges; and made a progress through Kent, Sussex, Hampshire, and other counties of the West as far as Bristol and the Marches of Wales, to learn the state of those parts, and to see how justice was administered. He returned in the latter end of October, to hold a parliament, which had been summoned to meet on the sixth of July, but, on the news of the Scots having invested Carlisle, had been prorogued to the fourth day of November.

The parliament meeting on that day, at Westminster, as soon as the forms usual at the beginning of a session were over, the commons waited on the king with an address, reciting "his great exploits and glorious victories, and returning him their humblest thanks for exposing his person for the safety of the realm, and the relieving the good people of England from the insupportable tyranny under which they had so long laboured; concluding with a request, that the king would be pleased to punish all persons guilty of such extortions, rapes, murders, and other outrages as had been passed over uncensured during the late reign." Being returned to their house, the first business they fell upon, was a review of all the usurpations of the house of Lancaster, from the time Henry IV. had seized the crown. Then an act was passed, confirming the title of Edward: all those which had been made against the house of York were repealed: Henry VI. after a reign of thirty-eight years, was declared an usurper, and all his transactions were annulled as illegal: and, lastly, he himself, his queen, and his son, with all their adherents, were attainted as traitors. The attainder of the earl of Cambridge, grand-father to the king, was next reversed: several acts of the like tendency passed; and on the twenty-first of December, the king adjourned the parliament, in the following speech to the commons, which we shall give our readers in the old English language of those days, as it is the first genuine speech we have of any king of England.

"James Strangways, and ye that be commyn for the commons of this my lond, for the true hertes and tender considerations that ye have had to my right and title, that y and my auncestres have had unto the coronne of this reame, the which from us have been long withholde. And now, thanked be almighty God, of whos grace groweth all victory, by youre true hertes and grate assistens, y am restored unto that is my right and title; wherefore y thanke you as hertely as y can. Also for the tender and true hertes that ye have shewed unto me, in that ye have tenderly had in remembrance the correction of the horrible murder and cruel deth of my lord my fader, my brother Rutland, and my cosyn of Salysbury, and other, y thanke you right hertely: and y shall be unto you, with the grace of almighty God, as good and gracious sovereign lord as ever was of my noble progenitours to their subgettes and liegemen. And for the faithfull and lovyng hertes, and also the grate labours that ye have born and susteyned towards me, in the recovering of my said right and title which y now possesse, y thanke you with all my herte; and yf y had any better good to reward you with all then my body ye shold have it, in which shall alway be redy for your defence, never sparing nor letting for noo jeopardie. Praying you all of your herty assistens and good continuance, as y shall be unto you youre veray right-wisse and lovyng liege lord."

The parliament was then prorogued by the chancellor, at the king's command, till the sixth of May ensuing.

The year 1462 began in England with a scene of proscription and bloodshed, the fatal effect of jealous sovereignty. Not contented with the numbers of persons whose blood had been attainted, and their estates confiscated, for adhering to the house of Lancaster, Edward now determined to proceed against all such who had not heartily joined with him, as if they had declared themselves open enemies, and to punish them accordingly. Among many others sacrificed to this murderous policy was John de Vere, earl of Oxford, a venerable old nobleman of unblemished character, who was accounted the oracle of his time in all points of the constitution*, and whose qualities, virtues, experience, and parts gave him such authority as was decisive with the public. As he could not stoop to be the flatterer, he was doomed to be the victim, of the new government: he was arrested on pretence of having engaged in a correspondence with queen Margaret, and, without being admitted to trial, the most sacred right of Englishmen, was beheaded on Tower-hill, on the twelfth of February, together with his eldest son, Aubrey de Vere; and, on the twenty-sixth of the same month, sir Thomas Todenham, sir Walter Tirrel, and sir John Montgomery suffered the same fate, as did sir Baldwin Fulford not long after, at Bristol.

The lands and effects of these victims Edward distributed among his own adherents; at the same time, to secure one strong party in the nation in his favour, he courted the good-will of the clergy, by confirming their privileges, exempting them from being prosecuted in civil courts for felony and other offences; with many other indulgencies, which he thought most likely to win them over to his side.

All this time queen Margaret was soliciting the French court at Chinon for succours for her husband, and which, if obtained, she knew would put the Scots upon acting vigorously in her favour; but it soon appeared what little stress was to be laid on foreign assistance: all her own and her father's instances could not engage the court of France to embark heartily in her interest; nor could she procure in any other manner succours equal to her enterprize. Lewis XI. was strongly prepossessed against any breach with England, and the most she could obtain of him was an underhand connivance at her raising troops in his dominions, and the privately furnishing her with a good general, Peter de Brezé, seneschal of Normandy, who was released from his confinement in the castle of Loches, on condition of entering into the service of her father, Regnier, king of Sicily, and commanding the forces levied by him and Margaret for a descent in England.

The French writers have computed these at two thousand men; but the English historians reduce their number to five hundred at most. With these Margaret and Brezé embarked for the North of England; but her ships were most of them dispersed or wrecked, and the vessel in which she herself was with her son, driven into Berwick: thither she was soon followed by Bregé, who, finding himself incapable of keeping the field against the lord Hastings, sir Ralph Grey, and sir John Howard, who were sent to oppose his attempts, shut himself up in Alnwick castle, where he defended himself gallantly, till he was relieved by the earl of Angus, at the head of twenty thousand Scots, who made an agreement with the English, that he should be allowed to retire with his troops to Scotland; and the castle being surrendered on the thirtieth of July, sir Ralph Grey was appointed governor. The lord Dacre soon after surrendered the castle of Naworth to John Neville, lord Montagu, warden of the East Marches. King Edward, on the first advice of this descent, had set out for the North; but finding it defeated, and having secured Donald, lord of the Isles*, and James earl of Douglas, in his interest, returned soon to London.

Upon the twentieth of March this year, the earl of Warwick was made keeper of the Narrow Seas, a post different from that of admiral of England, which, on the thirtieth of July following, was conferred on the new-made earl of Kent. In the autumn of this year, the new admiral, with the earl of Essex and the lord Audley, made a descent in Brittany, where they took the town of Conquette, and plundered the Isle of Rhée.

Queen Margaret, on finding that the force which she had brought over was not strong enough to encourage the Northumbrians to join her, she set sail in April, 1463, with four ships, from Kircudbright, in Galloway, through the Irish Channel, to Brittany, where she prevailed on Francis II. who had succeeded his father John in that duchy, to supply her with twelve thousand crowns: and proceeding thence to the court of France, procured a succour of two thousand men. With this inconsiderable force, which was purchased by an engagement to deliver up Calais†, she landed, in October, near Bamburgh, in Yorkshire; and though the country did not rise in her favour, she found means to get possession of the castle of Alnwick, which was either treacherously given up by sir Ralph Grey, the governor, or reduced for want of provisions. Edward, alarmed at her progress, and expecting that she would be shortly reinforced by a powerful supply from Scotland, left London, on the third of November, with a numerous force, and marched directly for York. Margaret, hearing of his arrival there, thought fit to retire into Scotland, leaving the custody of Alnwick castle to the son of de Brezé and the lord Hungerford, and that of Bamburgh castle to the duke of Somerset, the earl of Pembroke, and sir Ralph Piercy. The king, seeing no enemy in the field, laid siege at once to the castles of Alnwick, Bamburgh, and Dunstanburgh; the two last of which places surrendered after a short siege: the duke of Somerset, the earl of Pembroke, and the lord Roos were suffered to retire into Scotland, with sir Ralph Piercy, sir H. Lewis, and sir Nicholas Latimer. Alnwick surrendered the ninth of January, 1464, to the earl of Warwick.

Queen Margaret, however, bestirred herself so effectually in Scotland, that she was in a condition to return again to the North of England with a considerable force, whom she had gotten together by promises of a full liberty in respect of plunder. Henry accompanied his warlike consort in this expedition, and they entered Northumberland the latter end of April. Fortune seemed at first to favour their undertaking; the queen surprized the castle of Bamburgh, of which she appointed sir Ralph Grey, who had entered into her service, governor: and, being joined by the duke of Somerset and sir Ralph Piercy, with their followers, she proceeded to take many places in that part of the county. The first check she met with was from Neville, lord Montague, who, on the twenty-fifth of April, routed a party of her forces, in an action on Hedgely Moor, where sir Ralph Piercy was slain, fighting valiantly in her cause, though deserted by his men, who acted upon no other principle than that of rapine.

Edward by this time began to look upon Margaret's progress as a serious affair: he had, on the first advice of her entering the Marches, fitted out a fleet, which he ordered to the northward, and was now on his march to York, attended by the principal noblemen of his court, and a large army, part whereof, upon his arrival there, he detached to reinforce the lord Montagu. But this able general, encouraged by his late success, resolved to have the sole honour of terminating the war, and, without waiting for the succours sent him, he, on the fifth of May, advanced against the main body of Henry's army, which lay encamped on a plain called the Levells, upon the river Dowal, near Hexham. Here he made a most desperate attack, in the night-time, upon Henry's camp, and was as manfully received: however, after repeated attempts, he forced the trenches, and put the Lancastrians to a total discomfiture. There the duke of Somerset, with the lords Hungerford, Ross, and Moleyns, sir Thomas Hufsey, sir Thomas Wentworth, and sir John Findearn were taken prisoners. The duke of Somerset was immediately carried to Hexham, and beheaded; and the others were in like manner put to death a few days after, at Newcastle. As to Henry, being well mounted, he fled towards Lancashire, but was so closely pursued, that some of his body-attendants were taken almost by his side; and, among others, the person who carried his cap of state, which was presented to Edward at York.

Hexham lying at too great a distance from the Scottish territories to allow the Lancastrians an easy retreat thither in the sudden rout of their forces, and the country about it being full of woods and mountains, a great number of them, lost or skulking in the woods, were hunted and picked up from time to time, for two months after the battle; and it was the likeliest scene for that adventure which Monstrelet, the French historian, relates of queen Margaret.

This writer says, that, flying with her son in the confusion of the rout, and in the dusk of night, without any other attendant than her own heroic spirit, she was bewildered in one of these woods, where the splendor of her attire soon betrayed her into the hands of robbers. It happened, fortunately for her, that the richness of the booty occasioned a quarrel among those thieves, and, while they were disputing the matter, the queen, with her son, escaped out their hands. She had not gone far before she fell in with another robber, who was one of the out-guards of the gang, and on sight of her advanced with his sword drawn in his hand; finding it impossible to make her escape a second time, being already near exhausted with fatigue, she trembled for the life of her son; but happily recollecting that the party might have been driven into the practice of rapine by being proscribed for their adherence to her husband's interest, she summoned up all her resolution, and, taking her son in her hand, she approached the outlaw with an air of majestic confidence, and presenting to him the young prince, "Here, my friend (said she), save my son, the son of good king Henry." The robber, struck with awe at the name of his king, and with compassion at the distresses of persons of such high dignity, forgot the ferocious manners of his profession: he laid hold of the young prince with one hand, and supporting the queen with the other, he carefully conducted them out of the forest to a village by the sea-side, from whence she had soon after an opportunity of passing over to the duke of Burgundy's dominions in Holland, where we must for some time leave her, to attend the fate of her still more unfortunate consort.

Henry, having escaped after his defeat at Hexham, though with great difficulty, took refuge in Scotland; but having received intelligence that a truce was on foot between his rival Edward and that government, and fearing he should be delivered up; having no conveniency to escape by sea, he unfortunately thought of sheltering himself in England. Accordingly he set out in disguise, and reached Waddington hall, in Cleatherwood, in Lancashire, where he remained concealed for a considerable time; but at length he was discovered by the indefatigable pains of sir James Harrington; a service which was amply rewarded by Edward, who ordered the unhappy Henry to be conducted to London, where he was confined close prisoner in the Tower.

Edward, after the victory of Hexham, having no longer any enemy to dread, returned in great triumph to London, where he employed himself in cultivating a good correspondence with the duke of Burgundy, by whose mediation a truce for fifteen years was concluded with the Scots, who had now deserted Henry's ruined fortunes, and who engaged on this occasion "to give no farther assistance or comfort to Henry, late calling himself king of England, Margaret his wife, Edward his son, or any of their friends or adherents:" and king Edward promised, on his part, to give no countenance or protection to any rebels or traitors to king James.

Edward's next care was to reward those who had most distinguished themselves in his service. To the earl of Warwick he gave the temporalities of the bishopric of Carlisle, which was then vacant, and created him great-chamberlain of England and warden of the West Marches of Scotland. The lord Montagu, his brother, was made earl of Northumberland, in the room of Henry Piercy, whose title and estate were forfeited as being a Lancastrian; and sir William Herbert, a knight of great interest in Wales, was created earl of Pembroke, in the place of Jasper Tudor: but Piercy submitting afterwards to the king, and obtaining his pardon, had his earldom of Northumberland restored to him, and the title of marquis was given to Montagu, in lieu thereof. But the two illustrious brothers, Warwick and Montagu, thought their rewards rather specious than solid; and from this time we may date their secret discontent with Edward.

This king, though no deep politician, had yet sense enough to perceive that the loss of this family might prove a severe blow to him, unless he could supply it by the means of a general popularity, to acquire which he spared no pains, extending his grace to all his opponents who submitted, and living among his loyal subjects with an unusual frankness and liberty. He carried this last point perhaps to excess, shewing himself more familiar with the commonalty as well as the nobility, than became his dignity and honour, particularly with the Londoners, whom he made his fast friends: in a word, he set himself up for the general patron among the men, as he was the general lover among the ladies. He laboured to restore the tranquility of his realm by an impartial administration of justice, and reforming the abuses of public offices. Nor were his cares to gain esteem confined to his own dominions only; he studied how to bring princes, hitherto neutral or averse to his friendship, to court it, in which he succeeded so well, that the public records shew us that, about this time, several matches were proposed to him by foreign courts, but particularly the three following ladies; Margaret, daughter to the king of Scotland; Isabella, sister to Henry IV. of Castile; and the lady Bona,

Bona, daughter to the duke of Savoy, and sister to the queen of France: Edward resolved upon Bona, and it was thought proper to appoint the great earl of Warwick to negotiate the match, who accepted the commission. He accordingly went over, with a vast equipage, to France, where he was received with raptures by Lewis XI. and his queen, who relished the proposition of the marriage so well, that Dammartin was appointed ambassador to England, to conclude the same. During the earl of Warwick's stay on the continent, he found means to conclude a truce with the duke of Brittany for one year. About the same time the see of York becoming vacant, George Neville, brother to the earl of Warwick, was promoted to it, by the king's recommendation.

The earl of Warwick applied himself with great assiduity to fulfil his commission; but, whilst he was labouring for the glory and advantage of his master and his country, an unforeseen accident subverted all this mighty scheme of policy, the amorous temper of Edward betraying him into a measure which proved very prejudicial to his future tranquility, and had almost deprived him of the throne. The young monarch, at a hunting-match in Wychwood forest, coming to the manor of Grafton, near Stony Stratford, in Buckinghamshire, resolved to pay a visit to the duchess dowager of Bedford (Jaqueline of Luxemburgh) who resided there, having been married a second time to sir Richard Wydeville, or Woodville, afterwards created lord Rivers, by whom, among other children, she had a daughter named Elizabeth, who had been married to sir John Grey, of Groby; and her husband being slain, fighting for Henry at the late battle of St. Alban's, his estate on that account was confiscated, and the young widow, who was esteemed the greatest beauty of her time, withdrew to her father's seat at Grafton, where she lived in privacy and retirement. Elizabeth thought the king's visit to her mother furnished her with a favourable opportunity of obtaining some grace from the young monarch, who was so extolled for his condescension and gallantry, especially to those of her sex. Accordingly she came into the royal presence, and throwing herself at the king's feet, she implored a maintenance for herself and her two sons, Thomas and Richard Grey, out of the forfeited estate of her husband.

Edward was young and amorous; he was instantly struck with the charms of the fair suppliant; he felt an impression which he mistook for compassion, but which was in truth love; he raised her from the ground with assurance of favour, and even intimated it was not in his power to refuse her any thing. He protracted his visit for several days, during which time he found his passion daily strengthened by the company and conversation of the lovely widow; till at length, his flame growing too furious for restraint, he avowed his love, and, in his turn, became a suitor for favours, which Elizabeth would not grant on any other condition than that of marriage. Edward, who had never known any of the sex proof against his charms, glowed with disdain at finding his suit so peremptorily rejected; he withdrew, resolving to conquer an inclination which he thought he could not indulge consistent with his honour and high dignity: he sought a cure in absence, but the shaft was too deeply fixed in his heart to be removed by all the efforts of reason. Hopes of success engaged him to repeat his visit; each interview and conversation fed and increased the flame; opposition rendered the lover more eager; and Jaqueline, a woman of good sense and great art, managed matters so well for her daughter, that the king was at length persuaded to marry her, finding no other way of gratifying his passion; and the ceremony was performed on the morning of the first of May, at Grafton, by a private priest, no one else being present but the duchess of Bedford and two of her gentlewomen.

Edward had reason to dread the consequences of such an hasty inconsiderate marriage coming to be known; he is even said to have repented, and endeavoured to disengage himself; but he was too fast tied in the bands of wedlock, and all he could do was to keep it as secret as he could, and put the best face upon the matter when it could be no longer concealed.

Warwick had laboured so effectually at the court of France, that nothing remained but the ratification of the treaty, and the conducting the princess Bona over to England; but when the earl heard of Edward's clandestine marriage, which was not long before it transpired, he considered it as the highest insult that could have been offered to his honour, and, instantly breaking off the negotiation, he returned to England, glowing with rage and indignation: nevertheless, he seems to have concealed his resentment, for the king's marriage being publicly declared on the Michaelmas-day following, he himself assisted, with the duke of Clarence, in leading Elizabeth to the church of the abbey of Reading, where she was declared queen, and received the compliments of all the nobility; and on the twenty-sixth of May, 1465, she was crowned in Westminster abbey, by the archbishop of Canterbury. Her rise was immediately followed by that of all her relations: her father was created earl Rivers, and made high constable of England; her brother, John Woodville, at the same time was married to the daughter and heiress of the lord Scales, to whose honours he succeeded; her son, Thomas Grey, was created marquis of Dorset, and married the heiress of the lord Bonneville. Thus the queen's kindred were not only ennobled by titles, but enriched with great estates to support them.

The kings of England were accustomed not to take any step of moment without the advice of their council, and this advice is constantly mentioned in all their acts. The nobility of the kingdom, who, according to the rigour of the feudal system, could not marry without the king's consent, conceived themselves particularly interested in his marriage, and thought they had a right to be consulted on the occasion; therefore the king's marrying one of his subjects, without once consulting any of them, and that too when he was negotiating a match at the court of France, nay when that match was already concluded, made most of the nobility in a very bad humour with the court; and the partiality shewn in the late promotions of the new queen's relations, contributed not a little to increase their jealousy and discontent: but the earl of Warwick thought himself injured in a particular manner, by being made such a tool in the late negotiation, and he only waited for a favourable opportunity to make Edward feel the weight of his resentment. With this view, upon pretence of health, he got leave leave to retire to his castle of Warwick, where he began to practise all the arts of popular patriotism discontented with a court. Edward, alarmed at his sullen retirement, redoubled his attention to his conduct.

Determined, therefore, to provide against every accident which might interrupt his pleasure, or give encouragement to the discontent of this haughty subject, he endeavoured to strengthen himself by foreign alliances; and, in the course of this year, he concluded a treaty with the count de Charolois, and Philip, duke of Burgundy; and another of definitive alliance with the duke of Brittany: neither must we omit that Lewis XI. notwithstanding his late provocation, wanted to bring Edward over to his alliance; and that he was courted at the same time by the kings of Denmark and Poland, and by the great-master of the Teutonic order and the deputies of the Hanse towns, with all whom he entered into alliances till October, 1467*. Edward was equally successful with other courts, for he renewed his alliances with the kings of Castile and Arragon; and, after a long negotiation, concluded a treaty with James III. of Scotland, at Newcastle, whereby a truce then subsisting between that nation and England, which was to end on the thirty-first of October, 1470, was farther prolonged to the thirty-first of October, 1519, viz. for forty years†.

While Edward was thus successful abroad he was equally happy in the affections of his parliament at home, which granted him subsidies with a liberality unknown under any former reign. The commons also passed a bill of attainder against all who remained unattainted of the Lancaster party, the forfeiture of whose estates to the crown enabled the king to gratify his friends: in a word, faction was dumb at home, his friendship was courted and his enmity dreaded abroad, till the year 1466.

In the mean time, however, the queen was very active in improving the advantages which her marriage gave her; she was equally careful to procure every favour and grace to her own friends and adherents, and to exclude those of the earl of Warwick, whom she looked upon as her inveterate and implacable enemy: besides the preferments already bestowed upon her family, she now procured her sister Catherine to be given in marriage to the young duke of Buckingham, a minor and ward of the crown: Mary, another of her sisters, was married with William Herbert, who was thereupon made lord of Dunster, and afterwards earl of Huntingdon: and Anne, a third sister, espoused the son and heir of Grey, lord Ruthyn, who was honoured with the title of earl of Kent: her father, the earl Rivers, had also the office of treasurer added to that of high-constable, with which he had been before invested.

Edward, who was jealous of the earl of Warwick's power, that power which had placed him on the throne, and which had been still farther increased by his own liberality and munificence, was glad to raise up some counterpoise to it by creating him rivals among the new nobility; and thus, while he indulged his extreme partiality to the queen's relations, he pretended to be guided merely by the motives of national interest: the consequences of this conduct will appear in the sequel.

Early in the year 1466, Edward was made blessed by the birth of a daughter, the princess Elizabeth, who afterwards became the happy instrument of healing the wounds of England after a long and bloody civil war: and soon after Michaelmas the court of England was graced with ambassadors from almost all the powers of Europe; but none made so splendid an appearance as Anthony, bastard of Burgundy, who was sent over by the count de Charolois, to conclude a treaty of marriage between that prince and the lady Margaret, sister to Edward; a match which was not consummated till the year 1468. Historians have given us a very circumstantial and diverting account of a joust or tournament, which was held for five days successively in Smithfield, between the bastard and the lord Scales, the queen's brother.

The year 1467 was distinguished by farther prosecutions of the Lancaster party, in which the earl Rivers, the queen's father, and sir John Fogg, treasurer of the king's household, rendered themselves very unpopularly conspicuous: but what shews the jealousy and weakness of the government most, is that the queen and her father had interest enough to get sir John Markham dismissed from being lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, for not heartily concurring in the work of prosecution.

About Midsummer this year a parliament was held at Westminster, the great business of which was to pass an act of resumption, which in effect was proposed by the king himself, who, in a formal speech he made to the commons, declared, that "he designed to live upon his own revenue, without any charge to his subjects, except on great and urgent occasions, in which not so much his own inclinations or particular pleasure, the usual motives of former kings in their conduct, as the safety and welfare of his people, and the defence of the realm, were immediately concerned; and therefore he hoped they would be as kind to him as they had been to any of his predecessors‡." The design expressed in his speech was very agreeable to the commons; but Edward's real view herein seems to have been to get the Neville family and their friends in his power, and make them dependent upon him for the enjoyment of those vast estates he had granted them as a reward for their eminent services. The commons understood his meaning, and, for the better enabling him to live upon the crown revenue, brought in a bill to resume all grants of lands and offices since the day of Edward's accession, annulling them all, except in certain cases mentioned in special provisos added to the act when it passed the royal assent||. The king was so well pleased with having carried his point, that he ordered the chancellor (the bishop of Lincoln, in absence of the archbishop of York), to return the parliament thanks for this act of resumption; and the session was then adjourned to the sixth of May, 1468.

Philip, duke of Burgundy, dying on the fifteenth of June, in the seventy-second year of his age, was succeeded in his title and dominions by his only son, Charles (count de Charolois), whose martial achievements procured him the surname of the Hardy. This prince being sprung by his mother, a daughter of Portugal, from John of Ghent, was of course disposed to wish well to the house of Lancaster; but this circumstance was more than overbalanced by political considerations.

The dark and insatiable ambition of Lewis XI. of France, had raised great apprehensions among all his neighbours and vassals; and, as he was possessed of great abilities, and restrained by no principles of faith or honour, they found no security to themselves but in a mutual league and combination against him. The heads of the confederacy were the count de Charolois, whom we must hereafter name the duke of Burgundy, the dukes of Berry, Brittany, and Bourbon, and the duke of Calabria, brother to the exiled queen Margaret, Henry VI's consort. Burgundy's ambition was even more unbounded than that of Lewis, but supported by less power and policy, and therefore regarded with a more indulgent eye by the other potentates of Europe.

The clashing of interests, and a still greater antipathy of temper, occasioned a violent hatred between these two bad princes (Lewis and Burgundy), and Edward had the advantage of making either of them his friend, whose cause he chose to espouse. The duke of Burgundy, while earl of Charolois, had, as we have already observed, entered into a treaty with Edward, and actually agreed to marry that monarch's sister, the princess Margaret: the death of duke Philip appeared an incident the most proper to cement the proposed alliance, and the new duke, the very day of his father's death, ratified his agreement with England, and offered to put his hand to the final conclusion of the match with Edward's sister.

The friendship of Burgundy was more agreeable to the English than that of France; the commercial interests of the two nations were more closely connected; the jealousy and suspicion which both parties entertained of the growing power and dangerous designs of the French monarch, naturally led them to an alliance against such a formidable neighbour; and Edward, pleased to have it in his option to fortify himself by so powerful an ally, immediately accepted the proposal, and gave his sister to Charles.

A league which Edward made, in the beginning of the year 1468, with the duke of Brittany, seemed still farther to establish him in his throne, and to afford him a prospect of recovering those provinces which had formerly belonged to the English crown: but whatever towering projects the king might have formed, in consequence of these alliances, they were soon defeated by intestine commotions, which engrossed his whole attention.

The earl of Warwick, who, as we have already shewn, had retired from the court in great discontent, on account of the injuries and insults he had received from the family of the Woodvilles, prepared now to discharge the long-concealed bolt of his vengeance against the house of York. He redoubled his attempts towards popularity; his house was always open, his table always spread, for every one who chose to partake of his hospitality; and by these measures he soon rendered himself a greater favourite with the people than ever; but the most powerful friend whom Warwick engaged in his party, was George, duke of Clarence, the king's second brother. This prince was no less dissatisfied than the rest of the old nobility at the influence the queen and her relations had acquired over the king; and as Edward had excluded his brother Clarence from all share in the administration of government at home, he was strongly inclined to join the earl of Warwick in his opposition to the court.

That discerning nobleman quickly perceived the duke's real disposition, and resolved to turn it to his own advantage: in order therefore to make sure of so valuable a confederate, he offered the duke his eldest daughter, Isabella, in marriage. The young lady was coheir of her father's immense fortune; and as this was a settlement superior to any thing the king himself could bestow upon Clarence, it effectually attached him to the earl's party.

Edward seems to have been jealous of the earl of Warwick's proceedings; for, about the beginning of the year 1469, we find the said earl named in a commission of inquest concerning some lands in Picardy; on the seventh of August, the same year, he was made chief-justiciary of South Wales, and constable of Cardigan castle, with other offices conferred upon him*. But Warwick's resentment was too stubborn to be removed by these advances: besides, if we may believe Hall, an historian worthy of credit, he had a stronger reason to hate Edward than any yet mentioned, and that is, the latter had attempted the chastity of one of his daughters; and this prince's character, who was not very scrupulous in these respects, makes the thing still more credible: the earl, however, was too wise to blaze this last circumstance abroad, but, retiring to his government of Calais, under pretext of solemnizing his daughter's marriage with the duke of Clarence, while he resided in this place, he seems to have tried the pulse of the English by raising an insurrection in Yorkshire, through the means of the archbishop of York and the marquis of Montagu, his two brothers; though the latter, in order to keep himself clear from suspicion, actually headed the king's troops in that part of the country, and, marching against the rebellious rabble, put them to rout, and caused their chief, Robert Hillyard, to whom they had given the nickname of Robin of Ryddesdale, to be hanged. This conduct would give occasion to presume that the marquis had no share in raising the sedition, had not his real views been more fully explained by his after-proceedings.

The malecontents, however, rather animated than discouraged by the ill success of their first attempt, re-assembled in greater numbers than ever, and found themselves joined by the lord Fitz Hugh and Henry Neville, son of the lord Latimer, friends to the Warwick party; so that it was no hard matter for the government to guess that this insurrection was promoted by the Neville interest. As neither of the two noblemen above-mentioned had experience in military matters, the command of the rebel troops was given to sir John Conyers, an officer of great reputation and conduct. Their first project was to make themselves masters of York; but as that could not be done without artillery, in which they were deficient, they resolved to march southward; and, striking into the London road, they openly declared, "that they marched to deliver their lawful sovereign, king Henry, from his confinement, and place him again upon the throne."

* Rymer, vol. xi. p. 641, 647.

Edward was then in London, and not a little apprehensive of the consequences of this commotion. In the present exigency he took the wisest course he could have fallen on: he issued out orders to John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and Anthony, earl Rivers, to array and assemble all persons able to bear arms, in Norfolk and other parts; and made Henry, earl of Northumberland, and the prior of St. John's of Jerusalem, renew their oaths of fealty to him: he also wrote to his friend Herbert, earl of Pembroke, to assemble the Welsh, and, crossing the country, to intercept the march of the rebels from the North; he ordered him at the same time, at all events, to fight the malecontents on their march, promising him to be as expeditious as possible in raising an army to join and support him.

The earl of Pembroke applied himself so heartily to obey his master's orders, that in a short time he had gotten together ten or twelve thousand men, at the head of whom he began his march in quest of the rebels, who as he understood were advancing by Northampton. In his route he was joined by Humphrey, lord Stafford, lately created earl of Devonshire, with a large body of archers. The two armies coming in sight of each other, the earl of Pembroke detached all his horse, being two thousand, under his brother, sir Richard Herbert, with orders to observe the enemy's position, and, if he found it practicable, to attack their rear. Sir Richard, after due observation, was of opinion that the rebels could not be attacked without manifest disadvantage to his own troops; however, the fiery spirit of the Welsh not brooking the least appearance of coolness, they fell, against their leader's will, upon the rear of the malecontents; but Conyers had made such an admirable disposition, that the Welsh were repulsed with great loss.

In the mean time the earl of Warwick, pretending that he could not remain an idle spectator of his country's disasters at a distance, returned to England, and repaired forthwith to his castle of Warwick, where he and his son-in-law, the duke of Clarence, who had accompanied him over, assembled a considerable army, with which they lay perdu till they should see the event of the present commotions. The marquis of Montagu joined his brother Warwick soon after his arrival.

The rebels, upon hearing of the earl's arrival, instead of pursuing their road to London, took the way for Warwick, where they hoped to meet a cordial reception; but the earl of Pembroke, impatient to have his revenge, marched directly towards them, and forced them to halt near a town called Edgecot, about four miles from Banbury, and the two armies encamped at a small distance from each other; but the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Devonshire quarrelling about an inn, where each of them insisted upon taking up his quarters, a fatal dissention arose from this trifling cause: the earl of Devonshire, in revenge, during the night, traiterously drew off all his archers, and thereby left Pembroke exposed to the defeat which afterwards followed.

On the morrow, by break of day, the malecontents marched in good order to attack the king's army. They had heard, by deserters, of the earl of Devonshire's retreat, and were resolved to make the most of so fortunate an incident. Henry Neville, one of their leaders, venturing to charge at too great a distance from the main body, was surrounded by the royalists, all his men were cut to pieces, and himself taken prisoner: this somewhat checked the ardour of the insurgents, who thereupon retreated to their camp for that day; but the Welsh having inhumanly put Neville to death in cold blood, the rebels were raised to such fury by this act of barbarity, that the next day they attacked the royalists with irresistible fury. They were received, however, with equal courage, and the fortune of the day was on the point of declaring for the earl of Pembroke, when sir John Clapham coming up in the heat of the battle with a body of fifteen hundred men, bearing the ensigns of the earl of Warwick, one of whose officers he was, the rebels, upon his appearing in sight, set up the cry of "a Warwick! a Warwick!" which so terrified the Welsh, who thought that earl, with all his troops, was at hand, that they betook themselves to precipitate flight. The earl of Pembroke and his brother, sir Richard Herbert, fell into the hands of the conquerors, who, carrying them to Banbury, ordered their heads to be struck off, in revenge for the murder of sir Henry Neville. After this, a party was sent to the house of earl Rivers, the queen's father, at Grafton, who dragged that nobleman from thence, and, carrying him to Northampton, there struck off his head, without any trial. The insurgents, having thus taken vengeance on the most obnoxious of the ministers, retired without doing any more harm; for the earl of Warwick, by keeping himself neuter, in appearance at least, put a stop to any farther action on any side: not that there is the least room to doubt that he was the prime mover of all the outrages that had been committed; and yet, by an inconceivable blindness, Edward was so far from suspecting this to be the case, that, early in the next year, a commission was issued to the earl of Warwick and the duke of Clarence, for holding a general array of all the king's subjects within Worcestershire and other counties where they had interest.

The winter of this year, 1469, was spent in receiving ambassadors from Lewis XI. of France, under colour of renewing a truce; though his true aim was to be particularly informed of the situation of affairs here. At the same time Edward, desirous of strengthening his alliance with the duke of Burgundy, sent him the order of the Garter, which he received with great marks of honour and esteem.

We must not forget to note, that Edward, imputing the loss of the battle of Banbury to the earl of Devonshire's separating from Pembroke, on his return he ordered his head to be struck off, which sentence was executed at Bridgwater, on the seventeenth of August this year*.

The duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick, who had hitherto preserved the exterior of submission and loyalty, thought they could never have a more favourable opportunity of coming to a breach with Edward, than that with which he himself had furnished them in their late commission of array. Accordingly Warwick levied what forces he pleased in the king's name, but reserved the command of them to himself; and Clarence did the like. Early in the year 1470 they began to give such broad indications of their designs, that Edward could be no longer mistaken; and we find him, on the thirteenth of March, issuing a proclamation from York, where the court then resided, appointing John, lord Tiptoft, lately created earl of Worcester, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the duke of Clarence who before enjoyed that high post; and also setting a reward of a thousand pounds, or an hundred pounds a year, upon the heads of the duke and the earl of Warwick. Three days after, general commissions of array against the duke and earl by name were issued all over the kingdom, but with very little effect, for all Edward's authority could neither diminish the army of the rebels, nor raise one superior to them.

In this situation of affairs, Edward's best friends thought it would be most prudent to bring about a reconciliation, if possible, upon the basis of public reformation. The proposal was made, and accepted by the duke and earl, and an interview was agreed to be held between the king and the two chiefs of the opposite party, in London. But the conference had not the desired effect; it passed only in mutual recriminations, and Warwick in particular behaved so haughtily on the occasion, that Edward, unable to bear the insolence of the over-grown traitor, ordered him from his presence, and each side immediately appealed to the sword.

Warwick, immediately after leaving London, commissioned sir Robert Wills, son of the lord Wills, to levy troops in Lincolnshire, which he did with such great success, that Edward, alarmed thereat, sent an express to order the lord Wills to repair to court, with a design to oblige him to use his authority with his son to desist from supporting the rebels. The lord Wills did not think proper to slight this summons from his sovereign, and accordingly set out for London; but being informed on his way, Edward was highly incensed against his family for the attachment they had shewn to the Warwick party, he did not dare to face the king, but immediately upon his arrival took sanctuary in Westminster abbey, with sir Thomas Dimmock, his brother-in-law, who had accompanied him in his journey. Edward, informed of this, immediately sent them both letters of safe-conduct, upon the faith of which they quitted their asylum, and, at the instances of Edward, lord Wills wrote a pressing letter to his son, persuading him to abandon the rebels and return to his duty. But this order the young nobleman refused to obey, justly imagining his father to be under compulsion when the letter was wrote; and Edward marching towards Stamford, and finding that sir Robert Wills was more than ever attached to the party he had embraced, inasmuch that the earl of Warwick had given him the command next under himself, Edward, with a cruelty which nothing but the inhuman practices common in civil wars can account for, ordered the lord Wills, and sir Thomas Dimmock to be put to death for the disobedience of their son and nephew.

This cruel deed incensed sir Robert Wills to such a degree, that, deaf to all the dictates of prudence, he ventured to attack the royal army with a body of raw and undisciplined troops, without waiting to be reinforced by the earl of Warwick and the duke of Clarence, who were on the march to join him, and were expected every moment to arrive. The event was such as may be supposed from so precipitate a measure; the rebels were obliged to yield to the superior valour and discipline of the royalists, and were routed with great slaughter. Ten thousand men are supposed to have fallen in this engagement†; and sir Robert Wills and sir Thomas de la Launde, being taken prisoners, were executed immediately after the action.

This defeat quite disconcerted the earl of Warwick, who now gave over all thoughts of being able to keep the field that season; and the forces he had with him not being sufficient to face the royal army, superior in numbers and flushed with success, he saw no other remedy than to embark for France, in order to shun the impending danger, and therefore, dismissing his troops, he set out, with the duke of Clarence in his company, for Exeter, in order to provide and fit out ships to carry them and their families to Calais.

But Edward, not thinking proper to allow Clarence and Warwick time to debauch the principles of the inhabitants of the West by any long stay amongst them, marched thither with so much expedition, that he was, by the fifteenth of April, at Dartmouth, from whence he issued commissions to the earl of Wiltshire, the lord Mountjoy, and sir John Fortescue and others, for arraying the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The confederate princes, finding themselves thus pressed, embarked on board the few ships they had ready, on the twenty-fifth, and sailed for Calais; but, to their great surprize, when they offered to enter the harbour, the cannon of the place fired upon them, upon which being forced to stand off to sea, to add to their distress the duchess of Clarence, who, with her sister, had accompanied her husband and father, fell in labour and was delivered of a son, named Edward, who was afterwards earl of Warwick.

The command of the garrison had been entrusted by the earl of Warwick to one Vaublere, a Gascon gentleman, one who had always before served him with unshaken fidelity; however, all he could obtain on this occasion, were a few bottles of wine for the refreshment of the ladies, who were in a truly pitiable state; but at the same time Vaublere accompanied this trifling present by a private intimation, that he was compelled, by the disposition of the garrison, to act as he did, and counselled the earl his master to retire into France, and trust to his fidelity for improving any change of circumstance to the advantage of his interest. It is not improbable that the Gascon intended to act a double game, and to lie by till he should see which was the strongest side: however this might be, Edward was so pleased with his behaviour, that he bestowed the government of the place upon him; and the duke of Burgundy added a farther reward of a thousand crowns by way of pension. In the mean time the duke and earl, obliged to give way to their untoward fortunes, directed their course towards Normandy, and, in a few days after, landed at Harfleur, where they were amicably received by the bastard of Bourbon, lieutenant-general of the province; and from thence they repaired to the court of France, at Amboise, where they were received by Lewis XI. with all the honours due to their dignity and reputation.

Lewis would not interfere in the affairs of England while the two rival families were contending for the crown; but now that Edward had engaged in such a strict alliance with the duke of Burgundy, his inveterate foe, he was induced from motives of interest to attempt the ruin of both; and to this he was the rather inclined, because, while he consulted the good and safety of his own dominions, by suppressing the insolence of Burgundy, he should at the same time have an opportunity of avenging the affront he had received from Edward in the affair of the marriage: moreover, the succours which that monarch designed to send to the confederate princes of France in arms against Lewis, plainly shewed, that while he should enjoy the crown of England, those princes would always consider him as a sure protector and ally.

Influenced by these and the like considerations, he determined, if possible, to effect a reconciliation between Margaret of Anjou, queen of Henry VI. and the earl of Warwick; and for that purpose sent for that princess, who had retired to her father's court. Lewis found great difficulty in bringing this point to bear, on account of the implacable and rancorous animosity that prevailed between the two parties; but at length, their enmity giving way to their interest, a seeming accommodation took place, and it was resolved to unite heartily in raising the house of Lancaster from its misery, and in restoring Henry to his throne. It was agreed between Lewis and the earl of Warwick, that the former should fit out all the ships he could raise, and that these, joining with the earl's squadron, should be entirely under his direction. Queen Margaret, on her part, promised that her son, prince Edward, should marry Anne, the younger daughter of the earl of Warwick, and, on Henry's being re-enthroned, declared his immediate successor; and in default of issue, the crown was to devolve upon the duke of Clarence, who, with the earl of Warwick, his father-in-law, were to be regents of England till Edward came of age. The duke of Clarence, being but one-and-twenty years of age, was entirely under the government of Warwick, and swore to this agreement; yet, young as he was, he could not but see that his hopes of an immediate possession of the crown were defeated, and his pretensions to it not only postponed, but made dependent on a mere contingency, which the marriage of Edward and Anne, now solemnized with great pomp, rendered unlikely to happen: nevertheless, the duke found himself too deeply engaged to be able to retreat, and was obliged to give himself up to the guidance of his father-in-law. Hence we may readily account for his being dissatisfied with the earl of Warwick, and for the reasons which induced him to abandon that party, and join with his brother Edward, against whom he had hitherto acted with all the keenness of inveterate rebellion. This, I say, may be accounted for, without having recourse to the anecdote, which most of our historians have been so fond of relating after Philip de Commynes, who has carried a lady from England, who outwitted Vaublere, governor of Calais, who had secret proposals to communicate from Edward to Clarence, which, according to him, induced that duke to make his peace with his brother, and promise to serve him on his return to England. We cannot help pointing out one extraordinary circumstance which happened in consequence of this agreement of Amboise. By the marriage of prince Edward, Henry VI's son, with the daughter of the earl of Warwick, the duke of Clarence, Edward's brother, became brother-in-law to the young prince of the house of Lancaster; and the earl of Warwick equally related to the two rival families.

Nothing now remained but for the earl of Warwick to pass over to England with the fleet, which the French king had gotten ready for his service; and the daily accounts received from England, by a crowd of refugees, of the dispositions of the people to favour his cause, made the earl extremely urgent to depart. It seems that Edward, though he had been apprized by the duke of Burgundy of the agreement made at Amboise, had paid very little regard to that intimation, relying upon very uncertain principles, namely, the attachment of his subjects to his person and government, and Warwick's want of credit and influence; so that he neglected to take the necessary precautions for his own defence, and abandoned himself to a scandalous sensuality; but what is more amazing, at the time that he stood most in need of the good-will and affections of his people, he suffered them to be oppressed by every act of cruelty and malice that his ministers chose to exercise against those who were obnoxious to them: of these acts none gave so much horror as the execution of sir John Clapham, one of Warwick's officers, and about twenty other gentlemen of Henry's party, who, being taken on board a ship at Southampton, were, by the earl of Worcester (Tiptoft), lately made high-constable of England, ordered to be hanged, then fixed to the gallows by their legs, and afterwards impaled upon the highways. These instances of barbarity, instead of filling the spectators with fear and apprehension, inspired them with the most implacable hatred and indignation against the authors of the horrid scene. Numbers of reputable personages of the Lancastrian party fled over to France, among whom was John de Vere, earl of Oxford; who giving Warwick an account of the temper and state of the nation, and the certainty of his being strongly supported on his arrival, that nobleman drew the most favourable omen of success to his expedition: but he was for some time prevented from sailing by the proceedings of the duke of Burgundy.

This prince, as we have elsewhere remarked, espoused the interests of Edward; not so much out of regard to his alliance with him by the marriage of his sister, or any personal regard for him or liking to his cause, as out of hatred to Lewis; this constant motive of all his actions had put him upon joining Edward in pressing the parliament of Paris to send Warwick out of France; and he even carried his insolence so far as to threaten, if he was not sent away, to come with an army and seize him wherever he was concealed. This rhodomontade was treated with the contempt it deserved: however Charles prepared to put his threats in execution, and, having fitted out a strong fleet, composed of large Flemish and Dutch vessels, he sent his admiral, la Vire, to block up the mouth of the Seine, where Warwick lay with his own ships and those which the admiral of France had provided, ready to sail for England; but a violent storm arising, drove the Burgundian ships from their station, and gave the earl of Warwick, with his fleet, an opportunity of sailing for England, where they landed at Dartmouth about the middle of September, and immediately declared for king Henry.

It is almost incredible in how short a time the wished-for news of Warwick's arrival spread through the kingdom, and by what numbers he was joined. No event more clearly shews than this, the facility of bringing about a revolution in England, when the hearts of the people favour the attempt, and the government hath lost its reputation: though, indeed, we shall have numberless examples to shew, that no people in the world are so liable as the English to the infection of plausible pretexts; the art is to raise the cry of the multitude, and to follow it becomes the fashion. Warwick was well acquainted with this disposition of his countrymen, and made a proper use of it by issuing a proclamation for all who were capable of bearing arms, between sixteen and sixty, to enter immediately into the service of their lawful sovereign, Henry VI. The earl had not been landed six days before he saw himself at the head of sixty thousand men, all ready to draw their swords, and sacrifice their lives, for the late despicable, distressed, despairing house of Lancaster.

So unexpected an event opened Edward's eyes, and shewed him the folly of his expectations. He was then on a progress into the North, to quell an insurrection raised in Yorkshire by the lord Fitz Hugh, who had married Alice, sister to the earl of Warwick; but hearing of the success of the latter, he immediately turned back towards London, and had advanced on his way as far as Nottingham: but Warwick, being resolved to engage him before he should reach that capital, where he knew he was very popular, overtook him within three miles of Nottingham, and prepared to give him battle. Edward was so weak as to depend upon the fidelity of the marquis of Montagu, though the brother of his adversary, and a nobleman whom he was sensible thought himself injured by being deprived of the great estate and honour of Northumberland. He had raised six thousand men, with whom he followed the king at some distance, as if his intention had been to reinforce the royal army; but his real aim was to join his brother, and he had already concerted the affair with his officers; when he therefore understood that Warwick was so near the king's camp, he quickened his march in order to fall upon the rear of Edward, who had no intimation of his design, till the traitor was within two miles of his camp, and the air resounded with the cry of "God bless king Henry!"

In this emergency Edward called a council of war, in which the lord Hastings (who had married a sister of Warwick, and who was the faithful companion of Edward in all his fortunes) gave it as his opinion, that great part of the army would revolt to the earl of Warwick; or that, even should they do their duty, they would not be able to cope with the rebels, since this defection of Montagu: the duke of Gloucester, Edward's brother, with the earls of Rivers and Northumberland, joined in the same opinion, and it was agreed that they had nothing to trust to but flight, and that the king should immediately make the best of his way, attended by the chief of his followers, towards Lynn, in Norfolk, where some Dutch ships were at that time lying, on board of which they proposed to embark. Accordingly Edward set out, but without baggage or money, and got on board, on the third of October, and instantly put to sea, with his brother Gloucester, the lord Hastings, and some other friends; and, after having narrowly escaped a fleet of Easterlings, a set of freebooters then at war with both France and England, landed safely at Alkmar, leaving Warwick entire master of the kingdom, without a blow; and, what may appear still more surprizing, within the short space of eleven days after his landing at Dartmouth; for, on the morning of Edward's retreat, his army submitted to the victorious earl, who forthwith directed his march to London, which he entered in triumph on the sixth of October, accompanied by the duke of Clarence and other noblemen, when they once more led Henry from his prison to his palace.

Edward's unfortunate queen, seeing this reverse of fortune, though big with child, took refuge in Westminster abbey, to which she went privately by water from the Tower, and where, on the fourth of November, she was delivered of an heir to the crown of England, afterwards Edward V. She thus saved herself from violence and insult, for the whole city of London appeared now as extravagantly zealous for Henry as ever they had been for Edward.

Clarence and Warwick now assumed the government in Henry's name, and disposed of all posts: the judges, sheriffs, and coroners were changed all over the kingdom: Langstrother, prior of St. John of Jerusalem, was made treasurer; the archbishop of York, Warwick's brother, chancellor; the earl of Warwick himself, lord high-admiral of England; and the duke of Clarence, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. On this occasion no person was put to death but John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, who seems to have fallen a sacrifice to the public hatred. He was a corrupt and avaricious minister, and such a monster of cruelty that he was commonly stigmatized by the name of John the Butcher. Being taken concealed in a tree in the forest of Waverling, in Huntingdonshire, he was conveyed to London, tried in Westminster Hall, found guilty of high-treason, condemned, and executed upon Tower Hill.

Writs were now issued for summoning the great assembly of the nation, which met on the twenty-sixth of November; and as parliaments in such a juncture are always composed of persons obsequious to the will of the ruling party, this proceeded in all points agreeable to Warwick's directions. Edward was declared a traitor to his country, and an usurper of the throne; the paternal estate of York was forfeited; and the crown of England, in default of male heirs from Henry, settled upon the duke of Clarence and his descendants, according to the treaty of Amboise: and even Henry's personal government was set aside by this parliament, who declared the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick governors of the kingdom. They next proceeded proceeded to reverse several attainders, particularly those of the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, and of John de Vere, earl of Oxford; and the duke of Clarence, to keep him firm in his present party, had a gift of the York estate: the marquis of Montagu was restored to his favourite post of warden of the East Marches of Scotland. A long truce was concluded with France, and all imaginable precautions were taken to guard against any invasion. But it is now time to see what became of the fugitive Edward.

He had, on his arrival at Alkmar, a sea-port town on the coast of Holland, been hospitably received by de Bruges, lord of Gruythuse, governor of Holland under the duke of Burgundy, who provided the distressed king and his attendants whatever was suitable to their quality: and, conducting them to the Hague, he sent to notify their arrival to his master, the duke of Burgundy, who was not a little perplexed when he heard of this event, as apprehending he might embroil himself with the new government in England, by giving this luckless exile an asylum; and he had reasons to dread the consequences of a rupture with that court in the present juncture, being already attacked by Lewis XI. who had declared war against him, and taken possession of St. Quintin and Amiens; but the obligations of alliance, the ties of blood, and above all their connections by being brethren of the same orders, fixed him to give Edward leave to come to his court of St. Paul.

Willing, however, to be assured in the part he had to act, he dispatched his secretary, Philip de Commines (the historian) to Calais, to see what Vaublanc would do in this sudden change of affairs, and to take measures for preventing a rupture with England. Philip found the governor, the garrison, and all the inhabitants of Calais dressed in Warwick's livery and wearing his badges, which they had assumed on the first news of his success, and was assured the earl was sending over four thousand men to begin hostilities in the duke of Burgundy's dominions, who, as the protector of Edward, had been adjudged the enemy of England. Commines, though startled at this intimation, put the best face upon the matter, and insisted that his master's treaty being made with the kingdom as well as the king of England, it was still obligatory; and that the duke of Burgundy conceived himself bound to maintain it, the change of a king's name from Edward to Henry making no alteration. These arguments, however would have had little weight had they not been supported by the (staple) merchants of London and Calais, who were then persons of great authority and influence upon the affairs of the nation, and who were afraid of losing their commerce by a war. At their instances, therefore, the earl of Warwick put a stop to all hostilities, and it was agreed that the treaty with Burgundy should continue in force*; and that duke even went so far in his complaisance for the new government of England, as to order all his subjects to give Edward no assistance, though at the same time, with a double-dealing too common among princes, who think themselves superior to all the vulgar considerations which bind inferior persons, he gave him underhand fifty thousand florins, with four large ships, which were equipped in the Isle of Walkeren, in Zealand, where there was a free port, and secretly hired fourteen Easterling ships for his service. When all these ships were ready, Edward suddenly disappearing, the duke immediately ordered a fresh proclamation to be issued, that none of his subjects should presume to assist him, directly or indirectly, upon pain of death.

Warwick, however, was too discerning and active a politician to be the dupe of this dissimulation: he applied himself to every measure that he thought most likely to disappoint the attempt of his enemy; the sea-ports were strictly guarded, and it appears in the Collection of Public Acts, that in the month of January, 1471, the duke of Clarence was commissioned to raise an army to oppose the designs of Edward, in case he should return into the kingdom; and, on the tenth of February, the prior of St. John of Jerusalem received a commission to pass over to the continent, and bring back to England queen Margaret, and her son the prince of Wales.

Mean while Edward, who had got every thing ready for his expedition, put to sea from the port of Flushing, in Zealand, with the lords Hastings and Say, and about two thousand men, partly English and partly Flemings. On the twelfth of March he came before Cromer, in Norfolk, where he sent on shore sir Robert Chamberlain, sir Gilbert Debenham, and others, to discover how the people stood affected. These trusty messengers soon found, that, by the vigilance of John de Vere, earl of Oxford, and the great preparations he had made, it was unsafe to land in those parts; wherefore it was resolved to stand to the northward, and a storm arising in the night, they were at about at sea till the fourteenth, when they were obliged to run with their ships into Ravenspur, in Yorkshire, where Henry IV. had formerly landed, when he came to wrest the crown from Richard II. and whose policy Edward copied on this occasion; for finding, to his great astonishment and mortification, that, instead of being received with open arms, there was a general despondency and coldness in the people to his cause, he resolved upon a total alteration of his measures, and publicly gave out that he came not to reclaim the crown, but his paternal estates, which, he said, had been, against all law and right, given away, through the earl of Warwick's interest, by the late parliament.

It is incredible, says one of our old English historians †, what effect this politic dissimulation had upon the people: compassion now supplying the place of affection, numbers flocked to join him, deceived by his humble pretensions; and even the nobility shewed themselves willing to have him for a fellow-subject, though not for a king. On the sixteenth of March, the second day after his landing, he marched directly for York, in the neighbourhood of which he arrived on the nineteenth, and found the inhabitants universally disposed to assist him as duke of York, in recovering his paternal estates, though not as king of England. To quiet their minds in this respect, he hesitated not to take a solemn oath in the cathedral, never to renew his pretensions to the crown; to use the city in a gentle and courteous manner; and lastly, to be a true and faithful subject to his lawful king, Henry: an oath which he soon shewed he had no intention to keep; however, the better to support his perjury, he went so far as to put on the ostrich-feather, the badge of Henry's son.

During his short stay at York (where he borrowed some money of the citizens, and in return bridled them with a garrison) his army was prodigiously increased; he would not however, have ventured to march towards London, had he not received advice from his brother Clarence, whose eyes were now opened to his true interest, and who privately applied for a reconciliation with his brother, that he might safely approach, and that he would join him with all his troops the first convenient opportunity. He therefore began his march for the capital; but, instead of going through Pontefract, where the marquis of Montagu lay encamped with a strong body of troops, he took a compass of about four miles, and came to Nottingham, a county well-affected to his person and family, and was there joined by sir William Stanley with four hundred men, by the lord Hastings, by sir William Parr, sir Thomas Burgh, sir William Norris, sir James Harrington, and other gentlemen. This encouraged him to lay aside the humble guise he had hitherto worn, and to make an open claim of the crown, and his numbers still increased as he approached nearer the centre of the kingdom.

In the mean time Warwick, having assembled a body of forces, proceeded to Leicester, in order to join his brother, the marquis of Montagu; and hearing that Edward had taken the road to Coventry, he directed his march thither, with a view to give him battle: but just as the two armies came in sight of each other, the earl received a letter from the duke of Clarence, giving him to understand that he was on the march to join him, and desiring he would not hazard a battle with Edward until he should arrive with his forces. Warwick, who never suspected any private correspondence between Clarence and Edward, gave into the snare and suffered the latter to pass him in his way to London, thinking that he should by that means have him between two fires, that of his own army and that of Clarence, which was approaching. But while he was indulging himself in this expectation, and that Edward would soon be in his power, he heard of his reconciliation at Banbury with the duke of Clarence, and that this prince had joined him with his whole army.

This defection, which would have discouraged any other man, only animated the earl of Warwick to new efforts. The duke of Clarence, imagining it would be some kind of excuse for the treacherous part he had acted, if he could mediate between his brother and father-in-law, accordingly sent the latter a message, with the offer and assurance in Edward's name of any terms he should chuse to demand; but Warwick, rightly judging that such a mediator, who had so openly betrayed him, was not to be trusted, answered with great indignation, "That he had rather be consistent with himself, than to follow the example of a perfidious duke; and that he was determined not to put up his sword till he had either gained his point, or lost his life."

Presently after the junction of the two brothers, it was debated, whether they should attack the earl of Warwick in his entrenchments, or march directly for London, and Edward assume the royal authority, which would give him infinite advantage over his adversaries. The latter counsel was very prudently embraced, and the king set forward on his march to London, leaving Warwick behind him; though, it must be confessed, that Edward ran great risks of being ruined in case the Londoners had kept their gates shut against him; but that unstable people, ever leaning to the side of prejudice or interest, hearing of the reconciliation of the two brothers, and that Edward was in full march for his capital, gave the earl of Warwick over for lost; and thinking they had nothing more to hope from the Lancastrian party, and every thing to dread from the resentment of an incensed and victorious sovereign, without waiting for a confirmation of Warwick's defeat, which they took for granted, on the ninth of April the lord-mayor and his aldermen demanded and received the custody of the Tower of London for king Edward's use; and on Thursday the eleventh of April, Edward once more triumphantly entered his capital, while Henry, who had not found means to escape, nor perhaps so much as thought of it, was again conducted to his confinement in the Tower, from whence he had been taken only seven months before, to remount the throne.

Edward's first care, after having secured the person of his rival, was to visit his queen, who still remained shut up in the sanctuary, from whence he now took her, and returned the same night to London, whose citizens seemed to vie with each other in expressions of loyalty and affection. He had, however, but short time for respite, for the next day (the twelfth), being Good Friday, he held a great council upon the news that the earl of Warwick, having left Coventry, had advanced by Northampton to St. Alban's. Upon this it was determined that the king should immediately put himself at the head of his army, which was quartered about London, and march against this formidable adversary.

The earl of Warwick, unfortunate in his best-laid schemes, now took a step which completed his ruin: he had not, without good shew of reason, depended upon the Londoners keeping Edward out of their city for at least two or three days: with this view he had marched from Coventry with a fine train of artillery, purposing to shut Edward up between his own army and the walls of London; but when he came to St. Alban's, which was on the thirteenth of April, he learned, to his infinite surprize and mortification, that the variable Londoners had admitted the king into their city, and that he was actually within a few miles of him, with an army much superior to his own. Edward pitched his camp to the north of Barnet, very near the earl's army, which lay upon a moor called Gladesmere Heath, between Barnet and St. Alban's.

Warwick now repented his having left Coventry; Margaret of Anjou was expected every hour to land, with a large reinforcement of troops from France; and, in any other situation, the earl would in all probability have declined a battle: but he was several days march from a place of safety, and too far advanced to make a retreat; the attempt, in the face of a superior enemy, flushed with success, was certain ruin; besides, his intrepid heart being a stranger to fear, he resolved to venture an engagement,

This Plate is most

Early next morning, which was Easter-day, the fourteenth of April, both armies drew out in order of battle†. Edward's van-guard was commanded by the duke of Gloucester; his main battle by himself, having with him the unfortunate king Henry and the duke of Clarence, who that day served as a volunteer; and the rear was led by the lord Hastings. In Warwick's army the right wing was commanded by the marquis of Montagu and John de Vere, earl of Oxford; the left by the earl of Warwick himself, and John Holland, duke of Exeter; and a body of archers, which was posted in the centre, by Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerset.

The battle began by four in the morning, and lasted till noon; and never was field disputed with more bloody obstinacy. The troops of Warwick, though inferior to those of Edward in number, fought with desperate resolution, determined, after the example of their general, to conquer or die on the spot; and such was the impetuosity of their charge, that the earl of Oxford's division broke the main body of Edward's army, but the victorious corps pursuing the fugitives with too sanguine an eagerness, Warwick's main body was by that means left defenceless: Edward upon this brought up a strong corps de reserve, with which he attacked this weak part of Warwick's division; but the earl of Oxford, recollecting his mistake in following the Yorkists to such a distance, wheeled about in order to recover his former station; and that movement occasioned the loss of the battle: for his division, in which the men wore stars for their badges*, returning from the pursuit, and passing by the duke of Exeter's wing, the latter, mistaking their stars for suns, the badge which Edward gave (occasioned, as some say, by a mist that fell during the fight), furiously charged these squadrons as they were returning to their post, and put them to rout before the mistake could be discovered. This gave an opportunity for Edward's routed wing to rally, and now the battle was no longer equal; the late unfortunate accident had begot a suspicion of treachery in Warwick's ranks, and seeing the earl of Oxford's men fly, they imagined they had been charged in rear, and of consequence that they themselves were surrounded, they were instantly seized with terror and consternation; the panic spread from rank to rank, and universal disorder and confusion ensued. Edward, improving this opportunity, made a fresh charge, more dreadful than ever, and Warwick in vain exerted his utmost efforts to rally and encourage his dispirited forces; they reeled, they drooped, they shrunk from the charge, though they did not fly; at length, after having performed every thing that could be expected from the most consummate general and the most undaunted hero in vain, the noble Warwick, disdainful of life when victory was gone, rushed into the middle of Edward's ranks, where he quickly fell, covered with wounds: his brother, the marquis of Montagu, desirous to rescue him, perished in the attempt a few moments after him. Their deaths completed the defeat of their army, in which about three thousand of the earl's men fell, and about two thousand of the king's, on whose side were slain the lord Cromwell, the lord Say, sir Humphrey Bouchier, and the lord Mountjoy's eldest son. It is said, Edward, who in all his other battles was accustomed to order that the common soldiers should be spared, and the officers put to the sword, had ordered now that no quarter should be given. The earl of Oxford and the duke of Somerset fled into Wales, to the earl of Pembroke, who was levying troops for the earl of Warwick; the duke of Exeter was wounded, stripped, and left for dead in the field, where he lay till the evening, when, coming to himself, he made a shift to crawl to the house of one Rutland, where his wounds were cured; but he was afterwards seized, and committed to the Tower.

This battle was no sooner over than Edward posted to London, and entering into St. Paul's at evening service, with his royal captive, he there offered his own and his enemies standards; and, to prevent any doubt of the death of the earl of Warwick and his brother, he caused their naked bodies to be exposed to public view for three days successively, in the cathedral of St. Paul, after which they were carried to Bisham, in Berkshire, to be interred in the priory founded by their ancestors of the house of Montacute.

Edward imagined, that by the death of the earl of Warwick he had established his throne on a solid foundation; but he soon received fresh proofs that the war was far from being ended with this battle: for, on Tuesday in Easter-week, queen Margaret, the brand of the war, and no less terrible to Edward than Warwick, had landed at Weymouth, in Dorsetshire, attended by her son the prince of Wales, the countess of Warwick, the prior of St. John of Jerusalem, the lord Wenlock, many other persons of distinction, and a body of French troops, in several ships. She had scarce time to repose herself after the fatigue of a very tempestuous passage, when she received the fatal tidings of Warwick's defeat and death, and of her husband being again a captive in the hands of his rival. Disasters like these were more than sufficient to strike the boldest with dismay: Margaret's former courage and magnanimity gave way to the shock; she was overwhelmed with grief and despair, and knowing not what other course to take, she retired to the abbey of Beaulieu, in Hampshire, where she registered herself, her son, and her followers as persons claiming sanctuary. But her drooping spirits were soon cheered, and her despair partly banished by the appearance of the duke of Somerset, the earl of Devonshire, the viscount Beaumont, sir Thomas Fulford, sir John Fortescue, sir Thomas Seymour, and many other gentlemen, who, on the first news of her landing, immediately repaired to her with their vassals and dependents, who all offered to stand by her with their lives and fortunes.

Encouraged with this show of affection, and the assurances that numbers were ready to join her as soon as she should take the field, she left her sanctuary, and, putting herself and son at the head of the few troops she had with her, began her march, passing through the counties of Devon and Somerset, where her troops were continually increased by the coming in of the inhabitants, until they amounted to a very considerable army. At length she reached Tewkesbury, in Gloucestershire, on the twenty-ninth of April, having that day performed an incredible march of thirty-six miles, through very bad roads: here Margaret proposed to rest her wearied troops for a few days, and then proceed towards Wales, to join the earl of Pembroke, who had gotten together a considerable body of archers from the counties of Chester and Lancaster, famous for breeding that kind of soldiers, and was on the march to meet her.

In the mean time Edward, who, on the first notice of the queen's landing, had proscribed her and all her adherents by proclamation, immediately set out at the head of his army, in order to attack her before she could join the earl of Pembroke; but as he had with him a great train of artillery, it was impossible for him to march with so much expedition as the Lancastrians; he however made greater dispatch than could be expected, and, after a very painful and fatiguing march, he, on the third of May, encamped within three miles of the enemy.

The queen and her generals hereupon held a council of war, to deliberate what measures were the most proper to be taken. Their first intention was to have passed the Severn about Gloucester; but that city having refused to open its gates, she could not cross the river from her present situation, without exposing her rear to certain ruin; it was therefore determined that the queen's forces should entrench themselves in a park adjoining to the town of Tewkesbury, where they were flanked on both sides with hollow ways, ditches, hedges, and almost impassable grounds, with the town and abbey behind, and a strong entrenchment was to be thrown up in their front; and in this position, which, if fully effected, would have been impregnable, they were to wait the coming up of the earl of Pembroke with his forces.

But the execution of this scheme was prevented by the vigilance, courage, and activity of Edward, who determined to attack them in their entrenchments before they could farther fortify them. With this view, he, the next day, May 4, drew forth his army in two lines, one conducted by his brother, the duke of Gloucester, while himself, with his other brother, Clarence, assisted by the lord Hastings, commanded the second. On the side of the Lancastrians, the duke of Somerset, with his brother, lord John Beaufort, commanded the first line; the lord Wenlock, under the prince of Wales, who was considered as the commander in chief, the second; and Courtney, earl of Devonshire, the third.

The attack was begun by the duke of Gloucester with great fury; but Somerset's men, who guarded the front of the entrenchments, stood their ground with great bravery, and it is more than probable that Edward would have been baffled in his attempt this day, had not one of those accidents so frequent in engagements turned the scale of victory: it seems the duke of Gloucester before the battle, had received instructions from Edward to use all possible means to draw the duke of Somerset's division out of the trenches; Gloucester pursued these instructions with equal punctuality and success. Finding himself so warmly received by the van of the Lancastrian forces, he began a sham retreat, in such seeming hurry and confusion, that the duke of Somerset, naturally of an impetuous disposition, imagining they fled, ordered the second and third lines to support him, and began his march in pursuit of the runaways, through the defiles which led out of the trenches, and a desperate fight ensued; for the Yorkists facing suddenly about, recovered their former ranks, and fell upon the Lancastrians with the utmost fury; at the same time a detachment of two hundred horse, sent off by Edward, attacked Somerset's division in flank, and disordered him so much, that he was obliged to fall back through the defiles to his former station; but in doing this he was so hotly pursued, that most of his line were cut in pieces. The duke of Somerset, amazed at his not being supported by the lord Wenlock, found that nobleman coolly standing at the head of his division, without having advanced a single step to sustain the first line: the fiery duke was so enraged at this treachery as he thought it, that, riding up, he clove the lord Wenlock through the brains with his battle-ax.

By this time the duke of Gloucester had followed the enemy so close that he was actually within their entrenchments, and was soon followed by his royal brother, with the second line. Every thing in the queen's camp was now in confusion; the first division of her army was already defeated with great slaughter, and the second and third lines betook themselves to flight after a very faint resistance. In short, Edward gained the most complete victory perhaps that any history recounts; for, though not above three thousand of the Lancastrians fell in the fight, yet scarce a man of note of the queen's party escaped death or captivity. Among the slain were the earl of Devonshire, the lord John Beaufort, the duke of Somerset's brother, sir John Delves, sir Edward Hamden, sir Robert Whittingham, and sir John Luckner. The duke of Somerset, the great-prior of St. John, and about twenty other gentlemen, took refuge in the abbey church, as a place of sanctuary; but they soon found themselves deceived, for they were taken thence the next day, and executed. Margaret of Anjou herself was discovered, with her son, in another religious house, to which they had fled for shelter, and were brought to Edward, who ordered the queen to close custody in the Tower, where she continued four years, till the king of France thought proper to ransom her for the sum of fifty thousand crowns. But a more pitiable fate awaited the young prince; for, being brought into Edward's presence, and that king asking him "how he durst presume to invade his kingdom, with banners displayed?" the noble youth replied with an unseasonable vivacity, "that he came to recover his father's crown, and his own natural inheritance:" a reply which so stung Edward, that he struck the prince on the face with his gauntlet; this served as a signal to the king's remorseless friends, Hastings and the lord Thomas Grey (afterwards marquis of Dorset), who forthwith dragged the gallant youth out of the apartment, and plunged their daggers in his breast.

The battle of Tewkesbury, fought eighteen days after that of Barnet, was the twelfth since the beginning of the quarrel between the two houses of York and Lancaster; but it was not the last, though followed by no other during this reign: and though the event of this field seemed to have extinguished the hopes of the house of Lancaster, yet there was still still a small army in the field, under the command of the earl of Pembroke; but this dispersed of its own accord, on hearing of Edward's late victory, and the earl, leaving the defence of Pembroke to sir John Scudamore, fled into Brittany, taking with him his nephew Henry, the young earl of Richmond. This young nobleman, so illustrious afterwards as king Henry VII. was eldest son to Edmund, earl of Richmond, who was himself the eldest son of Owen Tudor and queen Catherine, his father having been married to Margaret, sole daughter of John Beaufort, duke of Somerset, grand-son to John of Ghent; so that, after the extinction of Henry's race, he had very high pretensions to be the head of the house of Lancaster. He and his uncle were received with great affection and tenderness by Francis II. duke of Brittany, at whose court we shall now leave them, to trace the remaining events of this year.

Whilst Edward was employed in the West, a commotion happened in the interior part of the kingdom, which threatened him with the loss of his capital, and even of his crown. Thomas Neville, a natural son of the late William, lord Fauconbridge, earl of Kent, had been, by the late earl of Warwick, appointed vice-admiral of the Channel, but lost his employment after the death of that nobleman; upon which he withdrew, with the ships under his command, and for some time he and his crews led a life of piracy, assisted by a party of three hundred men from the garrison of Calais; and, tempted by the opportunity which the king's absence afforded, he ventured to make a descent with his forces at Sandwich, and was admitted into Canterbury by Nicholas Faunte, the mayor. The country flocking in to him, he began his march for London, at the head of seventeen thousand men, and on the fourteenth of May, entered the suburbs of Southwark, from whence he proposed to gain admittance into the city, over London bridge; but the news of the king's victory arriving about the same time, the citizens were so encouraged thereby, that they resolutely opposed his entrance; and though he made a desperate attempt to carry the bridge by storm, he was forced to desist, with some loss, notwithstanding that he sent part of his army cross the river to assault the city in another quarter; at the same time one part of his detachment actually made their way into the city through Aldgate, but were driven out again, by the valour of alderman Robert Basset and the citizens.

The bastard of Fauconbridge (for by that name this adventurer was known) finding himself thus baffled, and that his men, defeated of their hopes of plunder, began to desert him, embarked on board his ships, which lay at Blackwall, in the river Thames, and sailed round to Sandwich, whither king Edward, who, upon the advice of this disturbance, had returned in great haste, with a party of three thousand men, to London, pursued him, and, reducing the town, took the bastard prisoner, whom he caused to be immediately executed: and thus an end was put to the last enterprize of the Lancastrian party for recovering the crown of England.

All the legitimate male issue of that house now became extinct in the person of the hapless Henry VI. who, on the twentieth of June this year, died suddenly in his prison of the Tower. Though he was wholly given up to devotion, and seemed utterly insensible to the cares of ambition, yet he could not but sensibly feel the heavy afflictions that now fell upon him at once, particularly the inhuman butchery of his only son, and the captivity of his queen; his feeble frame sunk beneath the weight of so many calamities, and he died overwhelmed with grief, which probably brought on an apoplexy, for he was found dead in his bed between eleven and twelve at night. It has been industriously handed down by a number of historians, particularly those of the Lancastrian faction, that the duke of Gloucester slew him with his own hand; but that prince's memory has been loaded with this crime without any sufficient authority; and if an act of that kind was really perpetrated, it seems much more reasonable to impute it to the bloody jealousy of Edward, who had now little about him of a man besides his form and his follies, and who, from the late insurrection under the bastard of Fauconbridge, might suppose that he could never be safe on the throne while Henry was alive. But the truth is, no authority can be found to prove that Henry died a violent death; on the contrary, it is on all hands allowed that his corpse was conveyed to St. Paul's church, and from thence to Black-friars, at both which places it lay for some time exposed to public view; a circumstance which ill agrees with a private murder. His remains were afterwards deposited in the abbey of Chertsey, from whence they were removed by Richard III. and interred in a more pompous manner at Windsor.

Edward, now seeing himself in firm possession of the crown of England, which had cost him so much perjury, dissimulation, and bloodshed to acquire, thought proper to create his son Edward prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester, which he did on the twenty-sixth of June this year; and, though he had seen sufficiently, by his own practice and that of others, how weak an influence oaths have upon the actions of mankind, when forced upon them, yet he thought it no unnecessary precaution to assemble, on the third day of July, ten bishops, five dukes, six earls, fourteen barons, sir William Courtney, and ten other of the most considerable among the knights, in the Parliament-chamber at Westminster, where they swore to maintain and support the succession of the crown in his family, and took the oath of eventual allegiance to his son Edward, prince of Wales.

Shortly after, Edward granted a pardon to William of Wanefleet, bishop of Winchester, and seven other prelates, who had adhered to the house of Lancaster. From the beginning of his reign to the end he always carried it fair with the clergy; however, George Neville, archbishop of York, was sent by him into exile, and imprisoned in the castle of Guisnes, near Calais, for several years, during which time Edward enjoyed the revenues of his see, after having seized all his other effects. The dignity of great-chamberlain of England, vacant by the death of Warwick, was conferred on the duke of Gloucester, who afterwards resigned it to his brother Clarence, on being appointed constable. The government of Calais was bestowed upon Anthony Woodville, earl Rivers, the queen's brother; but the garrison refused to admit any person in that quality except the lord Hastings, who was therefore appointed governor, and sir John Howard was nominated his deputy.

The

The remaining part of the year was employed in negotiations with different potentates, of which we shall proceed to give a cursory account. The first was with James III. king of Scotland. During the troubles in England, the truce between the English and Scots had been frequently violated, contrary to the intention of the two kings: after Edward's restoration, James sent ambassadors to propose a congress, and it was agreed that one should be held at Alnwick, in Northumberland, on the twenty-fourth of September, for a mutual reparation of the outrages committed by the two nations upon one another. The two kings were equally desirous to preserve the truce, and even to conclude a final peace; this negotiation, however, was not ended till the year 1473. It appears in the Collection of Public Acts, that Edward empowered his ambassadors to propose a marriage between the king of Scotland and one of his daughters: but more of this in the sequel.

On the thirtieth of September he renewed a treaty of commerce and truce for thirty years with Francis II. duke of Brittany. This confirmation was necessary, as the truce made during the earl of Warwick's administration had been often violated.

Lewis XI. was very sensible Edward had no reason to be pleased with him: but, however, he made him proposals of a truce, as that made with Henry VI. was of no force now Edward was restored. In the present situation of the English affairs, it was by no means proper for Edward to renew the war with France: his kingdom was too much exhausted to think so early of such an undertaking; therefore, without much entreaty, he agreed to continue the truce from the first of September this year, to the first of May following.

Edward, however, did not place so much dependence on these truces as to neglect the necessary means either for defending his realm, or attacking his enemies; and a parliament meeting on Tuesday the sixth of October, at Westminster, he obtained from the commons a supply of fourteen thousand archers; and from the lords spiritual and temporal, a grant of the tenth of their rents and the profit of their estates. The thirtieth of November the house was adjourned to February following.

The years 1472 and 1473 were neither of them distinguished by so many great and important events as the last; they were wholly spent in negotiations tending to settle the tranquility of the king and kingdom, by truces or alliances with foreign princes. Edward was particularly careful to prevent every possible cause of discontent with the duke of Burgundy's subjects; for this purpose he appointed commissioners for settling all commercial differences, and to conclude a final peace with the Hanse towns*. A congress was accordingly held at Utrecht; but it was not till the year 1474 that all difficulties were adjusted. Edward also, by his letters patent, confirmed the ancient alliance between Richard II. and John, king of Portugal, for them and their successors.

But while Edward was thus providing for his security abroad, his peace at home was interrupted by the arrival of John de Vere, earl of Oxford, in England. Of all the noblemen whom his cruelty had made his enemies, none were more determined than Oxford: this earl, who was a zealous favourer of the house of Lancaster, had retired into France after the battle of Tewkesbury; but as he met with a cold reception from Lewis XI. who did not chuse to quarrel with Edward, he resolved to return to his native country, and maintain his ground to the last drop of his blood. With this view he shut himself up, with only seventy followers, within St. Michael's Mount, in Cornwall. Edward, ever fearful that the least spark of resistance left unextinguished, might rekindle the flame which had threatened the destruction of his house, lost not an instant in providing against it: he ordered Fortescue, one of his favourites, to march immediately with some troops into the West, and besiege the earl in his strong hold. Though Vere had no chance of either escaping or of holding the place out for any time, he boldly stood a siege; but being at length obliged to surrender, through a scarcity of provisions, he was sent prisoner, with two of his brothers, the lord Beaumont, and sir Thomas Clifford, to London, where the regard which all ranks of people had for the earl, prevented Edward's accustomed cruelty from taking place. The earl and his two brothers had their lives spared; but the former had his estate confiscated, without any provision being left for himself or countess, even the common necessities of life; and the earl himself was sent prisoner to the castle of Guisnes, where he remained as long as Edward lived.

But John Holland, duke of Exeter, who had been in confinement ever since the battle of Barnet, had entreated his wife, who was Edward's sister, to employ her good offices for his release; but that princess preferring her affection for her brother to that for her husband, abandoned the latter in his distress, and received from Edward a separate allowance. Upon this the duke found means to get out of his prison, and no one knew what was become of him, till he was found dead, some months after, on the sea-shore in the county of Kent.

This nobleman was the last branch of the house of Lancaster that could give Edward any disturbance, except the earl of Richmond, who resided at the court of Brittany, with his uncle Jasper, earl of Pembroke; and although these were in no condition to interrupt the quiet of his reign, he eagerly desired to have the young earl in his power: he accordingly sent over an embassy to the duke of Brittany, pressing him to deliver up these noblemen; but that duke pleading the protection he had granted, and the ties of blood, excused himself from complying with this request; though, at the same time, he gave Edward the most solemn assurances, that he would keep them in such a manner that they should never disturb his government.

The parliament, which had, by different prorogations, sat almost two years, passed an act, on the

* These are certain towns in Germany, confederate for the benefit of trade. They are so called from the word Hanse, signifying Alliance. Bremen, in Lower Saxony, is said to have been founder of this confederacy, about the year 1164. How many towns were associated at first is not known: but the design so visibly prospered, that most of the chief trading places in Europe, to the number of seventy-two, entered into the confederacy. In the flourishing times of their alliance, these Hanse towns had four general staples viz. London, Bruges in Flanders, Bergen in Normandy, and Novogrod in Russia. At present the Hanse Towns are in a manner reduced to these six, Lubeck, Hamburgh, Bremen, Rostock, Dantzick, and Cologne.

sixth of October, 1473, for the resumption of all grants of lands and offices, in order to improve the royal revenues. The king of Portugal this year demanded the restitution of some vessels, which had been taken by the English from his subjects; but as it appeared, in the course of the inquiry, that they had been pillaged by the bastard of Fauconbridge, during his rebellion, the king of Portugal desisted from his demand. In this parliament the earl of Northumberland was restored to the honours and estates of his family; and Edward, willing to testify his gratitude to Lewis de Burges, lord of Gruytheuse, by whom he had been so hospitably entertained in Holland, created him a peer of England, by the title of earl of Winchester; and afterwards, by letters patent, allowed him to bear the arms of England in his escutcheon. We now come to the year 1474, which will afford us a greater plenty of matter.

Notwithstanding the cold reception which the duke of Burgundy had given Edward during his exile, the political interests of the two nations were so closely connected, that the English monarch was still obliged to maintain a friendly correspondence with that duke, and this correspondence now became more frequent than ever; for the duke of Burgundy having continual reasons to be disgusted with Lewis XI. whose restless and turbulent disposition would not suffer any of his neighbours to be at peace, saw no other way to free himself from the persecutions of his enemy, than to engage the king of England to make a powerful diversion in France; and, in order to effect this purpose, he sent ambassadors to England in the beginning of the year 1474, furnished with very ample powers for concluding a treaty for undertaking the conquest of France jointly with the king of England. The duke of Brittany was in the secret of this negotiation, and it was so privately carried on that Lewis, notwithstanding the good intelligence he generally had, got his first information of it from the court of Scotland, the king of which at that time was in treaty of marriage with Edward, for his son James with the princess Cicely, Edward's youngest daughter. Lewis thereupon sent one of his ministers to Scotland, to thank James for his intelligence, and to endeavour to keep him firm to the ancient treaties between the two crowns.

It was the twenty-first of July this year, before matters could be adjusted, for the great undertaking of the conquest of France, between Edward and the duke of Burgundy. On that day is dated the duke's convention for assistance to Edward: in the preamble of this act, the government of France is loaded with the most horrible imputations; Lewis is termed its usurper, and Edward its lawful king. This convention, which is mutual, stipulates,

"I. That before, or about, the first day of July 1475, Edward should be in readiness, with an army of upwards of ten thousand men, to land in France, for the recovery of the duchies of Normandy and Guienne in particular, and the kingdom of France in general.

"II. The duke of Burgundy engages to assist him in person with all his force, towards the said recovery, against Lewis and all others.

"III. The third article propounds that Edward shall listen to no propositions, nor so much as admit any messages, or letters, without consent of the duke, from Lewis or any possessing the crown of France. This article is mutual.

"IV. Both powers, as soon as they should declare war, were, throughout their dominions, to proclaim Lewis as their common enemy, and to distress him in all convenient places, so as to be within reach of one another's assistance.

"V. By the fifth article, both parties, and their lieutenants, are obliged to march to one another's assistance in all places of necessity or danger.

"VI. The sixth article provides, that neither prince shall give over the war while the other is willing to continue it; and that if either is absent from the army, his lieutenant shall be bound to obey the prince that is present; and that both shall agree in their winter-quarters, and in finishing their campaign: nay even after both parties were retired to winter-quarters, if either prince thought fit again to take the field, with all, or part of his army, the other prince, or his lieutenant, was obliged to do in like manner."

Next follows what the records call "a letter of agreement between the two contracting parties," but it is only in general terms, and Edward by it promises to relieve France from the hardships she suffered under the government of Lewis, and to restore banished justice; he likewise renews his former engagements with the duke of Burgundy. Then follow what they call "explanation of the articles concerning the mutual quotas of troops."

"It is agreed, that when either party make the requisition of six thousand men (which either party might do of the other), the party so required was obliged to pay three thousand six hundred of them out of his own pocket, in case the other party was engaged in a war for his own defence; while the remainder was to be paid by the party requiring: but if the war was undertaken from other motives than self-defence, then the requiring party was to be at the expence of all the six thousand. This treaty was held to be perpetual."

The next article stipulates, "That the duke of Burgundy should, in consideration of the assistance he was to give Edward, have the duchy of Barr, the earldoms of Champaign, Nevers, Retel, Eu, and Guise; the barony of Ducie, and the lordship of Tournay, the city and lordship of Linghen, the town and castle of Pequigney, all the towns with their lordships on each side of the Somme, and all the estates of the earl of St. Paul, not holding of the duchies of Normandy and Guienne; all which he was to hold without any resort, independent of Edward, or any of his successors; as he was to do all the rest of his dominions, which he then held of the crown of France."

We have next a more particular convention between Edward and the duke, by which the latter obliges himself "to furnish to the former any number of men not under ten thousand, nor above twenty, whenever he should be required; the wages and particular provisions for these men are likewise stipulated." Edward next promises to pay those troops regularly; and in case he was a year in arrear, that the duke should not be obliged to furnish him the next year. He then stipulates, "That, notwithstanding any convention between him and the duke, he should be crowned at Rheims*."

* Rymer, vol. xi. p. 806, 807, 808, 809, &c.

These treaties being ratified and approved by the parliament, now in the fifth session, which granted the necessary supplies, the king began to issue commissions for levying troops, and in the mean time sent ambassadors to the different courts of Europe, to form new alliances, or at least to prevent the union of the several powers with his enemy; and he secured the commerce of his subjects, and his realm from invasion during his absence, by renewing the truce with Scotland, which having, ten years before, been agreed on till October 31, 1479, was now renewed for four years longer. This was farther cemented by a contract for a marriage between the princess Cecily, Edward's youngest daughter, not yet five years old, and James, eldest son and heir of James III. king of Scotland, not yet three years of age; and in case either of the parties died, his or her place was to be supplied by another of the same sex respectively. A jointure was settled; the sum of twenty thousand marks fixed for the young princess's portion, to be paid by stipulated sums at different times; but to be refunded if the marriage was not completed when the parties came to be of a fit age, or, through any accident, did not take effect: the two kings engaged mutually to assist each other in suppressing all rebellions, and to give neither countenance, aid, or protection to any rebels whatever.

On the first of February, 1475, Edward directed his letters to almost all the sheriffs and magistrates in England, for a rendezvous of his troops by the twenty sixth of May, at Portsmouth, in the county of Southampton. The army accordingly assembled to the number of thirty thousand; and, what is very extraordinary, those all of them Englishmen, a circumstance which was peculiar to this Edward, his great predecessors Edward III. and Henry V. having under them, in all their expeditions, great numbers of French and foreigners.

On the twelfth of June, the lords Audley and Duras had a commission to command three thousand auxiliaries, in the duke of Brittany's service: and on the twentieth of that month, the army being embarked, Edward, after leaving his son, the prince of Wales, not yet five years old, guardian of England, sailed over to Calais; and his troops, mindful of the great conquests which their ancestors had made in the French dominions, flattered themselves with the prospect of the same good fortune.

But all their sanguine hopes were blasted, when they saw themselves joined by the duke of Burgundy with no more than his ordinary equipages, and not a soldier attending him. That prince, transported by the violence of his temper, had carried his armies to a great distance, and employed them in wars on the frontiers of Germany and against the duke of Lorraine: when Edward justly reproved him with his remissness in executing his part of the convention between them, he excused himself by pretending that his army would soon be re-assembled, and by putting into the king's hand a letter from the count St. de Pol, constable of France, promising to deliver up St. Quintin immediately to the English. Edward appeared somewhat satisfied upon reading this letter; and, in full confidence of its contents, he advanced towards Peronne, and sent off a detachment to take possession of St. Quintin. Being arrived at Peronne, he was acquainted that his detachment had not only been refused admittance into

St. Quintin, but lost some men by a sally from the garrison. The duke of Burgundy in vain laboured to re-inspire the English with confidence, after this instance of dissimulation; and beginning to be apprehensive about the safety of his own person, the next morning, under pretext of setting out for his army, he took his leave of Edward, without giving any orders for the subsistence or accommodation of his allies.

Edward perceiving that there was no dependence to be placed on so thoughtless and treacherous an ally, resolved to depend upon his own strength for making conquests. He had brought with him as fine an army as had ever entered France from this country, was attended by all the considerable noblemen of his kingdom, and his forces were provided with all necessaries, and qualified in every respect to force its way from one end of France to the other.

Lewis saw this, and trembled; more influenced by political considerations than the vain punctilios of honour, he thought no submissions too mean, which could deliver him from enemies who had proved so formidable to his predecessors, and who again threatened to involve the kingdom in the like calamities which it had suffered by their victorious arms. Edward, upon his landing at Calais, had sent an herald with a letter to Lewis, demanding the crown of France, and giving him defiance in case of refusal. Lewis received the letter with great moderation, and was so far from treating this bravado with that contempt and indignation which a prince of less prudence would have discovered, that he replied in a very mild and gentle manner, and even made the herald a handsome present: this so won upon the latter, that he gave Lewis a hint, that the lords Howard and Stanley, who had Edward's ear, would not be inaccessible to any application from Lewis. The French king took the hint, and it afterwards did him great service.

For hearing that Edward was now preparing to enter Artois, he took an occasion to send an herald to the English camp, and gave him directions to apply to the lords Stanley and Howard, who, he was informed, were inclined to a peace, and whose good offices he earnestly solicited towards effecting an accommodation. The two lords interested themselves warmly in this project; and Edward himself being equally dissatisfied with the duke of Burgundy, for failing in his engagements, and with the constable of St. Pol for his treachery, was the more disposed to hearken to Lewis's proposals: in fine, the matter being debated in the cabinet-council, it was resolved to agree to a treaty for free commerce with France, and a truce for seven years, on the following terms.

"That Lewis should pay seventy-five thousand crowns to indemnify Edward for the expence of the expedition, on receipt of which the king of England should immediately retire with his forces. That Lewis should likewise grant him an annuity of fifty thousand crowns for their joint lives, by two equal half-yearly payments, the first to commence at Easter next following. That the dauphin of France should espouse Elizabeth, daughter of Edward, and settle sixty thousand livres a year upon her, as a jointure. And that neither party should encourage civil wars in the other's kingdom; but that both parties should assist each other in suppressing the insurrection of their subjects."

We

We know of no manner of objection made on the part of the French king against these preliminary demands, which being accepted, an interview was agreed upon between the two kings at Pecquigny, after a seven years truce was proposed and agreed upon. The lord Howard and John Cheney, esq. were pledges from Edward for his performance.

The duke of Burgundy no sooner heard what had passed between Edward and the king of France, than he posted to the English camp, and severely upbraided Edward with his breach of the alliance subsisting between them: but the latter set his own conduct before him in so strong a light, that the duke had little left to say: in a word, neither his opposition, nor that of the duke of Gloucester, Edward's brother, who, enraged to see the fine prospects he had formed by the conquest of France, now about to vanish, could divert Edward from his resolution of giving Lewis the meeting. This interview was held between the two kings on the twenty-ninth of August, near Pecquigny, on a bridge built quite across the Somme: in the middle of the bridge was a box, which was divided into two by a lattice, the openings of which were but just large enough for thrusting a man's head through them; and on each side the lattice was a room for twelve persons. A short compliment passed between the two monarchs, and the articles that had been agreed upon being produced, both kings swore to observe them: after this, the attendants being ordered to withdraw, they had a private conference, the result of which was, that if the duke of Burgundy and the constable de St. Pol should refuse to take the benefit of the treaty, the king of France was left at full liberty to treat them in what manner he pleased; but as to the duke of Brittany, Edward gratefully declined abandoning him; and Lewis finding this, insisted no longer upon it: but by another circumstance of this agreement, Lewis gained an advantage which contributed greatly to the aggrandizing of the French monarchy; for on this occasion he persuaded Edward to release Margaret of Anjou, for the ransom of fifty thousand crowns: to this Edward consented, though not till Lewis had engaged to get a full discharge from Margaret of all her claims upon the crown of England for her dower. This unfortunate princess was released the November following, and Lewis punctually paid the money. Full of gratitude to her deliverer, Margaret, the following year, signed a conveyance of all her right of succession to Provence and Anjou to Lewis and his heirs, and confirmed it afterwards by her will at her death, which happened in 1482. Thus Lewis became the sole heir of all those dominions, which by this means became united to the crown of France.

This interview being ended, the two kings parted extremely well satisfied with each other. Lewis, however, appears to have been struck with terror at the sight of the English army: he was of that genius, that he bought peace if he could at any rate; but if forced upon a war, no prince acted with greater resolution, and few had better fortune. Commynes, who was an eye and ear-witness of all these transactions, tells us that Lewis dreaded nothing so much as Edward's taking a liking to France; and wished above all things, that he would return to his own kingdom†. And he was so much afraid of the other's breaking his engagements, that he bestowed considerable pensions upon the principal members of Edward's council*, that they might exert their endeavours in persuading their master to adhere to the treaty.

If we candidly examine all the circumstances of this treaty, we cannot give our assent to the representations of those historians, who, without foundation, have magnified the wisdom of Lewis on this occasion, and pretend that the English were his dupes. It is plain, that the French king did not dispute any one article prescribed him by Edward; and though it was afterwards disputed between the French and English, whether the annual payment of fifty thousand crowns was to be styled a pension or a tribute, the former being willing to consider it in the first light, and the other in the latter, yet I think we may with the strongest reason give the name of tribute to this annuity: this seems to be implied by the word "Census," put in the title of acquittances and other instruments relating to the payment, though all words expressing either, seem to be industriously avoided in all such instruments: again, as the court of France never granted a pension to any foreign prince, without receiving for it an oath of fealty and an act of homage (neither whereof were required in this case); and as Edward in the treaty styles Lewis only his cousin of France, this annuity seems to be a sort of tributary compensation for Edward's delaying his claim upon the crown of France, occasioned by this truce: and the following circumstance, given us by Commynes, strongly proves that the French court dreaded nothing so much as an altercation on this point.

"One of the English (says that historian) told me, that had the duke of Burgundy joined them with his army, perhaps the peace had not been concluded. The viscount of Narbonne over-hearing him, replied, "Could you be so weak as to believe the duke of Burgundy wanted a great number of good soldiers? he had only put them into quarters of refreshment; and you were in such haste to be at home again, that six hundred pipes of wine, and a pension from our king sent you back into England." The Englishman was in a passion, and answered with much warmth, "Do you call the money your king gave us, a pension? It is a tribute: and, by St. George! you may prate so much as will bring us back again to prove it." I interrupted them (adds Commynes) and turned it into a jest; but the Englishman would not understand it so. When I informed the king of it afterwards, he was highly offended with the viscount

† The interview being ended, Lewis repaired to Amiens, attended by the lord Howard, who was left as an hostage for Edward's performance of the articles of the treaty; and while the king was washing his hands, after supper, this nobleman whispered in his ear that Edward might easily be persuaded to take a journey to Paris: Lewis made no answer to this hint until it was repeated, and then he said, that the war which he was carrying on with the duke of Burgundy would not allow him to go to Paris, and therefore he was very sorry he could not have the honour of receiving the visit of the English monarch. "Edward (said he privately to Commynes) is a very handsome and amorous prince; some ladies at Paris may be as fond of him as he shall be of them, and may invite him to return in another manner." Commynes, liv. iv. chap. 10.

* The lords Hastings and Howard, the bishop of Lincoln, the master of the rolls, the marquis of Dorset, sir Anthony St. Leger, with six or eight more of Edward's chief counsellors, all received yearly stipends from the French court; and all but the lord Hastings gave acquittances for the same. Commynes, lib. vi. chap. 2.

of Narbonne." Commynes could speak of these things with certainty, since he was in Lewis's service and confidence. At length, however, Lewis was rid of all his fears by the departure of the English, who returned to their own country extremely well pleased with the relish of the French wine, and the goodness of the French money.

The duke of Burgundy, at parting with Edward at his last interview, had sworn that he disdained the mediation of England so much, that he would not be comprehended in the truce, nor enter into any negociation with Lewis until three months after the English army had arrived in their own country; but he soon found reason to retract his declaration, and within a very few days, viz. on the thirteenth of September, he made a truce for nine years with Lewis. As to the constable St. Pol, who had deceived the three princes, and been the principal author of their division, he saw himself forsaken in the end by all, and forced to retire into the duke of Burgundy's dominions, upon the faith of a safe conduct; but, notwithstanding that security, he was delivered up by the duke to Lewis, who commanded his head to be struck off; a just retaliation upon a person who had so scandalously juggled with both parties.

Edward being now at peace with all his neighbours, and having no insurrection to dread at home, applied himself to the administration of justice, and filling his coffers. The disbanding of the army, lately returned from France, had filled all the roads with robbers, and nobody could travel without danger of losing their lives or effects: to remedy this grievance, the king, early in the spring of 1476, made a circuit with his judges through the kingdom, and exerted himself on this occasion with such vigour and impartiality, that he restored the public peace, that had been so greatly injured. The nation had shewn itself so discontented with the miscarriage of the late expedition, from which it had entertained such sanguine expectations, that Edward was deterred from asking any farther supplies from parliament, and therefore had recourse to other methods of accumulating treasure: he engaged in commerce, which he carried on to a great extent as a private merchant; he sold the profits of vacant prelacies; he demanded fines for the restitution of temporalities; he ransacked old records to find defective titles, and obliged the proprietors to pay large sums for their confirmation; and he imposed exorbitant taxes upon the clergy. By these methods he amassed large sums, the vice of avarice growing stronger as his wealth increased and his age advanced: the time not employed in these cares, he chiefly passed in female conversation and amusements; and his court, from the example of its head, became a scene of lust and lewdness.

In this cessation of every manly employment, the reader is to expect very little business: the ancient treaties, however, with the king of Denmark were now renewed; as also those with the Hanse Towns, in Germany, and with the court of Castile. The open demonstration of friendship which Edward had given towards the duke of Brittany, made him imagine that duke would readily embrace an opportunity of shewing his acknowledgement; he therefore sent ambassadors to him, under colour of renewing their truce; but the true end of their commission was to propose the delivering up of the earl of Richmond, pretending that Edward, desirous of reconciling the jarring factions of York and Lancaster, proposed to marry young Henry to one of his own daughters. The duke of Brittany, a good prince, judging of others by himself, agreed to deliver up Richmond and his uncle, the earl of Pembroke: and the ambassadors having got them into their hands, carried them with all speed to St. Malo's, there to embark; but the duke's ministers representing to him how infamous it would make him appear in the eye of the world, should the two princes fall victims of Edward's jealousy, which was most probable, he, upon recollection, confessed the justness of the remonstrance, and forthwith dispatched his favourite, Landois, post to prevent their embarkation. Landois arrived just time enough; the earl and his uncle were on the point of embarking, but Landois found means to draw them aside, and gave them intimation of his errand; thereupon they instantly took refuge in a church, from whence Landois told the English ambassadors they could not be taken, and those latter were forced to depart without their prey; and when they came to England, their failure brought them into disgrace, and embittered all Edward's enjoyments. Thus, by a sort of miracle, Henry, earl of Richmond, escaped the danger to which he was exposed, Providence having preserved him on this occasion, in order to place him one day on the throne of England. The rest of the year 1476 affords nothing remarkable concerning the affairs of England, except the death of the duke of Burgundy. This prince possessed the ambition as well as the courage and intrepidity of a conqueror; but being destitute of policy and prudence, qualities no less necessary, he was unsuccessful in all his enterprizes, and perished at last in a battle against the Swiss, in the forty-sixth year of his age, leaving behind him an only daughter, Mary, who, as she was heiress of his extensive dominions, was earnestly courted by all the potentates of Europe.

The death of the duke of Burgundy afforded Lewis an opportunity of procuring this match for the dauphin, and by that means of adding to the crown of France all the provinces of the Low Countries, together with Burgundy, Artois, and Picardy; but Lewis had conceived such a violent and implacable hatred against the house of Burgundy, that he determined to reduce the young duchess by force of arms; and entering her dominions with his troops, in the spring of 1477, he made himself master of the duchy of Burgundy, and of that part of Picardy which had been yielded to Philip the Good by the treaty of Arras: but the states of the Netherlands were so incensed at his base and ungenerous proceedings, that they bestowed their sovereign on Maximilian of Austria, son of the emperor Frederic, from whom they hoped for relief in their present distress. Thus was France deprived of the opportunity, which she could never after regain, of enlarging her dominions by the addition of those fertile and beautiful provinces; and the marriage of the duchess with Maximilian not only changed the face of affairs, but introduced a new system of politics into Europe: nay it may be said to be the first and principal source of most of the wars wherewith we have been troubled ever since. But it is now time to take a view of affairs in England.

It appears, that the administration was wholly engrossed by the queen and her relations, who were now become extremely unpopular, not only by their continually grasping at all power, but also by the haughtiness of their demeanor, and the pride they seemed to take in opposing, on all occasions, the king's brothers. Richard duke of Gloucester, who was naturally close, reserved, and deliberate, managed so with them as not to come to an open breach; but George, duke of Clarence, a weak prince, of great pride, ambition, and impetuosity, could not suppress his indignation, which was continually breaking out into threats and invectives.

This behaviour, doubtless, increased the aversion of the queen and her family to Clarence; and an event which happened about this time, contributed to heighten the animosity between them, and seems to have laid the first foundation for the duke's untimely fate: George having lost his wife Isabel, daughter of the late earl of Warwick, a short time before the death of Charles, duke of Burgundy, applied to his sister Margaret, duchess dowager of Burgundy, who loved him above all her brothers, for employing her good offices to bring about a match between him and her step-daughter, Mary, the heiress of Burgundy. It was the most desirable alliance for England that could be formed; and Margaret used her utmost endeavours to effect it: but Edward, king of England, having gotten intelligence of this negotiation, by means of Lewis XI. (who strove all in his power to keep the English court in good humour), and being jealous of his brother's elevation to so great a sovereignty, or biased by the queen, who wanted to secure this match for her own brother, Anthony Woodville, earl Rivers, threw such obstacles in the way, as allowed time and means for the emperor Frederic to succeed in behalf of his son Maximilian.

It is natural to suppose that such treatment would not fail to exasperate the mind of Clarence, who shewed his resentment by coming less frequent to court, by saying little or nothing in the privy-council, and carefully avoiding seeing his brother Edward in private. This behaviour occasioned a coldness and reserve in the king towards Clarence, who now complained of the measures of the court with greater vehemence than ever. This inconsiderate conduct served only to facilitate the designs of his enemies, every motion of his being watched, every peevish expression aggravated, and every action misrepresented, or wrested to render him suspected. In this his brother Richard, duke of Gloucester, is said to have had a principal hand, who having already formed a design to seize the crown at the death of their elder brother, whose spirits and health were daily wasted by his excessive indulgence in pleasure, thought the only means to secure success to his enterprize, would be to remove Clarence out of the way, who stood between him and the succession, and therefore determined to accomplish his ruin. With this view he artfully inflamed the hatred of that duke against the king, until he wrung from him such expressions as, being afterwards related to Edward, made that barbarous brother, who held no blood dear, if his jealousy was alarmed, gave orders for seizing Clarence, on suspicion of treason against his crown and life; and he was committed close prisoner to the Tower.

A parliament was ordered to meet on Friday the sixteenth of January, 1478, at Westminster; and Henry, duke of Buckingham, was appointed high-steward of England, to preside at the trial of Clarence, whose accusation was laid in the following articles.

I. For having reflected on the king for putting to death one Burdett, a retainer or vassal of the duke's; and that he, the said duke, had industriously propagated this accusation against his sovereign.

II. That he had accused the king of practising necromantic arts to take off such of his subjects whom he could not reach by law.

III. That he had openly said king Edward was a bastard, and not begotten by Richard, duke of York.

IV. That the said duke had compelled his vassals to take an oath of fealty to him and his heirs.

V. That he had slanderously alleged the king did him wrong, and that he had used witchcraft to deprive him, the said duke, of his life.

VI. Lastly, that he had attempted to avail himself of the act of parliament, by which he and heirs were declared successors to the crown of England, failing the male issue of Henry VI.

The duke denied every part of the charge, and it is certain it would have been very difficult for his enemies to have proved all these articles of impeachment: they seem to have been too sensible of this; and all our historians agree, that he was secretly put to death in the Tower, a few days before his trial was to have come on; and that the duke of Gloucester assisted in this inhuman office, by helping to thrust his head into a butt of malmsey, by which he was suffocated.

The death of the duke of Clarence raised such an outcry among the people, that the court began to grow apprehensive for the consequences; and, to quiet their discontents, gave out that he died of an immoderate debauch of drinking, to which he had taken out of grief for his confinement; but this artifice was not capable of amusing the public, who could not without horror reflect upon a prince of the blood thus dying a prisoner in private, and in the power of his declared enemies. The duke left behind him one son, named Edward, who inherited from his grand-father, by the mother's side, the title of earl of Warwick; and a daughter called Margaret, who was afterwards countess of Salisbury; both of them following their father by a violent death, from the cruel unrelenting suspicion of their kindred kings.

It has been pretended by an old writer (Hall), that Edward was afterwards greatly grieved for the death of his brother, insomuch that when any one sued to him for the pardon of a condemned malefactor, he would break out into this exclamation, "Oh, unfortunate brother Clarence! for whose life not one creature would make intercession!" And yet we find this penitent prince chusing the very time of his brother's untimely fate, to redouble the revels of his court by investing his eldest son, Edward (afterwards Edward V.) with the principality of Wales, the earldom of Chester, and his other estates; and creating his second son, Richard, duke of York; and, though not above two years and a half old, marrying him to Anne, only daughter of John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, and heiress to that title and estate, then about six years old, and her fortune, in case of death, was settled upon the young duke. The rejoicings of Edward and his court on this occasion seemed not so much on account of the two princes' promotions, as their satisfaction to see the project of the duke of Clarence's ruin effected; and their indecent conduct served only heighten the murmurs of the people.

During these transactions in England, Maximilian, who had married the young duchess of Burgundy, resolved to wrest from Lewis the French king the places he had taken in his bride's country; and he met with such success in his endeavours, on account of the affection of the inhabitants for the house of Burgundy, that, in all probability, he would have recovered the whole duchy, had he been supported by his father, the most covetous, or Edward, the most voluptuous prince of his age: but both of them failed him; the one being loth to part with his money, and the other wholly under the influence of his queen, who resented the refusal her brother Anthony, earl of Rivers, had met with in his pretensions to the young duchess of Burgundy: add to this, that Edward suffered himself to be amused from time to time by Lewis, with flattering promises, that the other never intended to perform; nor had any thing been adjusted all this time relating to the treaty of Amiens. But this year Lewis sent over ambassadors, to offer that both the truce and the payment of the annuity should be continued for one hundred years after the death of each of the kings. To this Edward agreed; but, at the same time he put the French ambassadors in mind, that his daughter Elizabeth was now twelve years of age, therefore capable of matrimony: and that, though the dauphin was yet too young for consummation, yet that was no reason why she should not be betrothed to him, and immediately enter on possession of the sixty thousand livres a year, agreed upon as her appointment, as soon as she came to a matrimonial age. All this was digested into instructions to Edward's residents at the French court, who had orders to make the demand, and betroth the princess to the dauphin.

But Lewis, who had another match in view for his son, put them off, from time to time, with a dilatory answer; and finding that money was the means to prolong Edward's lethargy, he paid off the remainder of the ransom of Margaret of Anjou, and sent over the bishop of Elna, in February of the following year, 1479, to offer security for the payment of fifty thousand crowns annuity for the long term to which it and the truce were now extended. The security which the prelate offered, was the oath of Lewis, together with the bonds of the bank of Medicis, and letters patent confirmed by the estates of France, and the papal authority denouncing excommunication in case of failure. This security effectually quieted Edward's scruples: indeed, the English monarch was grown too indolent to undertake any enterprize that required personal activity, and all that we know of Edward's proceedings this year (1479), was that he entered into a treaty with the duke and duchess of Burgundy, by a marriage between his daughter Anne and their son, a child scarcely a year old; as also another treaty between the prince of Castile and his daughter Catherine, to the same purpose; that he confirmed his alliance with the court of Denmark; and made his infant son Richard, duke of York, lord-lieutenant of Ireland*.

Thus stood matters in England till May, 1480, when Edward, beginning to be uneasy at the shuffling of Lewis, sent over John, lord Howard, to treat with that king, about the speedy celebration of the marriage between the dauphin and Elizabeth, and to adjust the time and place for that princess's coming over to France and taking possession of her dowry; but Lewis was so far from giving any satisfaction on these heads, that, having gained the principal point he had at heart, namely, the preventing Edward from acting offensively on the continent, he no longer thought it necessary to keep measures with the English court, and entered into a treaty with Maximilian of Austria, and Mary, heiress of Burgundy, for marrying the dauphin to their daughter Margaret, an infant of two years of age.

Not contented with this notorious breach of faith, or, perhaps, fearful, that Edward's eyes being opened to his perfidy and dissimulation, he might be tempted, indolent as he was, to take revenge for such indignity, the French monarch, whose prudence was equal to his falshood, endeavoured to avert the impending danger; and, by a proper distribution of presents in the court of Scotland, he prevailed on James III. to break off the marriage which had been stipulated between his eldest son and Cecily, Edward's second daughter, though the Scottish prince had actually received a great part of her portion, and to commence hostilities against England, notwithstanding a truce subsisted at that time between the two nations for forty years to come.

James III. king of Scotland retained all his family affection for the house of Valois: though he had hitherto continued in good correspondence with the court of England, yet it was only by the permission and direction of the king of France. He was governed by a set of low, worthless, and corrupt ministers, at whose instigation he had thrown his brother Alexander, duke of Albany, into prison; but this prince having made his escape, took refuge at the court of England, where James, earl of Douglas, had long found protection: and the Scottish monarch and his favourites making this an handle, it was resolved in his worthless cabinet that England should be invaded. Accordingly, having gotten together an army, they entered the borders; but the Scottish authors and records give us a very blind account of the proceedings of this army: thus much is certain, they did nothing of any moment, probably owing to the disappointments James met with in the supplies he expected from France, and that the duke of Albany and the earl of Douglas had a powerful party attached to their interests among the great men in Scotland; and to distract that kingdom the more, endeavours were used to draw the earl of Ross, lord of the Isles, into their measures.

Edward, who now began to rouse from his lethargy, was equally astonished and incensed at Lewis for the unpardonable affront that monarch had put upon his family in the person of his daughter Elizabeth, who had for some time been distinguished by the appellation of dauphiness, in which she was now supplanted by an infant. Listening to the suggestions of his revenge only, without considering that Lewis, on this occasion, had done nothing more than retort his own behaviour in the case of the lady Bona, and that his own finances were in a bad state for supporting a war, he resolved to carry fire and sword into the heart of France. But as it was necessary to end his quarrel with Scotland before he embarked in a foreign expedition, he, in the beginning of the year 1481, declared his resolution of marching in person against the Scots, and gave orders for the necessary preparations towards a great expedition.

In the mean time, in order to secure his interest in the continent of France, he renewed his alliance with the duke of Brittany; and, on the twenty-second of June this year, we find him concluding a peace with that prince, which was cemented by a marriage between Edward's son the prince of Wales and the duke's eldest daughter Anne, presumptive heiress of the duchy. Neither of the parties were yet of an age fit for marriage; it was therefore provided by the articles, that if either of them died before consummation, their places should be supplied by brother or sister so long as Edward and Francis should have any children remaining alive of the respective sexes. The dower of Anne was settled at twenty thousand crowns a year, and her fortune at two hundred thousand crowns, if Francis should leave a son to succeed him in the duchy, who in that case was to marry one of Edward's daughters; but if the princess of Brittany inherited her father's territories, a moiety of this fortune was to be remitted: it was farther provided, that in case two sons were born of this intended marriage, the younger should bear the arms of Brittany, be brought up in that country, and succeed his mother in the duchy: the other articles of the treaty provide that each power should furnish to the other, if attacked by France, three thousand archers, to be maintained three months at the expence of the furnishing party*.

On the twentieth of January, 1482, Edward called a parliament at Westminster, in order to obtain a supply for carrying on the war with Scotland; and, on the fifteenth of February, the commons, by the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, granted him such an aid as they thought proportioned to his necessities, by the help of which he was enabled to raise a powerful army, in the mean time: but for some reasons, instead of heading it in person, he gave the command to his brother Richard, duke of Gloucester, with whom he joined Alexander, duke of Albany, younger brother to James III. whom he had engaged to assume the title of king of Scotland, and concluded with him a most infamous contract to depose his brother and usurp his throne. A private treaty was also made between them, in which Alexander promised to do homage to Edward for his crown: he then engaged to break the ancient alliance between France and Scotland, and associate with Edward against Lewis; to surrender Berwick to England; to espouse Edward's daughter Cecily, already affianced to the prince of Scotland, provided he could get rid of his present wife, according to the laws of the church; or, should that be found impracticable, to match his son with some princess of the royal family of England†.

This treaty being ratified, the duke of Gloucester, accompanied by the duke of Albany, began his

march for Scotland, about the latter end of May, and arrived at Alnwick in the beginning of July. The number of men in this army, with their chief commanders, are thus handed down to us by three of our old English historians‡: the first column was led by Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, under whom served the lord Scroop of Bolton, sir John Dukfield, and other persons of distinction, with six thousand seven hundred common men: the second column was commanded by the dukes of Gloucester and Albany, having under them the lords Lovel, and Greystock, sir Edward Woodville, and others, with five thousand eight hundred men: the lord Neville brought up the rear with three thousand. These three columns, which were all foot, were accompanied by two great bodies of horse, to act as wings; the right of which was commanded by the lord Stanley, and consisted of four thousand men of Lancashire and Cheshire; and the left wing was led by the lord Fitz Hugh, assisted by sir William Parr and sir James Harrington, consisting of two thousand men; while a thousand were appointed to guard and attend the ordnance. Besides all these land forces, a fleet was likewise fitted out, under Robert Radcliffe, which was to transport the heaviest of the artillery, and attend the motions of the army. In this order they marched, and formed the siege of Berwick, the town of which presently surrendered, though the castle prepared for a vigorous defence: but the duke of Gloucester having advice that the Scottish nobility, who generally hated James, had risen on their march, murdered three of that prince's chief favourites, and afterwards disbanded their troops, and that James himself had taken refuge in Edinburgh castle, he left the siege of the castle of Berwick to be carried on by the lord Stanley, sir John Elrington, and sir William Parr, with four thousand men, and set out with the rest of the army towards Edinburgh, wasting the country as they advanced; and as James was in no condition to make head against him, they entered Edinburgh in triumph. The duke of Gloucester, unwilling to come to extremities, desired a conference with the nobility at Haddington, a town between Edinburgh and Berwick; when, after some altercation on both sides, it was agreed that the citizens of Edinburgh should give security for the repayment of the sums Edward had advanced as the fortune of his daughter Cicely with the eldest son of Scotland, in case that match should miscarry; that the castle of Berwick should belong to the English; that the duke of Albany should be appointed regent of Scotland, that duke promising to acknowledge James as his sovereign; and the archbishop of St. Andrew's, the bishop of Dunkeld, the chancellor, and the earl of Argyll, obliging themselves to procure a free pardon and safety for the duke's own person, and indemnification to his followers||. This agreement being ratified, the duke of Albany, to his great mortification, found himself obliged to lay aside his late assumed title of king, and do homage anew to his brother James. That prince, however, could not forgive him the part he had acted, and resolved to seize the first opportunity of being revenged: the duke, apprized of his intention, soon after retired to the castle of Dunbar, which he surrendered to the English, after having renewed his former treaty with Edward; but, upon that king's death, despairing of succour from England, he repaired to the court of Lewis XI. where he was accidentally killed by a splinter of a lance, in a tournament with the duke of Orleans, afterwards Lewis XII.

The war with Scotland being thus terminated, though in a manner far from honourable or advantageous to Edward or his kingdom, the king then devoted his whole attention towards the prosecution of the revenge he had vowed against Lewis: but, as he was busied in making preparations for this purpose, death put an end to his life and projects, on the ninth of April, 1483, in the forty-first year of his age, and twenty third of his reign. Some writers will have it, that he was carried off by a severe fit of a quartan ague; but it is most probable that his intemperance and incontinency had broke his constitution, and that an ill habit of body, contracted by excesses, terminated his life without any particular visible distemper.

The history of this prince's reign, and what has been already said of his person, his manners, and his political connections, leave little more to be added to his public or private character: we shall only observe, that some writers have shewn an unpardonable impartiality between this king and his brother the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. and in the character they have given of them, have, at the expence of truth, blanch'd the memory of Edward, in order to blacken that of Richard. Certain it is, that Edward possessed many amiable qualifications; but they were all disgraced by a dastardly jealousy, which made him seek to drown every rising apprehension in torrents of blood, no matter how noble, or nearly allied to his own; and he could teach his face to wear the bewitching smile of affability, while his breast meditated perjury, revenge, and murder. But we shall forbear enlarging upon this subject, and proceed to close the history of the fourth Edward with an account of his issue.

Edward his eldest son, and Richard duke of York, were all the male lawful issue that out-lived him; his son George, who was born at Shrewsbury, and created duke of Bedford, dying in his cradle.

His daughters were,

1. Elizabeth, born at Westminster on the eleventh of February, 1466; promised in marriage to the dauphin of France; courted by her uncle Richard; and at last married to Henry VII.

2. Cicely, who had been betrothed to the prince of Scotland, but afterwards married to the lord Wells, and had issue two daughters, both of whom died childless. The second husband of this Cicely was one Kyme, of Lincolnshire, by whom she had no children. Her body lies buried in Quarena, in the Isle of Wight.

3. Anne of York, duchess of Norfolk, third daughter of Edward IV. was espoused to Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, earl-marshal and lord-treasurer of England, by whom she had a son, named Thomas Howard, who died young.

4. Bridget of York, his fourth daughter, was born at Eltham, in Kent, on St. Martin's eve, the tenth of November, 1480, in the twentieth year of his reign.

5. Mary of York, fifth daughter, was promised in marriage to the king of Denmark, but died before the consummation thereof, at Greenwich, on the Thursday before Whit-sunday, 1482.

6. Margaret of York, sixth daughter of Edward IV. was born the nineteenth of April, 1472, and died the eleventh of December following, and was buried in Westminster abbey, in the king's chapel.

7. Catherine of York, who was married to William Courtney, earl of Devonshire, and died the fifteenth of November, 1527, leaving issue one son, Henry Courtney.

His natural children, mentioned by writers, were,

1. Arthur Plantagenet, viscount Lisle, begotten on Elizabeth Lucy. And,

2. Elizabeth Plantagenet, married to Thomas, lord Lumley.

They seem, from the name of Plantagenet, to have been owned by their father. But, besides these, there was another, called,

3. Elizabeth (by Catherine, daughter of sir Robert Clavenger, and widow of Thomas Petit), who was married to John ap William, serjeant at arms, and reduced at last to such poverty, that Glover, Somerset herald, who knew her, says she was forced to sue for relief.

There is still another mentioned in a MS. of Thomas Wriothesley, Garter king at arms, called Isabel Mylbery, said to be married to John Audley, esq. brother to the lord Audley.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

In the seventh year of this king's reign the people had an extravagant way of adorning their feet; they wore the beaks or piques of their shoes so long, that they encumbered them in walking, and were forced to tie them up to their knees; the fine gentlemen did it with chains of silver or silver gilt, and others with silk laces. This ridiculous fashion was in vogue ever since the year 1382; but now it was prohibited on the forfeiture of twenty shillings, and pain of cursing by the clergy. The same year the king concluded a league with the king of Castile and Arragon, by which he allowed certain Cotswold sheep to be transported into Spain, where the breed so increased that their fine wool has since proved very detrimental to England.

In the eleventh year of his reign, 1471, William Caxton, a mercer of London, a lover of letters, and author of the Chronicle called Fractus Temporum, brought the art of printing into England, and practised it first in Westminster abbey.

In his seventeenth year there was so dreadful a plague, that historians relate more people were destroyed by it than by fifteen years war before.

In his nineteenth year, Robert Byfield, one of the sheriffs of London, was fined fifty pounds by the court of aldermen for affronting the lord mayor; which it seems was only kneeling too near him at prayers, at St. Paul's church.

In the year 1483, the last of this reign, was born Thomas Parr, a Shropshire man, noted for his extraordinary great age. He lived till the year 1635, being then brought up to London by the earl of Arundel, as a great rarity; when he died, after having lived in the reigns of ten kings and queens, and to the age of one hundred and fifty-two years.

EDWARD V. The second King of ENGLAND of the Line of YORK.
A. D. 1483.

EDWARD IV. was succeeded on the throne by his eldest son, of the same name, who was proclaimed the very day of his father's decease, in London, by the name of Edward V. being then only twelve years, five months, and some days old. Before we enter into the history of this reign, in which the measure of England's guilt was full, it will be necessary to shew the state of the court of England at the death of Edward IV.

Elizabeth Woodville (or Grey), who from a subject was raised to the dignity of queen, held the first rank at court, as well by the privileges common to all queens, as by her great credit. Edward, notwithstanding his libertinism, could never get rid of that weakness for her person which first subdued him into marriage; hence, during his life-time, she had prevailed on him to lavish honours and preferments on all her relations; and hence, at his death, she, by the same influence, got him to leave her and her family in actual possession of all the executive power of the kingdom; nor do we find that either the duke of Gloucester, or any of the old nobility, had any share in the public councils.

It is natural to suppose that this disposition of affairs sat very uneasy upon the latter, and that they could not look upon the queen and her family with any friendly eye: they had shewn it before Edward's death, by retiring from court. The principal members of this party, besides the duke of Gloucester, were Henry Stafford, duke of Buckingham; William, lord Hastings; and Thomas, lord Stanley. The first of these was sprung from a daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester, and son of Edward III. and enjoyed the office of high-constable; the lord Hastings was high-chamberlain, and possessed a large share of the king's confidence, on account of the many eminent services he had done him; and the lord Stanley was the representative of an ancient family. Edward had not been able, during his life-time, to moderate the animosity of the two rival parties; but fearing that, after his decease, they would come to an open rupture, he on his death-bed, earnestly recommended a reconciliation, to which they in appearance readily agreed: the queen undertook for her brother Rivers, who was absent, and her eldest son, the marquis of Dorset, embraced the duke of Buckingham and the lord Hastings, in the presence of the dying king, with all the marks of the most cordial affection. The duke of Gloucester, who was then in the North, on the affairs of the kingdom, was not present at this ceremony, which bade fair to ruin his deep-laid schemes of usurpation, had not an inward animosity still remained between the parties.

This shewed itself almost as soon as the breath was departed from Edward's body; they forgot their mutual engagements, and each party endeavoured to gain the ascendant over the other by securing the person of the young king, whose name might serve to authorize all their proceedings.

Young Edward, at the time of his father's decease, was keeping his court at Ludlow castle, in Shropshire, under the tuition of Anthony Woodville, earl Rivers, his mother's brother, who had been appointed his governor; his uterine brother, sir Richard Grey, possessed another very considerable place about his person; sir Thomas Vaughan was his chamberlain, and all the other places in his household were filled with the queen's creatures.

Upon the death of her husband, she dispatched an express to her brother, earl Rivers, to bring the young king up to London, attended by a large body of troops, in order to his coronation, which was fixed for the fourth of May. The intent of the queen and her party in this, was to have a sufficient force at hand to over-awe their enemies, in case they should attempt to obstruct them in the full government of all affairs during the king's nonage.

On the other side, the duke of Buckingham and the lord Hastings sent an express to the duke of Gloucester, acquainting him with the king's death, and the queen's measures, pressing him either to come immediately to town and take on him the protectorship, or to take Ludlow in his way, and assume the guardianship of the king's person. The duke of Gloucester, during the life time of Edward IV. had been greatly embarrassed between the two parties at court: he knew the only way to please the king was to affect a complaisance for the queen; but, on the other hand, as he saw the aim of the latter was to engross the government, and her haughty treatment of the old nobility, he could not be attached to her without forfeiting the affections of the ancient families, of which he might one day stand in need. As he was naturally a great dissembler, he resolved to make his court publicly to the queen, but in private he joined with the duke of Buckingham, the lord Hastings, and their party. On receiving the letters of the above noblemen, he sent to desire they would meet him at Northampton, in order to a conference: thither they accordingly repaired, with a great number of their vassals, and there, in a long and laboured harangue, they represented to Gloucester the danger to which both himself and they would be exposed, should the queen continue to manage the reins of government; and concluded with desiring him to get the king out of the hands of Rivers, and take the helm of state into his own management. Richard required not much entreaty to gratify the favourite purpose of his soul; however, finding that Rivers had got the start of him in point of strength, he had recourse to policy and dissimulation: he caused his nephew to be proclaimed at York, and, taking the oath of allegiance to him, he obliged all the magistrates, with the nobility and gentry of the county, to follow his example: he wrote a letter of condolence to the queen, so full of deference, submission, and kindness, that Elizabeth, who knew little of men or things, fondly imagined that she should find as much obsequiousness from the first prince of the blood, who alone could rival her in the government of her son, as she had found from her late husband.

In the mean time Hastings returned to London, where he was very popular, and, coming to the council, presented letters from the duke of Gloucester, wherein, under pretence of keeping the peace of the nation, he advised them to prevail on the queen to countermand her late order to her brother Rivers, and that the number of troops destined to attend the young king to London, might not exceed two thousand; "for (alleged the artful duke) the raising forces for the defence of the king, at a time when there is not the least appearance of danger, may revive former jealousies and suspicions, and finally involve the kingdom in civil war and confusion." The queen, very imprudently, followed the advice, of which she perceived not the venom, and sent orders to her brother Rivers to disband his forces; with which he was the more readily induced to comply, as the crafty Gloucester had taken care to write to him in much the same style as he had to the queen; his letters were filled with assurances of friendship to him, and with those solemn professions of duty and obedience to the king, which he affected to make upon all occasions, and in all public places. Rivers was completely duped on this occasion; he was weak enough to believe all that was wrote to him: dismissing therefore his forces, he set forth with the young king and his ordinary attendants, and even suffered himself to be trepanned into fellowship, feasting, and even familiarity with the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham at Northampton. It was so contrived that young Edward lay that night at Stoney Stratford; and as earl Rivers, with Buckingham and Gloucester, were going thither the next morning, when they came almost to the entrance of the town, the earl and sir Richard Grey, who had come forth from the king to meet them, were both seized; and Gloucester hastening to the house where the king lodged, took him into his own custody, and secured his principal officers and attendants. It was in vain for the young monarch by his tears and intreaties to intercede for persons so near to him in blood, so dear to his tender years; though no act of exterior respect, reverence, and tenderness were omitted by Gloucester towards the king, yet he lent a deaf ear to his request, and Edward was carried back to Northampton, while Rivers, Grey, and sir Thomas Vaughan, were sent prisoners to Pontefract castle.

The queen was no sooner apprized of these proceedings, than she at once conceived the whole design of the duke of Gloucester, and, considering her brother and two sons as totally lost, fled for refuge in the middle of the night to the abbey of Westminster, accompanied by the duke of York, who was about nine years of age, the marquis of Dorset, and the rest of her family. The lord Hastings, then at London, though he hated the queen and her relations, had yet a sincere affection for his late master, Edward IV. and was unalterably devoted to the young king and his brother: he had been in the secret of Gloucester's taking Edward out of the hands of the earl of Rivers; and, as he had an high opinion of Gloucester's virtue and loyalty, received the news of their design having taken effect with great pleasure; he even wrote to Rotherham, archbishop of York, then lord-chancellor of England, desiring him not to be alarmed at what had happened, as it would all turn out for the good of the nation: and making use of his popularity with the city of London, which began to shew some tumultuous inclinations upon hearing of their sovereign being forcibly taken from his friends and relations, he took upon himself to answer for the duke of Gloucester's conduct and loyalty: this pacified the majority of the people; and Gloucester coming to London on the fourth of May, with the king, he carried him to the bishop's palace, where he was attended by the lord-mayor, the magistracy, and a great number of lords. Gloucester, on this occasion, rode bare-headed before his royal nephew, bowing on each side popularly low, and ever and anon crying out to the gaping crowd, "Behold your king! behold your king!" This management, and the king's being lodged among the citizens, entirely removed the scruples they had began to entertain against Gloucester, on account of the affair at Northampton.

The rejoicings for the king's safe arrival being over, it was necessary to settle the government during his minority, which was to last seven years. The great-seal was taken from the archbishop of York, and delivered to John Russel, bishop of Lincoln: the former of these prelates had given Gloucester a very plausible pretence to remove him; for when the queen fled to sanctuary, he hastened thither before day-light, to give her all the consolation in his power, and had even assured her, that if any ill fortune should befall the king, he would immediately crown the duke of York, his brother; and, as an earnest of his sincerity and affection to his former master's family, he had left in her custody the great-seal of England; he had, indeed, sent for it again next morning, but this could not excuse him in the eyes of the faction.

Gloucester, finding no one dare to oppose his will, was, on the twenty-seventh of May, declared protector and defender of the kingdom. All these steps were very agreeable both to the ancient nobility and the common people, as well on account of their general hatred to the queen's family, as that the duke of Gloucester was the only prince of the blood capable of holding the reins of government, and he had carefully concealed his true design from the eye of the world; but knowing that these could be but half completed, unless he could get the duke of York in his power as well as the king, since were the latter removed, the other must stand in his place, Richard therefore, in an artful speech, addressed to the council, grievously complained of the distrustful conduct of the queen, which, he said, "reflected dishonour on all the lords of the council, and would make foreigners expect to see troubles break out in the realm, when the king's brother should seem under a necessity of taking refuge like a common felon in a sanctuary, and that the king should not be attended on his coronation-day (which he declared to be fixed for the twenty-second of June) by his only brother:" in short, he wrought so much upon the council by his plausible arguments, or rather the members were by this time so moulded to his purpose, that the greater part concurred in his sentiments, and it was now proposed to take the young duke away from his asylum by force. Here Gloucester had a fresh opportunity of playing off his artillery of dissimulation: he objected to the least appearance of violence being used towards the young prince, and recommended that the archbishop of Canterbury might be sent, at the head of a deputation from the lords, to make the queen sensible of the impropriety propriety of her conduct, and to request that she would deliver up the duke, "as the place he was then in was not only a scandalous shelter, but dangerous to his health, and very afflicting to the king, who pined for want of his brother's company *."

The deputation waiting upon the queen, a long conference passed between them, the result of which was, that Elizabeth, seeing, in case of her obstinate refusal, that she should be obliged to do that by force, which was now only respectfully desired of her, and the archbishop pledging his sacerdotal word that the duke of Gloucester did not entertain the least design injurious to the royal family (as indeed the good prelate truly thought), she suddenly caught the young prince in her arms, and, taking a most affecting farewell of him, delivered his person to the lords of the deputation, by whom he was instantly carried to his uncle Gloucester, then waiting for the event of the conference in the Star-chamber, who received the royal youth with dissembled affection, saying, "Now welcome, my lord, even with all my heart." Then taking the child in his arms, he introduced him to the king his brother. This was done on the thirtieth of May, and the protector having now both the princes in his power, he removed them from the bishop of London's palace to the Tower. This step occasioned the less suspicion, as it was the constant practice for the kings of England to pass some time there before their coronation, from whence they always went in cavalcade to Westminster to go through that ceremony.

Now Gloucester was drawing near the summit of his wishes: master of the persons of the king and his next heir, all he required to crown his ambition was to get some of the leading persons among the old nobility to favour and abet his views. Buckingham he had already made sure of, by promising him the earldom of Hereford, which he claimed by a family-right; by his settling in his family the office of high-constable of England, and by lavishing other gifts and preferments upon him even beyond the extent of his wishes: add to this, that he knew Buckingham mortally hated the queen and her family, because it was through their means that the late king had refused to give him possession of the Hereford title and estate. The lord John Howard was actuated by the same principles as Buckingham; a settled hatred to the Woodville family, by whom he had been disobliged: of the lords Stanley and Hastings, between whom there was a great intimacy, he was not yet so sure, and therefore it behoved him to come at their sentiments, those of Hastings in particular, as the least mistake might be fatal to his enterprize.

The protector would gladly have won over the lord Hastings to his interest, both on account of that nobleman's great credit with the people, and a personal friendship he had for him; but finding by sir William Catesby, a tool, whom he had employed to sound him, how inflexibly Hastings was attached to his deceased master's family, and considering how easily his interest, with that of the lord Stanley, might disconcert all his schemes, if once they had sure grounds for believing he aimed at possessing himself of the crown, he resolved upon the destruction of both those lords. In the mean time, to amuse those he had the most reason to apprehend, Richard artfully named a committee to settle the form, manner, and pretensions at the approaching coronation. This committee consisted of the archbishops of Canterbury and York, Morton, bishop of Ely, the lords Hastings, Stanley, and others. Thus business enough was found for them to blind their vigilance, and give Gloucester full scope for completing his treason; who, continuing his dissimulation, issued out writs, on the fifth of June, to upwards of fifty noblemen and gentlemen, summoning them to take the degree of knighthood at the approaching coronation; and, between that and the thirteenth, such pageants and preparations were made as inclined even the most distrustful at last to believe that the protector was in earnest; but the deceitfulness of these appearances soon became manifest.

The duke of Gloucester, desirous to rid his hands of the prisoners at Pontefract, as their death would deprive the royal family of their chief support, now signed a warrant for the execution of the earl Rivers, sir Richard Grey, and sir Thomas Vaughan. The lord Hastings had but too great a share in this sanguinary measure: the queen and her family had done him many ill offices with the late king, and were once very near worming him out of the royal favour; on this account he hated them mortally, and dreaded nothing so much as their getting again into power; but by concurring with the protector in their destruction, he unhappily furnished a precedent for his own.

Richard, as we have already observed, had taken a resolution to remove him, if he could not be gained over to his interests; but he was still willing to have him his friend if possible: he therefore commanded Catesby to try him once more, and even to hint the scheme that was laid for the exclusion of his nephews. Catesby, in this second conference, found Hastings more resolved than ever to oppose any attempt that should be made against the rights or lives of his master's children; which being reported to Richard, he determined to get rid of him without delay.

This resolution being taken, he called a council at the Tower on the thirteenth of June, under colour of finishing the affair of the king's coronation: he came himself at nine o'clock in the morning, and his behaviour was remarkably affable and good-humoured; after a short stay he went out, desiring the lords of the council to continue their deliberations in his absence. In about an hour after his departure, he returned with a furious aspect, knitting his brows, biting his lips, and exhibiting all the marks of the most violent indignation: after a short pause, "My lords (said he), what punishment do those deserve who have plotted against my life?" He then proceeded in a long speech to accuse the queen and her adherents of having practised upon his health and life by necromancy, a pretence common enough in those days, when men in power wanted to get rid of their enemies; and, to confirm the truth of his allegation, he bared his left arm, which was withered, and shewed it to the council, who all stared upon each other, as they knew his arm had always been in that shrivelled condition. The lord Hastings was the first who broke silence, incensed at this infamous piece of deceit in a man he had once so good an opinion of:

"If, my lord (said that nobleman), they have been guilty of such practices—" "How! (cried the protector, interrupting him in a fury), dost thou answer with Ifs and Ands, as if I had forged the accusation? I tell thee, they have conspired against my life, and thou thyself art one of their accomplices!" so saying, he struck the table with his hand, and immediately a number of armed men rushed into the council-chamber, and, at the protector's command, seized Hastings and Stanley, with Rotherham, archbishop of York, and Morton, bishop of Ely; the three last of whom were conducted to prison; but the first, being allowed only half an hour for confessing to the first priest that offered, had his head chopped off on a log of timber, which was found on the green before the Tower chapel. His execution happened, as near as could be judged, about the very hour when the queen's unfortunate relations and friends were, by his advice, suffering the same fate at Pontefract castle.

Glocester being apprehensive that the death of so distinguished a nobleman and so very popular as Hastings was, might, from the illegal and sudden manner of it, occasion a tumult in the city; to prevent it, sent for the mayor and chief citizens, to acquaint them with the reasons of the proceeding: they found him and his confident, Buckingham, cased up in rusty armour, hastily put on over their cloaths, and affecting to be under the terror of an immediate insurrection; the protector, taking the word, told them, "that the lord Hastings, and some others, had formed a conspiracy for killing them both that day in the council; that they had no certain information of it till ten o'clock in the morning, and had no time to provide for their defence, or to put on any armour but what came next to hand: that the suddenness of the execution, without a legal trial, was owing to the imminent danger of an insurrection to rescue him; and his guilt being evident, it was thought proper to inflict the deserved punishment of his crimes immediately, to secure the peace of the nation:" he concluded with telling the mayor and his brethren, "that he had sent for them to be witnesses of the truth, that they might acquaint the people, and prevent or appease the commotions which ill affected persons might endeavour to excite in the city."

The mayor, Edmund Shaw, was a mere creature of the protector's, and of course was easily satisfied with any apology; and causing a proclamation to be made in the city, to the same effect as the speech that had been addressed to him, interspersed with many false and malicious aspersions on the character of Hastings, matters were so ordered, that no disturbance ensued; and the next day sir Richard Radcliffe, a creature of Glocester's, arriving in town with a body of troops from Yorkshire, and others that Buckingham had sent for from Wales, all apprehensions of a forcible opposition vanished, and Glocester now began to be less reserved in declaring his purpose of dethroning his nephew. In the mean time, to give the more colour to his proceedings, he ordered the sheriffs of London to arrest Mrs. Jane Shore, who had been the favourite mistress of the deceased Edward IV. and had, after his death, continued her unlawful commerce with the lord Hastings. This lady too was charged with treason and witchcraft, and having conspired, in concert with the last mentioned nobleman, against the life of the protector; but not being able to fix either of those charges upon her, she was condemned to do penance through the streets of London for incontinence, and it was by proclamation ordered that no one should presume to accommodate her with lodging, or even food. Notwithstanding this severity she found support, and was alive in the reign of Henry VIII. when sir Thomas Moore, the historian knew her; but she was then without any remains of her former beauty, for which she had been so much renowned.

These proceedings of the protector rather lost than gained him the affection of the Londoners, who began to think the accusation against Hastings and the rest of his friends was all a forgery, calculated to serve the worst purposes. Glocester was therefore put to his last expedient, which was to endeavour to establish a belief of the bastardy of the of the young king and his brother. Pretences are never wanting on such occasions, and they were now furnished by the late king's inordinate passion for the fair sex; it was said that the late king Edward had promised marriage to several of his mistresses, and that he had been actually joined in wedlock to the lady Eleanor Talbot, widow of sir John Boteler, by which means all the posterity of Edward's marriage with the lady Elizabeth Grey, the present queen dowager, became illegitimate. This story was given to Dr. Ralph Shaw, the mayor's brother, an eminent preacher of those days, to handle in such a manner as should be most likely to prepare the minds of the people for approving Richard's title to the crown. Shaw accordingly mounting the pulpit, on Sunday the twenty-second of June, at St. Paul's cross, preached a sermon from these words, "Bastard slips shall take no deep root," (Wisd. of Solomon, chap. iv.) and after setting forth as above represented, he expatiated on the blessings which God usually bestowed on the fruits of the marriage-bed, and the calamities which on the contrary fell upon the children born out of wedlock. He supported his argument with a number of examples, as well from sacred as prophane history: he then warmly asserted Richard's right to the crown, running into a thousand excessive and ridiculous encomiums upon the person of the protector, who he said carried in his air, his countenance, his disposition, and in his whole behaviour, the express image of his illustrious father, Richard, the late duke of York.

It was so contrived, that at the moment when his fulsome periods were closed, the protector and the duke of Buckingham came into the congregation, expecting no doubt peals of applause, and that the people would shout, God save king Richard! but they were disappointed; the people hung their heads in sullen silence, equally enraged at the impudence and the venality of the preacher, who lost all his popularity by this shameful prostitution of his talent.

The protector and his cabal finding the little impression this sermon had made on the audience, it was determined by them, that, on the Tuesday following, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and livery of the city of London, should be assembled at Guildhall, whither the duke of Buckingham was to repair, and in direct terms to propose Richard to be king. Buckingham was universally esteemed the finest speaker of his age and country, and he exerted every nerve of elocution to carry his point; but when he had closed his oration, and waited for the

the cry of King Richard ! so sudden a silence ensued, that even the set of hirelings who had been planted to begin the cry, durst not venture to open their venal throats. The duke, vexed to the soul at the stubbornness of the people, could not forbear hinting his disappointment to the mayor, who, not knowing what else to say, answered, that perhaps the people were silent because they used to be harangued only by the recorder, who was the mouth of the city ; upon this he commanded that officer (Thomas Fitz Williams) to speak to the people. He accordingly repeated the substance of the duke's harangue, but still without effect. Upon this the duke, addressing himself again to the assembly, told them in plain terms, " that the lords in council, and the commons of the kingdom, had resolved that no bastard should ever reign over them, and that the election of Richard was a thing resolved on, whether they gave their concurrence or not ; however, he desired they would give their opinion, and answer whether they would have the protector for their king." This speech, which was in the style of a menace, caused a general murmur through the crowd, when some of the duke's creatures, at the lower end of the hall, throwing up their caps, shouted, Long live king Richard ! This acclamation was seconded by a few of the citizens, who had been previously bribed for the purpose, and echoed by the rabble and apprentices who stood without the gate. This the duke pretended to call an universal assent, and ordered the mayor, aldermen, and chief citizens to attend the next day at Crosby Place, where the protector resided, to join with the lords and commons in an address, that his highness would be pleased to ascend the throne and manage the reins of government.

Richard and his junto had previously drawn up an act of succession to the crown, which he got signed by several lords spiritual and temporal, and some principal men among the commons : this roll was the next day presented to him in form, as from the three estates of the kingdom ; the lord-mayor and aldermen, being introduced by the duke of Buckingham and other noblemen, joined their endeavours to persuade him to accept of the crown. This matter was carried on with amazing grimace : the modest and loyal Richard pretended to be greatly surprized at the proposal, which he absolutely rejected, declaring that he loved his brother's children better than all the crowns upon earth. In this strain he went on, till Buckingham, with a well-counterfeited resentment at his obstinacy, roundly told him, " that the people were firmly determined that none of Edward's children should enjoy the throne of England ; and that, if he refused to accept the crown, they must cast their eyes on some other person." In this Buckingham seems to have copied after Mortimer and his faction, when they deposed Edward II. and raised his son, Edward III. prematurely to the throne.

Richard affecting to be greatly moved with this solemn declaration, yielded with hypocritical reluctance to their desires ; and going, the day following, to Westminster Hall, he placed himself in the royal seat, made an harangue to the audience, and gave the judges a strict charge for the due administration of justice. He was the next morning, June 27, proclaimed king in London, and gave the great-seal to John Russel, bishop of Lincoln, declaring him chancellor : from that day all acts of royalty passed in Richard's name, and we must therefore here close the short reign of Edward V.

RICHARD III. commonly called CROOKBACK. The third King of ENGLAND of the House of YORK, and last of the Race of PLANTAGENET. A. D. 1483.

THE first care of Richard, after his getting possession of the regal power, was to reward those who had assisted him in his treasonable attempt, and to gain others over to his interest by acts of munificence. The lord Howard, one of his chief favourites, was son to the daughter and co-heiress of Mowbray, duke of Norfolk and hereditary earl-marshal of England ; the Mowbray family being extinct in the male line by the death of John the late duke, Richard, the young duke of York, second son to the deceased king Edward IV. had been married to his only daughter and heiress*, and was made duke of Norfolk and earl-marshal of England : but on this occasion the usurper Richard, by the plenitude of his power, without regarding the infant duke's rights, on the twenty-eighth of June, created the lord Howard duke of Norfolk, and appointed him earl-marshal of England and high-constable, to act as such for his coronation. This promotion was followed by several others : the duke of Norfolk's eldest son, Thomas Howard, was made earl of Surry and Warren ; William Barclay (or Berkeley) was made earl of Nottingham (a title which had likewise been conferred by the late Edward upon his son the duke of York) ; the lord Lovel was made viscount of that name ; Thomas Rotherham, archbishop of York, was released from prison ; and the lord Stanley was not only set at liberty, but even appointed steward of the household, and made a knight of the Garter : this last promotion, however, seems to have been the effect of fear rather than of favour ; for the lord Strange, Stanley's son, had begun to raise forces in Lincolnshire, and Richard thought this the most likely means of preventing the danger of a rebellion from that quarter.

But the flood-tide of his bounty was directed towards the duke of Buckingham, who so essentially served him on the late occasion : this nobleman received vast sums of money from him by way of present, and was constituted governor of all the royal castles in Wales, and steward of all the royal manors in the counties of Salop and Hereford, and chamberlain of North and South Wales; and, besides other posts of profit and power, was made constable of England; he was likewise put in possession of all the lands which he claimed as the next heir in blood to Humphrey de Bohun, last earl of Hereford.

The coronation of Richard and his consort, Anne (daughter of Richard, earl of Warwick), was performed in Westminster abbey, on the seventh of July, with the greatest magnificence; the queen's train was borne up by Margaret, countess of Richmond, wife of lord Stanley and mother to the earl of Richmond, then in exile in Brittany. To give this ceremony a greater lustre, seventeen knights of the Bath were made: in short, no circumstance of pomp or pageantry was omitted; as if the addition of these could supply the defect of right!

Richard, after his coronation, began to think of securing himself on the throne, to which he had mounted by such a series of treachery and dissimulation; and that he might strengthen his power with foreign alliances, and prevent his enemies from receiving any assistance abroad, he, on the twelfth of July, appointed Bernard de la Force his ambassador to the court of Castile, with orders to renew the ancient alliance between that crown and England. The next day he gave the like commission to Thomas Hutton, to treat of the prolongation of the truce with Francis II. duke of Brittany*; probably Hutton had secret instructions to endeavour to procure the earl of Richmond to be given up, or at least to renew the treaty upon that subject between Edward IV. and Francis. On the sixteenth of July Dr. Gunthorpe was made keeper of the privy-seal; and two days afterwards Richard appointed commissioners to treat with the court of France concerning some breaches of the truce, in order to have occasion to confirm it. Lewis XI. of France was now drawing near his last moments, but still retained his old maxims; the infirmities under which he laboured gave him a specious pretence for shifting off any personal connections with the usurper, nor does it appear that he ever entered into any connections with him. The duke of Brittany, though ready to renew the alliance with the crown of England, could not be prevailed on to violate the rights of hospitality, by giving up young Henry of Richmond; but the league with Castile (now governed by queen Isabella and Ferdinand, king of Arragon, her husband) was renewed.

These public affairs being dispatched, Richard resolved upon a progress through some parts of England, and passing through Windsor, Oxford, Gloucester, and Coventry, he at length stopped at York, where he appeared in all the pomp of royalty, with his queen and his son prince Edward (late created prince of Wales, and knighted), and was crowned anew in the cathedral. It was during this progress that, according to all our historians, Richard contrived the making away with the late king's two sons, Edward and Richard, duke of York, that their death happening in his absence, he might be the less suspected. This murderous commission was given to one sir James Tyrrel, a man fleshed in the ways of blood, and who, having found access to the Tower, is said to have taken away the lives of the two innocent princes by the hands of two ruffians, Miles Forest and John John Dighton, who smothered them in their beds, and buried their bodies under the stair-case†. Various are the opinions of writers concerning this tragedy, some peremptorily charging the whole guilt of it upon Richard, others endeavouring to exculpate him from it. That Richard got the crown by the most infamous and villainous means, is most certain; but their murder seems inconsistent with Richard's cunning and dissimulation; nor can we suppose him so weak a man as to give such a bloody commission under his hand, or put it in the officer's power to blast that reputation which he was so anxious to preserve; besides, it may be considered, that, after what had passed with regard to the illegitimacy of the young princes, it was scarcely worth Richard's while to remove them by murder. That the two princes either died or disappeared about this time, is beyond all doubt, though no historian is absolutely positive as to their fate.

Richard having finished the business of his progress, and received the welcome tidings of the death or removal of his two nephews, he returned to London; but it was only to meet with an inveterate enemy where he thought he had a fast friend; and though he thought his throne secure, as having been recognized king of England by the court of Spain, and the other courts of Europe, he found himself deceived.

We have already seen with what a lavish hand Richard had bestowed honours and riches on the duke of Buckingham, who had been his great friend and support; it happened, however, that Buckingham, presuming too far on his merit, had raised the jealousy or indignation of Richard; and, while they were together at Gloucester, the duke having made some demands which the king thought unreasonable, he gave him such an answer as plainly shewed he was highly displeased. Buckingham, who was haughty, violent, and avaricious, was so offended with the king's refusal, that he desired leave to quit the court to look after his private affairs: Richard, not imagining his denial had made so deep an impression upon the duke, or perhaps despising the effects of his resentment, gave him the leave he desired, and Buckingham quitting Gloucester, retired to his castle of Brecknock, where Morton, bishop of Ely, who had been committed to his custody by Richard, was confined. This prelate was an artful politician, and a zealous friend of the family of Lancaster. As he was known to have great politeness and address, the duke indulged himself in frequent conversations with him, in the course of which it was easy for the bishop to perceive that his noble keeper was highly dissatisfied with the court; he drew a favourable omen from this discovery, which he resolved to improve

† In the time of sir Thomas Chicheley master of the ordinance, great heaps of records of bills and answers lying in the Six Clerks Office, were removed to be repositied in the White Tower; and a new pair of stairs were made into the chapel there, for the easier conveyance of them thither. The labourers in digging at the foot of the old stairs, came to a wooden chest, containing the bones of consumed corps, covered with a heap of stones: which bones king Charles caused to be interred in Henry VIIIth's chapel, near two other royal children, Mary and Sophia, daughters of James I. with a monument of white marble, and an inscription on it in capital letters. to the advantage of that cause for which he was so warm a stickler: he plied the duke with that judicious flattery which is the key to almost every breast, how reserved soever; he expatiated on the virtues of the duke; thought that services like his were never to be forgotten; and distantly hinted, that the reigning king had been somewhat deficient in gratitude to the man to whom he owed his crown.

Buckingham took fire; he inveighed against Richard in such terms, that emboldened Morton to talk to him more freely: in a word, without detaining our readers with the long conversations which have been recorded by Hall, Hollingshed, and others of our historians, we shall only observe, that they soon came into a scheme for driving the tyrant Richard from the throne, and placing thereon the young earl of Richmond, who, by his mother Margaret, indisputably inherited all the rights of the house of Lancaster, on condition that the said earl should oblige himself upon oath to marry the princess Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of the deceased Edward IV. as this alliance would engage the two families of York and Lancaster in his interest; an expedient which was at once conformable to justice and equity, and admirably well calculated to extinguish the flames of civil war, which had so long desolated the kingdom.

In order to secure this alliance, which was the necessary preliminary to all their future proceedings, they determined to impart their scheme to Margaret, the old countess of Richmond, that she might inform her son of their design, and endeavour to procure the consent of the queen dowager. The bishop being intimately acquainted with one Reginald Bray, a servant of the countess of Richmond, sent for him to Brecknock, where he was charged with instructions to treat and settle these different points; and it appears from several authentic accounts, that this man had credit enough to draw in many of the most considerable personages in England to join in the scheme for recalling the earl of Richmond, and even to get them to appoint a general day of insurrection.

His first step was to gain the queen dowager's consent, and that of the princess Elizabeth; this was done by the mediation of one Dr. Lewis, a Welsh physician, who being consulted in that capacity by both the queen and the countess of Richmond, went between them without suspicion; for as the countess and the queen were declared enemies to each other, a personal interview might have caused an alarm. She assured the doctor that she was ready to concur in any design that tended to remove the barbarous usurper; but she insisted on the article of marriage between the earl of Richmond and her daughter as a sine qua non. This great point of the queen's concurrence being settled, the countess of Richmond found means to raise a large sum of money among her friends in London, and sent it over to Brittany by sir Hugh Conway, to enable her son to levy a body of troops, and provide ships, sailors, and all other necessaries for his enterprize; at the same time she dispatched sir Thomas Rain over to Calais, from whence he was to proceed with all haste to Vannes, in Brittany, where the earl then resided, to inform him of the disposition of the nobility to join him, and with some instructions about the proper place for his landing. Both these messengers arrived safe in Brittany, and returned with the earl's consent to the proposed marriage. Bray, in the mean time, managed matters so well in different parts of England, that a respectable body of the nobility engaged to be ready for a rising in their several counties on the eighteenth of October, when the duke of Buckingham was also to declare himself.

But while these things were transacting, the bishop of Ely, with whom a regard for personal safety was more prevalent than any other consideration, reflecting that the impetuosity of the duke of Buckingham's temper might hurry him into some rash attempt before their design could be brought to maturity, and thereby endanger the lives of all concerned therein, began to grow very uneasy under his confinement; and being now indulged in greater liberty than he formerly had, he took an opportunity to escape in disguise, and got over sea to Flanders. His escape threw the duke of Buckingham into great consternation, from which he was, however, somewhat relieved on receiving a letter from the prelate, excusing the step he had taken, and exhorting him to proceed in his enterprize, and assuring him that he could be of more service to him on the continent, than in England.

The bishop's suspicion proved to be but too well grounded; for Buckingham having impolitically forced great numbers into his service, this made them his enemies; and Richard spared no money to get intelligence, and, to have it brought him the earlier, had established stages of post-houses, at twenty miles distance from each other, throughout the realm, a practice first introduced by his brother Edward during the late war with Scotland; he had likewise his spies and emissaries in all parts, and we have an undoubted proof from the public records, that by the beginning of October he had full information of the conspiracy against him; for at this time a proclamation was issued, directed to the sheriffs of England, offering one thousand pounds in money, or one hundred pounds per annum in land, for apprehending the duke of Buckingham, the bishops of Ely and Salisbury, or the marquis of Dorset, who had it seems escaped out of sanctuary; and five hundred marks each, for several other persons, their accomplices, mentioned therein. We are told, that before this proclamation Richard had sent several orders to the duke of Buckingham, commanding him to repair to court, but which he as often disobeyed, returning for answer, that he did not think proper to expose his person by putting himself into the power of his mortal enemy, whom he neither loved nor would serve.

After this declaration Richard found that he must necessarily proceed to extremities. He accordingly collected his troops, and began his march towards the western counties, where he was informed the earl of Richmond proposed to land, and where several of his friends were already up in arms, expecting to be joined by Buckingham with his forces, a junction which if it had been effected, Richard's reign must have had yet a shorter date; but they were kept asunder by a wonderful operation of nature, equally sudden and unforeseen.

The duke of Buckingham having advanced, by long and hasty marches, into the Forest of Deane, in order to cross the Severn and join his western friends at Salisbury, found that the waters of that river had overflowed their banks in such a manner, as had not been known before in the memory of man; the inundation lasted six whole days, during which his army could neither pass the river, nor subsist where they were. He now found it impracticable to keep his men together; his soldiers had a distaste to his person, they were so struck with the prodigy they beheld before their eyes*, and terrified with the prospect of perishing for want of provisions, that they deserted in such numbers as to leave the duke in a few days with only one single servant, who was faithful enough to attend his master in his distress. In this wretched condition he saw no other resource than that of concealing himself until he should be able to retrieve his ruined affairs; he therefore took refuge in the house of one Banister, who had been a dependent on him, and whom he had by his liberality raised to a comfortable estate near Shrewsbury; but this wretch, dead to all the feelings of honour and gratitude, and allured by the promised reward in the king's proclamation for seizing the duke, treacherously betrayed his master and benefactor to John Milton, the sheriff of Shropshire, who conducted him to Shrewsbury, at which place he, on the second of November, lost his head without any form or process of trial. Upon the first news of this catastrophe, Buckingham's friends, who were ready in arms expecting him in the West, dispersed themselves; some lurked among their friends, and others took refuge in sanctuaries; but the greatest part took shipping and went over to the earl of Richmond, perceiving there was no safety for them in the kingdom; the marquis of Dorset was of this number.

In the mean time Henry, earl of Richmond, supposing that every thing was ready for his reception in England, embarked at St. Malo's about the latter end of October, with five thousand men, on board of forty vessels; but a violent storm arising forced the greatest part of his fleet on the coast of France, though the earl's ship, being stouter than the rest, rode it so well out, that she cast anchor off Poole, in Dorsetshire, where he saw the shore crowded with troops, with which Richard had lined all the coast, with orders to the officers of the several parties, that if the earl should attempt to land he should not be opposed; and that if he should send on shore to make any enquiries, they should pretend they belonged to the duke of Buckingham, and were stationed there to wait the arrival of the earl of Richmond. The earl, as the tyrant had foreseen, sending a boat with a messenger on shore, received this answer, which he mistrusted, and made the best of his way back towards the coast of France.

Upon his return to the court of Brittany, he there found the marquis of Dorset, the two Courtneys, the lord Wells, sir John Bouchier, sir Edward Woodville, sir Robert Willoughby, sir Giles Daubeney, sir John Cheney and his two brothers, with several others who had fled from England: from these he learned the dismaying news of Buckingham's overthrow, and their own dispersion, which seemed totally to annihilate all future hopes of success, and must have sunk the spirit of any but a prince of Henry's deep ambition and true judgment, who considered the abhorrence in which Richard was held by the greatest part of the English nation as a happy omen of future success; and the duke of Brittany engaging to continue his assistance, he determined to make another attempt with all convenient dispatch: mean while he bound himself by a solemn oath, in the cathedral of Benes, that he would espouse the princess Elizabeth, or, in case of her death, her younger sister Cecily; upon which all the English who were there present did homage to him as king of England. But let us now return to England.

On the twenty-third of January, 1484, the parliament met at Westminster, in consequence of its summons, when an act of attainder was passed against the bishops of Ely, Salisbury, and Exeter, the earls of Oxford and Pembroke, and other ringleaders of the late insurrection, who had fled the kingdom; and Richard was empowered by the two houses to make grants of their forfeited estates. Among the persons attainted were the earl of Richmond, and his mother, the countess dowager of Richmond; the estate of the latter, however, was given to her husband the lord Stanley, whom the usurper had lately created constable of England, and who became answerable to keep the countess from all illegal correspondence for the future. Richard's title to the crown, as set forth in the address of the three estates before-mentioned, was confirmed; and his son Edward being declared heir apparent, the lords spiritual and temporal soon after swore to maintain his succession. The parliament then broke up, on the twentieth of February, after passing several excellent laws for the good of the people, for the security of their liberties and properties, for the redress of grievances, and for the administration of justice: in a word, if we will believe Richard's most bitter enemies, he exercised his ill-acquired power with a moderation and equity, which might have done honour to a better title.

Richard, however, was soon alarmed by the arrival of Dr. Hutton, a civilian, whom he had sent as his ambassador to the court of Brittany, and who informed him that the duke had engaged to continue his assistance to the earl of Richmond; and that Henry and the refugees were actually planning another invasion. Richard, on receiving this intelligence, thought it behoved him to use his utmost endeavours to detach the duke from the interest of his rival; and an accident furnished him with a very favourable opportunity. The duke being old and infirm, was entirely guided by his treasurer, Peter Landois, the son of a taylor, who behaved himself with so much insolence, that he incurred the hatred of all the Bretons, insomuch that in the course of this very year the nobility had entered into an association against him, and had even made an attempt to seize his person in the court; but miscarrying in their project, they were, by the interest of the favourite, declared rebels and traitors, and obliged to fly the court. Landois dreading that the weight of popular resentment might at length crush him, resolved to strengthen himself by foreign connections; and having learned by his intelligence that Richard was now become absolute

* This inundation was so remarkable, that for a hundred years after it was called the Great Water, or Buckingham's Water. It is said to last ten days, and that men, women, and master over the English, he sent ambassadors to him with certain proposals, which the latter readily embraced. On the eighth of June an armistice was agreed on between Brittany and England; and by another private treaty the king agreed to send a thousand archers, under the lord Grey of Powis†, for the support of Landois, who, in consideration of this, promised that the earl of Richmond should be delivered up, and that his master and Richard should oppose the regency of France with their joint forces. Richard, that he might omit no precaution necessary to maintain the crown he had usurped, entered into several other negotiations in the course of this year, either for making new alliances, or rivetting the old ones; he secured the courts of Castile and Portugal, and the friendship of Maximilian, archduke of Austria; and though he had no apparent occasion to fear any thing from France under a minority, disturbed with intestine divisions, yet he sent ambassadors to Charles VIII. to desire a prolongation, or at least confirmation of the truce. There remained now only Scotland that could give him any uneasiness. As James III. who held the sceptre of that kingdom, was descended from a princess of the house of Somerset, the king imagined that he might naturally be induced to countenance the designs of Richmond, and therefore that he ought to make himself secure from that quarter: to that end he negotiated with James a truce, which was concluded in September this year, and which was to last to the same day of the year 1487. At the same time he gave his niece, Anne de la Pole, daughter of his beloved sister Elizabeth and the duke of Suffolk, in marriage to James, duke of Rothesay and prince of Scotland, the king of Scotland's eldest son; and, to deprive the earl of Richmond of all hopes of accomplishing his designs, he laid hold of a melancholy incident which happened in his family by the death of his own son Edward, prince of Wales, and declared his nephew John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, and brother to the lady Anne above-mentioned, presumptive heir to the crown, and proposed to have this declaration confirmed by parliament.

These several precautions appeared so just as to screen Richard from all danger: but coming to the knowledge of that most material circumstance of the plot which his enemies had formed against him, the union of the friends of the York family with the adherents of the house of Lancaster, by means of the earl of Richmond's marriage with the princess Elizabeth, he determined if possible to defeat a match which might occasion the subversion of his throne; and he saw no method so effectual as that of making Elizabeth his own wife, a rank to which he had an opportunity of raising her by the death of the lady Anne, daughter of the famous earl of Warwick, and widow of Edward, eldest son of Henry VI. whom he had persuaded, soon after the cruel murder of her husband, to accept of his hand. And we wish that historical truth would allow us to say, that the alliance now proposed was disrelished by the queen dowager and the princess Elizabeth, with all the horror that was due to the usurper of the rights of their family, the supposed murderer of both their husbands, and the author of the infamous bastardization of his brother's children; but the contrary is, unhappily for the memory of the fair, too notorious*: in short, the fact is, that Richard knew the queen's weak side so well, that he found means to revive in her mind all her hatred towards the house of Lancaster, and, by taking a solemn oath to her and her daughters, before an assembly of the lords spiritual and temporal, that he would never do her or hers the least injury, or suffer any to be done, and by lavish promises of taking her family and friends, the marquis of Dorset particularly, into high favour, he made such an impression, that the queen was persuaded to leave her sanctuary, and to deliver up her five daughters; nay, so thoroughly satisfied does she appear to have been with the usurper, that she sent into France, to her son the marquis of Dorset, pressing him to quit the earl of Richmond, and return home to take possession of the high honours that awaited him.

Mean while the earl of Richmond, having gotten intelligence of the treaty concluded between Richard and Landois, and knowing that minister to be a person capable of committing the vilest acts for his own advantage, he resolved to retire privately into France, and for that purpose sent Christopher Urswick, one of his followers, secretly to king Charles for a passport, which was readily granted him, and he departed from Vannes in disguise, attended by five persons only, and with great difficulty escaped the spies Landois had set to watch his motions, who pursued him so hotly that he was obliged to strike out of the high road, across the country, and at length got to Angers, a town in the French dominions, from whence he went to Lansy, where the French court then resided, and where he was received with great politeness and friendship; but the affairs of the French regency being at this time in great confusion, no prompt resolution was taken for the earl's assistance: however, the appearance of English noblemen and gentlemen, who every day flocked to the French court, gave his cause a favourable turn.

Among others, he was joined by John de Vere, earl of Oxford, who, as we have already seen, had been shut up prisoner, by Edward IV. in the castle of Guisnes, or, as the English called it, Hames. Having heard in prison, that the earl of Richmond laid claim to the crown of England, he had persuaded sir John Blount, governor of the castle (in the room of the lord Mountjoy, then lying dangerously ill), to declare for the house of Lancaster, and actually brought that officer with him to pay his respects to Henry. The regency began now to look more favourably upon the earl, and to take his affairs into serious consideration, and it was resolved to lend him three thousand fighting men, a certain number of ships, and even to supply him with a sum of money.

Richard had fitted out a large squadron of ships, to oppose any attempts Henry might make to land in England; but having notice of his flight from Brittany, and being assured from the court of France that they had very little inclination to assist his enemy, he thought it needless to incur the expence of maintaining a fleet, and ordered it be laid up in the beginning of the summer of 1485. This ill-timed measure proved the usurper's ruin; for the earl of Richmond, resolving to embrace this opportunity, solicited the French ministry with such importunity to put their last resolves in his favour into execution, that they at last agreed to his request, not from any belief that his enterprize would succeed, but as imagining it to be for the interest of France to stir up dissensions in England: they, however, demanded hostages of him, as a security for the repayment of their expences; and the earl, who had some reason to suspect the fidelity and attachment of the marquis of Dorset, took an occasion to leave him, together with sir John Bouchier, as his hostages at the French court.

Every thing being nearly adjusted, the earl set out for Rouen, that he might be nearer at hand for equipping his small squadron. At length, having mustered all his troops, both English and French, he put to sea on the first day of August, from Harfleur, in Normandy, and landed, on the seventh day of that month, in Milford Haven, expecting to be there joined by the friends and followers of his uncle Jasper, earl of Pembroke, and sir Rice ap Thomas; but they not being in readiness, he continued his march next day to Haverfordwest, where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants.

But it is more than probable that he would have met with insuperable difficulties in his enterprize, had it not been for the unaccountable indolence and security of Richard. This prince, who, on all other occasions, was the most active man in nature, did not think it worth his while to exert any great efforts against so despicable an enemy as Henry appeared to be; but contented himself with sending orders to sir Walter Herbert to raise the militia of the county, and drive out the invaders, which he imagined was a very easy matter: nor was it here alone, but almost in every step that he afterwards took, that Richard appears to have contradicted the natural sagacity for which he was before remarkable; he had, indeed, on news of the intended invasion, marched to Nottingham, a place situated near the centre of the kingdom, and convenient enough as well for the rendezvous of his northern forces, as for dispatching parties to any quarter where the enemy should appear; but he betrayed such strong symptoms of his mistrusting his principal officers, that sir Thomas Bouchier and sir Walter Hungerford, with several other persons of rank, went over to the earl of Richmond, who was not without his inquietudes.

He had no sooner landed than he dispatched messengers to his friends in the different parts of the country, desiring them to join him on his march towards London, for which capital he intended to push with all haste. Accordingly, making but a short stay at Haverfordwest, he set out for Shrewsbury, where he intended to cross the Severn; while he was on the road, he was joined by sir Richard Griffith, sir Walter Herbert, and sir Rice ap Thomas, who had gotten together a strong body of troops, under pretence of opposing Henry of Richmond, thereby to blind the emissaries of Richard; and the whole country supplying him in his march with all necessaries, the earl arrived in a few days at Shrewsbury, where he was received without opposition. Here sir Gilbert Talbot, with his ward the young earl of Shrewsbury, then a minor, joined him with two thousand men, tenants of that nobleman.

But Henry's chief dependence was upon Thomas, lord Stanley, who had a very great interest in Cheshire and Lancashire, as his son George Stanley, lord Strange, had in Shropshire, and his brother, sir William Stanley, chamberlain of North Wales, which was subject to his command. The lord Stanley enjoyed under Richard the great posts of steward of the household and constable of England; but having married Margaret, countess of Richmond, the young earl's mother, she had even won him over to her son's party; and when Richard went to Nottingham, lord Stanley had asked leave to visit his house and family, from which he had long been absent. As Richard had some jealousy of him, on his wife's account, he insisted that he should leave his son George at court, as hostage for his fidelity, and then gave him permission to go into Lancashire.

Stanley employed the time of his stay there in levying a body of five thousand men, on pretence of assisting Richard, and marched with them to Lichfield, as if to oppose the invaders; but, upon notice of Henry's arrival at Shrewsbury, he sent his brother William Stanley to him privately, to assure the earl that he would join him with all his forces, as soon as he could take such a step without too far risking the life of his son, the lord Strange, whom he had left in the usurper's hands. Accordingly Stanley, not to give the tyrant any umbrage, marched to Atherstone, while the earl went and took possession of Lichfield.

Richard, finding that the earl of Richmond was daily joined by many noblemen, and other persons of distinction, thought it was high time to set forward in person to oppose his progress: he accordingly sent orders to the duke of Norfolk, his son the earl of Surry, and sir Robert Brackenbury, to march immediately, with all their followers, and join him at Nottingham; and his whole army being assembled, to the number of twelve thousand men, he ordered them to march for Leicester, putting himself at their head, and doing all the duties of an able general. Richmond, on the king's approach, quitted Lichfield, and, agreeable to measures concerted with the lord Stanley and his brother sir William, directed his route to Leicester, where he resolved to hazard a general engagement. Arriving the next morning at Tamworth, he was joined by sir John Savage, sir Brian Sandford, sir Simon Digby, and many others; the same day he privately visited the lord Stanley, at Atherstone: and, on the morrow, being informed that Richard had marched from Leicester to give him battle, he resolved to meet him half way. On the twenty-second of August the two armies came in sight of each other at Bosworth, a place rendered famous in history by the battle which terminated the dispute between the houses of York and Lancaster.

Richard's army, as we have already observed, consisted of twelve thousand men, well accoutered and trained to martial discipline: the command of the van he conferred on the duke of Norfolk, and he himself took post in the centre, with a crown upon his head, either as a mark of distinction, or as a challenge to his adversary the earl of Richmond, who had not above five thousand men. He drew up his army likewise in two lines, of which the earl of Oxford headed the first, and himself the second; sir Gilbert Talbot commanded the right wing, and sir John Savage the left: between the two armies was a morass, which the earl left on his right hand, to secure him on that side, and in so doing he had the sun at his back and in the face of the enemy.

Whilst the two armies were preparing for battle, the lord Stanley, who had till then continued at Atherstone, came and posted himself with four thousand men, on a piece of ground fronting the interval between the two armies; while his brother, sir William Stanley, with three thousand, stood facing him on the other side. Richard, suspecting Stanley's design, sent him orders to join his army: but the lord Stanley returning an equivocal answer, Richard, enraged at his treachery, would instantly have struck off the head of his son, the lord Strange, had he not been dissuaded from that resolution by some of his best officers, who represented to him, that such an act would be of no advantage to him, and might provoke Stanley and his brother to join the foe, though perhaps their intention might at present be to remain neuter, and declare for the victor. Richard gave way to this remonstrance, though, as his apologist, Buck, observes, he certainly committed a capital error in leaving the two brothers to act as they should think proper, his army being equal in number to that of Richmond and the two Stanleys put together; he ought to have posted two bodies opposite to the brothers, with orders to attack them if they should attempt to join the enemy, while he himself with the remainder of his forces might have given battle to Henry.

Every thing being now ready for the bloody conflict, both armies moved, and the battle began with a general discharge of arrows; after which they advanced to close combat. The duke of Norfolk, extending his lines, made a motion to enclose the left wing of the earl's army; to prevent which the earl of Oxford fell with great fury upon Norfolk's division, but in so doing was very near being hemmed in himself; which being perceived by the lord Stanley, who had till then continued neuter, he advanced, and falling in with the earl of Oxford's line, secured his flank, and stood ready to receive the front of the king's first line. This motion caused the duke of Norfolk to halt, in order to close his line, which occasioned some moments of cessation in the fight; but Norfolk soon advanced to the charge again with more fury than ever, and would have found a great deal of bloody work for his adversaries, had not sir William Stanley at that very instant, with three thousand men, flanked the right of the king's first line so critically, that they were driven back upon the main body; but the duke of Norfolk having strengthened the second ranks, a most terrible carnage ensued.

In the mean time Richard, finding himself thus deceived by the two Stanleys, collected all his force, and perceiving Henry at a small distance, advanced eagerly, at the head of a chosen body of men, to attack him, in hopes of deciding by his death the fate of the battle and of empire; and such were his spirits, activity, and address, that nothing could withstand his fury, and he quickly opened a way to his rival, after having with his own hands slain sir William Brandon, Henry's standard-bearer, and father to Charles Brandon, afterwards duke of Suffolk, and unhorsed sir John Cheney, an officer distinguished for his strength and dexterity. Henry with all his resolution was appalled at the sight of Richard's superior prowess; he would gladly have declined encountering so formidable an adversary, but there was now no retreating; Richard called aloud to him to pay the forfeit of his treason, and rebellious invasion of his realm; he pressed on him with a fury that added double terror to his words: all Henry could do, all he sought to do, was to keep him at his sword's point, till some of his followers coming up, preserved him for a fairer fortune.

While Richard was thus nobly employed in the centre of the battle, the rest of his troops, dispirited at the conduct of the two Stanleys, and not knowing whom to trust, stood in a stupid inactivity, blind to the example, and unanimated by the presence, of their valiant leader. The earl of Northumberland's men, by their commander's orders, threw down their arms, and gave Richmond's soldiers leave to mow down whole ranks: in a word, the rout of Richard's army became general, while he, finding it in vain to attempt to rally his dispersed troops, seeing the duke of Norfolk killed, and his son the earl of Surry a prisoner, the lord Ferrers of Chartley, sir Richard Radcliffe, sir Robert Brackenbury, sir William Conyers, sir Richard Clendon, and many of his bravest officers dead upon the field, and either scorning to endure the disgrace of an overthrow, or dreading the thought of falling alive into the hands of his enemy, rushed into the midst of the battle, where he soon fell, overpowered with numbers, after having achieved exploits that would have done eternal honour to his memory, if exerted in any other cause.

The death of the king put an end to the battle, which had lasted only two hours, during which time Richard's van alone bore the whole brunt of the action, so that there were not slain on the spot above two thousand men on his side. The earl of Richmond's loss did not exceed one hundred. Richard's body was exposed to a thousand indignities as it lay on the field; it was stripped by the brutal and revengeful soldiers of Henry's army, then thrown, naked as it was, across an horse, and sent to Leicester, where it was buried, without any ceremony, in the Grey Friars church in that town. His crown, being found in the field, was brought to the lord Stanley, who placing it upon Richmond's brows, hailed him at the same time king, in presence of all the army, who rent the air with repeated acclamations of Long live Henry VII. king of England!

Of Richard's surviving adherents, the earl of Northumberland surrendered himself to the conqueror, who easily forgave him; the earl of Surry was sent prisoner to the Tower, from whence he was afterwards released. Catesby, the infamous tool of Richard's arts and ambition, being discovered in his hiding-place, was taken prisoner, and lost his head next day at Leicester. The lord viscount Lovel, with the two Staffords, Humphrey and Thomas, all of them hated because of their attachment to Richard, escaped from the battle; and the earl of Richmond, with right policy, received into pardon, or to favour, all who submitted.

What has been already exhibited of the character of Richard, in the history of this and the three preceding reigns, makes it almost impossible to add to it without running into tautology : thus much, however, we may say of him as a king, that, abating his cruelties in the pursuit of the crown, and the unjust measures he used afterwards to keep it, he certainly shewed a disposition for government not inferior to that of the most virtuous princes antiquity can boast. Lord Verulam says of him, that he was in military virtue approved, jealous of the honour of the English nation, and an excellent lawgiver ; of this, indeed, many of his statutes afford irrefragable proofs ; they are, in general, full of equity and humanity, and though passed in all the confidence of power and pride of conquest, in a juncture too often employed by usurpers to trample on the liberties of a nation, to gratify their revenge or avarice, they are evidently calculated for the public good, and excellently adapted to preserve the ease, quiet, and rights of the subject. Upon the whole, we cannot use too much caution in giving our assent to what historians of the Lancastrian party have written against this prince, who, though undoubtedly bad, was not perhaps so detestable as has been represented ; nor should the calumnies with which his memory has been loaded (some of which we have attempted to disprove in the course of these sheets) by those whose interest it was, under his successors, to blacken his character to the utmost, efface the just praise due to Richard for his excellent laws, and his constant application to see justice impartially administered, and good order established in all parts of his kingdom.

His personal character, like his political one, has been industriously handed down to us by writers, who chose to court the favour of Henry and his posterity, in as odious colours as possible. The surname of Crookback has been given him on account of his supposed deformity ; and we are told that one of his arms was withered and useless ; that he was born with long hair, with teeth ; in a word, a spectre of a man : and yet there want not historians of undoubted veracity, who had opportunities of seeing him, and ancient pictures drawn of him, that shew the contrary, and that the whole of his deformity amounted to no more than that he was low of stature, and thick-set, like his father, whom he much resembled in his face, which was comely, though stern and warlike.

Richard III. was the last of the Anjouin race, surnamed Plantagenet, which had possessed the crown of England for the space of three hundred and thirty years ; but he was not the last male of that family in England, for the earl of Warwick, son to his brother Clarence, was still alive, and the only remaining branch of the numerous posterity of the third Edward, which had been almost totally extinguished in the civil war ; a war which had raged for thirty years, and was finally determined by the battle of Bosworth, after having cost the lives of above one hundred thousand Englishmen, including a great number of the princes of the houses of York and Lancaster.

Richard left but one natural son, surnamed John of Gloucester, a minor, whom he had appointed governor of Calais, Guisnes, and all the Marches of Picardy belonging to the crown of England ; and a natural daughter, Catherine Plantagenet, who was contracted in marriage to William Herbert, earl of Huntingdon, but died before she was of age for consummation. Carte tells us, that there is preserved in the family of the earls of Winchelsea an account of a natural son of Richard's (most probably John of Gloucester above-mentioned), who lived at Eastwell, in Kent, a manor belonging to that family, in a private, austere, and devout manner, to a very great age, esteemed by all, though unknown till a little before his death, when he satisfied the curiosity of the ancestors of that noble family.

HENRY VII. First King of ENGLAND of the Name of TUDOR, and Uniter of the two Houses of YORK and LANCASTER. A. D. 1485.

BEFORE we can introduce the reader with advantage to the events which we are now to describe, it is necessary that we should collect the several parts of Henry of Richmond's genealogy, and his title in point of blood to the crown of England, in which we shall follow the most approved writers on this subject.

In the first place then it is to be observed, that the root of Henry's family was John of Ghent, duke of Lancaster, fourth son to Edward III. This prince was thrice married :

First to Blanche of Lancaster, by whom he had a daughter, Philippa, married to John I. king of Portugal ; a second daughter, named Elizabeth, married to John Holland, duke of Exeter ; and a son, named Henry, afterwards the fourth of that name king of England, whose male descendants became extinct in the person of Henry VI.

The second wife of John of Ghent was Constance, princess of Castile and Leon, who bore him Catherine, married to Henry III. king of Castile, who had a numerous issue, both male and female ; and from this marriage it is supposed that Philip II. of Spain exhibited as being prior to the house of Somerset from John of Ghent, the author of the Lancaster family.

The last wife of John of Ghent was Catherine, widow of sir Otter Swinford : this lady had lived in adultery with John of Ghent, and while in that state bore him four children, John Beaufort, duke of Somerset ; Henry Beaufort, the cardinal ; Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter ; and Joan Beaufort, countess of Westmoreland. John Beaufort had issue John, duke of Somerset, who left a daughter Margaret, who was married to Edmund Tudor, of Hadham, earl of Richmond, whose eldest son was Henry, earl of Richmond, whom we have just seen defeat and kill the tyrant Richard.

Whoever looks on this genealogical deduction with the slightest attention, must perceive two very strong objections against any manner of right which Henry, earl of Richmond, could pretend, in point of blood, to the crown of England. The first was the allowed priority of right which was in the house of York, and had been declared by repeated acts of the legislature: the second was the illegitimacy of all the children born of John of Ghent's third marriage. The answers to those objections were as follow.

First, that though the right of blood next to Edward III. the common author of both families, was undoubtedly in the house of York, yet that the family of Lancaster having, as well as that of York, been recognized on the throne by repeated acts of the legislature, which deprived the house of York of all right, both before and after that house put in its claim, therefore the parliamentary right of the house of Lancaster was prior to, and stronger than, the house of York; especially as the last house had been attainted, and, when restored, was restored only to a capacity of succeeding to its hereditary estates, without mention of the crown. As to the second objection, that of illegitimacy, the favourers of the house of Lancaster urged, that the illegitimacy of the family of Lancaster, by dame Swinford, had been removed by letters patent from Richard II.

To those answers it was replied, that Henry IV. and his descendants, who had been kings, were no other than usurpers upon the rights of an unoffending family, as we have already seen in discussing the question of the rights of the two houses. It was likewise urged, that the parliamentary right was as strongly established for the house of York, both before and after the accession of Edward IV. as it ever had been for the house of Lancaster. The reply to the second answer, viz. on the point of illegitimacy, was, as is true, that an express exception was made in the charter of legitimation, which provided that the heirs of John of Ghent by dame Swinford might succeed to any estate or honours whatsoever, the regal dignity excepted.

This is the true state of the case of Henry VII's famous hereditary right to the crown of England, a right which he himself thought so weak, that, as he had thought fit before his enterprize, to strengthen his claim by a matrimonial union with the house of York, he now resolved to imitate the precedent set him by Edward IV. and Richard III. in accepting the military and popular recognitions, by which he had been, in the field of battle, declared king, and to act as such before any formal coronation. In the mean time he thought it necessary to take such precautions as might defeat or prevent any opposition to his measures.

With this view he ordered sir Robert Willoughby to convey Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, son and heir to George, duke of Clarence, an innocent young prince then only ten years of age, to the Tower, where he was kept a close prisoner, and excluded from all intercourse or correspondence with others. The princess Elizabeth, who had likewise been detained in a kind of honourable confinement by Richard, in the castle of Sheriff Hutton, in Yorkshire, was brought from thence to London, and lodged with her mother. The young lady seems to have been entirely passive, and indifferent whether she was destined to the bed of Richard or Richmond.

Henry next, having given the necessary orders concerning the disposition and march of his army, set out for London, which he entered on the twenty-seventh of August, attended by the magistracy and the companies, who met him at Shoreditch: the citizens, however, were somewhat displeased at his passing through the streets in a close chariot, so that he could not be seen like their former kings, who always made their entrance on horseback. He repaired directly to St. Paul's church, where he offered up the standards he had taken, and ordered Te Deum to be sung; after which he retired to his lodging at the bishop's palace.

And now, to remove all umbrages, the very day after his arrival at London, he assembled the chief nobility at the bishop's palace, and solemnly swore to marry the princess Elizabeth. This step was the more necessary, as a report had been industriously spread, that he had entered into a contract of marriage with Anne, daughter and heiress of Francis duke of Brittany; but, as he had an unconquerable aversion to the house of York, he could not bear the thought of reigning in right of his wife, descended from that family, and therefore, though he firmly resolved to perform his engagement, yet his intention was to delay his marriage until after his coronation, that he might appear to reign by his own claim, and his marriage seem a measure taken to conciliate the affection of his subjects rather than a giving him any right to the crown.

But, lest the people should grow cool, and require the performance of this or some other obligations before his coronation, he hurried on that ceremony as fast as possible. It was, however, delayed for some days by an epidemical disorder, which broke out about the end of September, and was, from its symptoms, termed the sweating sickness. This disease, which was till then altogether unknown, threw the patients into a prodigious sweat, and carried them off in four-and-twenty hours; those that died not within that space, were almost sure of recovering: happily it lasted not above a month, but in that time it swept away an infinite number of persons, before the manner of cure and attendance was known*. Hall tells us, that two mayors and six aldermen of London died of it within a week.

Henry employed the intermediate time in rewarding the services of several of his faithful friends and adherents: John de Vere, earl of Oxford, was made constable of the Tower and keeper of the lions there; Jasper, earl of Pembroke, uncle to the king, and the tutor and guardian of his tender years, was created duke of Bedford; the lord Stanley, earl of Derby; sir Edward Courtney, earl of Devonshire; and the following gentlemen were made bannerets†, sir Gilbert Talbot, sir John

* The method of cure was to keep the patient neither too hot nor too cold, with temperate cordials, which, without too much increasing the heat, assisted nature in expelling the humours that caused this extraordinary sweating. Bac. Comp. Hist.

† This was an ancient order of knights, or feudal lords, who possessing several large fees, led their vassals to battle under their own flag, when summoned thereto by the king.

This order is certainly most honourable, as it never was conferred but upon some heroic action performed in the field. Anciently there being but two kinds of knights, great and little, the first were called bannerets, the second bachelors; the first composed of the upper, and the second the middle nobility.

In France they are said to transmit their degree to their posterity: but in England it dies with them. We have had none of this order created in England since the time of king Charles I. so that this order is now become extinct among us.

The form of the banneret's creation was this; on a day of battle, the candidate presented his flag to the king, or general, who cutting off the train, or skirt thereof, and making it a square, returned it again; the proper banner of bannerets, who, from hence, are sometimes called knights of the square flag.

Cheney, sir William Stonar, sir William Troutback, sir John Mortimer, sir Richard Crosby, sir John Fortescue, sir Edward Bedingfield, sir Thomas Cooksey, sir James Baskerville, sir Humphrey Stanley, and sir Richard de la Bere. At the same time the office of high-steward, for the king's coronation, was put in commission, and the commissioners for executing it were, Jasper, duke of Bedford, the earls of Oxford, Derby, and Nottingham, the lord Fitz Walter, Thomas Mason, master of the rolls, sir Thomas Brian, chief-justice of the King's Bench, sir Humphrey Hartley, chief-baron of the Exchequer, and sir Richard Croft, treasurer of the household. Henry's next care was to issue a proclamation, importing that he had agreed to a truce for one year with the king of France, a circumstance that greatly contributed to his interests in England; which was the more inclined to submit to his government, as his title was owned by so powerful a court, even before it was acknowledged by the English parliament.

The late malady having ceased entirely towards the latter end of October, and the necessary preparations being made for the purpose, Henry was crowned, with great pomp and solemnity, on the thirtieth of October, by cardinal Bouchier, archbishop of Canterbury. The ceremony of his coronation was attended with the exhibition of a pomp till then unknown in England; I mean a body-guard, which Henry then instituted: it consisted of fifty archers, called yeomen, under the command of a captain, to be in continual attendance upon his person; thus covering with the pretence of grandeur, a prudent precaution which in all likelihood he thought indispensably necessary for his own safety: the utmost care, however, was taken that this institution should not be considered as personal to the king, but a compliment to his successors, whose state it was to enhance, and the unsuspecting, or rather unthinking, people swallowed every plausible pretext †.

Henry having thus seized not only the seat but the reins of government, now ventured upon a parliament, which met in his name (the highest act of authority which denominates a king of England) at Westminster, on the seventh of November, which entailed the crown upon him; not by way of recognition, or ordinance, but in the manner of settlement, enacting, "That the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and abide in him and the heirs of his body:" and this statute was afterwards confirmed by the pope's bull, in which at the same time the titles of descent and conquest were mentioned.

The act of settlement or succession being passed, another point came under consideration, which proved not a little embarrassing: some of the most considerable members of the present assembly had been attainted, as well as Henry himself, in the reigns of Edward IV. and Richard III. and a motion being made for annulling the sentences of attainder against Henry's adherents, it was alleged, that those persons could not, with any appearance of justice sit as judges in their own cause. This point was therefore submitted to the arbitration of the judges, who, supporting the authority of parliament and the legality of the acts of the house of York, gave it as their opinion, "That the knights and burgeses attainted by the course of law, should forbear to come to the house till a law was made for a reversal of their attainders*."

Another debate arose concerning the king himself, who had been denounced a traitor and rebel by an authentic act of parliament; this point being likewise referred to the same arbitration, the judges unanimously agreed, "That the crown takes away all defects and stops in blood, and that from the time the king did assume the crown, the fountain was cleared, and all attainders and corruption of blood discharged†." Thus Henry found himself strengthened on the one side by a title de facto, and on the other by a title de jure. This matter being settled, an act passed for reversing the attainder of one hundred and seven persons‡: this was followed by distinct bills in favour of particular persons, restoring them in blood, and to the enjoyment of their estates.

But it is not easy to conceive by what law, or with what pretence of reason, those who fought in Bosworth field on Richard's side, against the earl of Richmond, could be charged with high-treason; yet, besides Richard himself, John Howard, duke of Norfolk, his son the earl of Surry, the lords Lovel, Zouch, and Ferrers of Chartley, sir Walter and sir James Harrington, sir Humphrey Stafford, sir William Berkeley, and twenty other gentlemen were attainted, and all their lands declared forfeited. This proceeding seemed little calculated to promote that union between the two houses of York and Lancaster, which was the principal thing proposed in the marriage of Henry and Elizabeth: besides, how are we to reconcile the attainder of Richard with the decision of the judges in the case of Henry, that the actual possession of the crown took away all defaults, and discharged all attainders; unless we are to suppose such attainder meant the forfeitures and treasons by Richard committed before he was possessed of the crown?

Henry, having thus at once gratified his revenge and his avarice, for the money arising from the confiscations amounted to such an immense sum, that he had no occasion to ask a supply this session, thought proper to sweeten the late act of severity in the parliament, by an act of clemency in the prerogative, and published a general pardon in favour of all those who had borne arms against him, provided they would submit themselves within a limited time; and immediately a great number left their sanctuaries and took the oath of allegiance. Some other acts of royal favour passed likewise. About the same time the lord Chandos, a native of Brittany, and one of Henry's companions during his exile, was created earl of Bath; sir Giles d'Aubeney was made a baron, by the title of lord d'Aubeney; and sir Robert Willoughby was made lord Brooke; while Edward Stafford, son to the late duke of Buckingham, was restored to all his father's honours and estates, which had been confiscated by the usurper Richard.

On the tenth of December, the last day of the session, the house of commons thought fit to address the king as he sat upon the throne, that he would be pleased to marry the princess Elizabeth without delay, that he might have heirs of his body. This address was no sooner heard by the lords spiritual and temporal, than, all rising up from their seats, and making each a profound reverence before the throne, they made the same request. Henry promised to gratify them in consummating the marriage, and the two houses were prorogued to the twenty-third of January next following, having first repealed the act of Richard III. for settling the crown upon that prince, and ordered the copy of it on record to be taken off the roll of parliament and burnt, the two houses declaring by this method their utter detestation of that act, on account of its bastardizing the children of Edward IV.

As soon as the parliament was dissolved, Henry sent into France Oliver King, archdeacon of Oxford, with money to repay king Charles what he had lent him, and his charges in fitting out the fleet which brought him to England; whereupon the marquis of Dorset and sir John Bourchier, left as hostages at Paris*, had leave to return home. At the same time Henry impowered his envoy to prolong the truce with France, if he found Charles and his council inclined to such a measure.

In the beginning of the year 1486, Henry settled his privy-council, to which he called John Morton, bishop of Ely, lately returned from Flanders, and Richard Fox†, of whose abilities and attachment he had long experience, particularly the former, whom he soon after advanced to the metropolitanical dignity of Canterbury, and made him lord-chancellor of England; and the latter he made bishop of Exeter, from whence he afterwards translated him to the see of Winchester, the richest bishopric in England. These two prelates, with Urswick the king's chaplain, were generally employed in the most important commissions, embassies, and negociations.

On the eighteenth of January Henry performed his engagement to the nation and to the house of York, by solemnly espousing the princess Elizabeth, on which occasion the people expressed the greatest demonstrations of joy.

Henry's first political measure this year, was to perfect what had been in part begun by his predecessor, the abolishing all liveries and retainers: for this purpose he appointed sir Humphrey Starkey, sir William Norris, and others, his commissioners for calling before them any man under the degree of a baron, and administering to them the following oath, which I shall insert as it is to be found in the records, that the reader may form a suitable idea of the many abuses which had so long disturbed the inward peace of our country.

"Ye shall swear, that ye, from henceforth, shall not retain, aid, nor comfort any excommunicate person, murderer, or felon, or person outlawed for felony, by you known so to be; nor any such person lett [hinder] to be attached or taken therefore, by the order of the law; nor retain any man by indenture, or oath, or your livery, sign, or token, contrary to the law; nor any maintenance, umbrance, riots, or unlawful assemblers make, or cause to be made, or assent thereto.

"Nor shall ye lett, nor cause to be letted, the execution of any of the king's writs or precepts, directed to such lawful ministers and officers as ought to have the execution of the same; nor let [admit] any man to bail or mainprize, knowing and deeming him to be a felon, upon your honour and worship. So God help you and all saints."

This was the first mortal blow which the feudal system received, though it had been much abridged both of its strength and ornaments.

As the northern counties were most of them warmly attached to the house of York, Henry, to conciliate the affections of the inhabitants to his government, set out, about Easter this year, on a progress into those parts. During his stay at Lincoln he heard that the lord Lovel, the bosom-favourite of the deceased Richard, and his two brothers, Humphrey and Thomas Stafford, who had refused to accept of the general amnesty, had escaped out of Colchester abbey, where they had taken sanctuary ever since the battle of Bosworth; that the two latter had gathered together a force, with which they proposed to attack the city of Worcester; and that the lord Lovel, at the head of three or four thousand men, was advancing to surprize the city of York, in which place there was but too good reason to apprehend that he had correspondents. Henry, upon receiving a confirmation of this news, wisely judged that no time was to be lost to crush this insurrection in its infancy. Accordingly, having enlisted forces in the adjacent counties to the place of his residence, to the number of three thousand, he gave the command of this hastily raised and meanly armed corps to his uncle, the duke of Bedford, with a discretionary power to act as he should see occasion, either by proffers of mercy, or by force of arms: that nobleman executed his commission so well, that in a very short time the rebels under lord Lovel were reduced to obedience: their chief made his escape over sea to the court of the duchess dowager of Burgundy; and the two Staffords hearing of this event, abandoned the siege of Worcester, which they were warmly prosecuting, and, being forsaken by their followers, who accepted the offers of pardon made in the king's name for such as would lay down their arms, took sanctuary in the church of Coldnham, near Abingdon; but the court of King's Bench declaring that the privilege of this place did not extend to traitors, they were dragged from thence; the elder brother, Humphrey, suffered at Tyburn; but the younger, as being supposed under the influence of his senior, had his life given him by Henry's moderation.

Nor was this the only instance Henry had of the great attachment of the English people to Edward IV. and his family; for on his return to London, about Midsummer, he found that the people murmured greatly at his postponing the coronation of Elizabeth his queen, the evident coldness and indifference with which he treated her, and his embracing every opportunity of humbling the friends of the house of York; nay, they went so far as secretly to whisper about, that he had caused the earl of Warwick to be privately put to death in the Tower; and the emissaries of the house of York industriously propagated a report that Richard, second son to Edward IV. had made his escape from the cruelty of his uncle, and was still alive on the continent. The avidity with which these reports were swallowed by the populace, from the disgust they had taken to their new master, whose personal manners were far from being fitted to acquire the affections or gain the hearts of his subjects, encouraged Richard Simon, a priest of Oxford, to devise a scheme equally extravagant and enterprising. He had a pupil called Lambert Simnel †, a youth of uncommon vivacity and extraordinary personal accomplishments, and him he resolved to pass up on the world as Richard, duke of York, the second son of Edward IV. While he was employed in training up this impostor, it was rumoured that Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, had escaped from the ruffians sent to murder him in the Tower, and was concealed somewhere in England. Upon this report Simon immediately changed his plan, and determined that his pupil should personate this young nobleman; a scheme much more extravagant than the other, if we consider that the son of the duke of Clarence had been, after his father's death, honourably maintained in the court of his uncle Edward, until he was eight years of age, and that therefore his person was well known to a great number of people. Notwithstanding this obstacle, Simon continued to instruct his pupil in his new part; and this seems to have taken up the whole year, for we hear nothing of him before the beginning of 1487. We shall therefore leave him to his instructions, and now take a view of the situation of the neighbouring princes of Europe, with whom Henry had connections or concerns, this being absolutely necessary to give us a clear insight into the motives of Henry's conduct, who in his time owed the chief figure he made in Europe to his policy rather than to his arms. We shall begin with the affairs of Brittany.

It has been elsewhere observed, that Peter Landois, favourite of the duke of Brittany, entirely governed that prince, who was old and infirm, and very much impaired in his understanding: several lords of Brittany had made a league against that minister, and intended to seize him; but, having miscarried in their design, were exposed to the vengeance of the favourite, who had caused them all to be condemned to die. In the beginning of the year 1485*, Landois, in the name of the duke his master, levied an army to execute the sentence; and the lords, on their part, took up arms in their defence. While Brittany was thus divided, and the two parties ready to come to a battle, the condemned lords caused it to be represented to those who served Landois, that, in the present affair, the interest of the minister only was concerned, and not that of their common master, the duke; that it was unjust to shed the blood of their fellow-subjects in the quarrel of a man who had notoriously abused his master's confidence; that therefore, to appease at once the troubles of their country, the more natural and readier way than that of arms, would be to rid themselves of the minister, after which not a man would refuse to render due obedience to their sovereign. The lords of the duke's party deeming this expedient very reasonable, were of opinion that it was for the interest of their country and the duke himself, that Landois, the sole cause of the troubles, should be sacrificed to the public good. Landois hearing that the lords of the two armies were contriving something against him, caused a declaration to be drawn, wherein the duke ordered that all persons of his army who held intelligence with the proscribed lords, should be deemed traitors and rebels. But this only served to hasten his ruin; the chancellor, who was in the confederacy against him, refused to seal the declaration, and informed the lords of it, who thereupon determined to carry their scheme into immediate execution: accordingly, without giving him time to take other measures, they went in a body to the palace, and seized Landois in the duke's own apartment, who was forced to deliver him up, on condition they would spare his life: but that was not their intention; on the contrary, they brought him to a speedy trial, and, convicting him of a thousand crimes, made him atone for them on the gallows, before the duke was informed of the sentence. How much soever the duke was troubled at the death of his favourite, he could not refuse granting the lords of the two armies letters of pardon. Thus Brittany would have been restored to her former tranquility, had not the duke imprudently concerned himself with the troubles of the French court, which brought on the ruin of himself and his dukedom. This is what must now be shewn, since it was the occasion of the war which broke out between Charles VIII. and the duke of Brittany, and in which Henry VII. was concerned.

Lewis XI. king of France, dying in the year 1482, left the government of the person of his son and successor, Charles VIII. to his daughter Anne, wife of Peter de Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu. Charles was fourteen years old, and consequently of age, according to the ordinance of Charles V. but as he had been ill educated, and was of a very infirm constitution, the king his father thought him incapable of governing. The moment Lewis XI. was in his grave, Lewis, duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood, refused to acknowledge Anne of Beaujeu for the king's governess, affirming that a woman had no right to meddle with the affairs of the kingdom. The states being assembled at Tours, in January, 1484, ended the dispute by their authority; they confirmed the late king's will, and appointed the duke of Orleans to be president of the council in the king's absence.

Whilst the states of France were assembled, the lords of Brittany made their first attempt upon Landois before-mentioned, which proved unsuccessful. The sentence which was given against them creating a dread of the favourite's revenge, they applied to Anne of Beaujeu, to obtain the king her brother's protection. On the other hand, Landois, seeing his enemies had recourse to the lady Anne, thought he could not do better than rely upon the assistance of the duke of Orleans: to that end he entreated him to come to the court of Brittany, putting him in hopes the duke would give him in marriage Anne, his eldest daughter and presumptive heiress. The duke of Orleans had espoused, against his will, Joanna, daughter of Lewis XI. but had made against this forced marriage a secret protestation, which he meant to use in order to annul it at a more favourable juncture. So, pleased with the hopes Landois had inspired him with, he came to Brittany, where he was extremely caressed. But he could make no long stay there, being obliged to assist at the king's coronation, which was performed in June that year. Probably, whilst he was in Brittany, he concerted measures with the duke and his favourite to disturb the government of Anne of Beaujeu, who was become absolute mistress of the king her brother's person and affairs.

Shortly after, the duke of Orleans forming a league against the court, and retiring to Boisgency, demanded that the states of France might be assembled. He intended to annul the regulation with respect to the government of the king's person: but Anne of Beaujeu caused the king to march against him with such expedition, that he was forced to accept such terms as were prescribed him, because his friends were not yet ready to assist him. By the agreement, the count de Dunois and Longueville, who was considered as his chief adviser, was banished to Asti, in Piedmont, a town belonging to the duke of Orleans, with a command not to stir from thence without the king's express licence.

The duke of Orleans, being thus compelled to dismiss his troops, caused the greatest part to list in the duke of Brittany's army against the condemned lords. On the other hand, Anne of Beaujeu sent likewise to the barons part of the king's troops. The death of Landois, which happened soon after, was not capable of making the duke of Orleans desist from his projects. He stood in need of the duke of Brittany to support him against the court, and even hoped one day to marry his daughter. On the other side the duke of Brittany, having been greatly oppressed by Lewis XI. and knowing Anne of Beaujeu was of the same character, and followed the same maxims, believed he could not do better than rest upon the assistance of the duke of Orleans; therefore, after some negotiations, these two princes formed a league together, into which came John de Châlons, prince of Orange, nephew to the duke of Brittany, the duke of Bourbon, the count de Dunois, the duke of Lorraine, and several other princes and lords. Some time after, the count de Dunois returned into France without leave, and withdrew to his seat at Partenay, in Poictou. The king was yet ignorant of the duke of Orleans's designs; but the count de Dunois's return convincing him some plot was contriving in favour of that prince who was gone to Blois, he sent him a positive order to repair to court. The duke obeyed upon the second summons; but the next day, being informed some ill was intended him, feigned to go a hunting, and retired into Brittany, whither he was quickly followed by the prince of Orange and the count de Dunois. This was in the beginning of the year 1486. We must now see what passed in the Netherlands.

Since the death of Mary of Burgundy, Maximilian of Austria, her husband, had been involved in troubles on account of the guardianship of her son Philip, who became sovereign of the Low Countries upon the demise of the duchess his mother: Brabant, Holland, and Zealand had willingly received him for guardian; but Flanders and Hainault refused to obey him as such.

The obstinacy of the Flemings obliged Maximilian to make peace with Lewis upon the following terms: that the dauphin Charles, son of Lewis, should marry Margaret, daughter of Maximilian, as soon as they attained a certain age: that Margaret should have for dower Artois, Franche Comté, Maçon, and Auxerre, and be educated at the court of France. Pursuant to this treaty, Lewis kept those provinces which he had already seized, and took Margaret home, till the marriage should be consummated.

In 1483, Maximilian successfully made war upon the Liegeois. That same year Hainault owned him for guardian of his son Philip.

In the year 1484, the Flemings still persisting in their refusal to acknowledge Maximilian for guardian, appointed governors for Philip, of whom Adolphus de Cleves, lord of Ravenstein, was the chief. This obstinacy occasioned a war between them and Maximilian, in which Charles VIII. took part by assisting the Flemings.

This war ended in January, 1485, in a treaty, importing that the Flemings should acknowledge Maximilian for guardian of his son, upon the express condition that he should not remove him from Flanders till of age. The treaty being signed, Maximilian made his entry into Ghent; where, a few days after, a sedition was raised, but which was happily appeased. During the rest of the year the Low Countries enjoyed a tranquility which afforded Maximilian time to take a journey into Germany, to be elected king of the Romans.

I shall close this digression with the affairs of Scotland. James III. king of Scotland, had been extremely complaisant to Richard III. A truce had been agreed upon to last between the two kingdoms till the twenty-ninth of September, 1487; and a marriage, as we have already seen, was concluded between the duke of Rothesay, prince of Scotland, and the duke of Suffolk's daughter*, which project fell with Richard's death. Upon the revolution in favour of Henry, the Scots took the opportunity of the unsettled state of his affairs to besiege and take the castle of Dunbar, which had been put into the hands of the English by the duke of Albany†. Henry's situation, and the important affairs which engaged his attention in the beginning of his reign, not permitting him to resent this breach of the truce in a proper manner, by declaring war against the Scots, he thought proper to try the milder methods of negotiating, and appointed ambassadors to treat with the bishop of Aberdeen and other commissioners named by king James. As Henry was then under high obligations to the French court, the negotiation met with no difficulty, and, on the third of July this year (1486), a cessation of arms was agreed upon, to last between the two kingdoms till the third of July, 1489.

Henry, during all these incidents abroad, took no other concern than that of keeping well with every power, without declaring openly for any: but the king's favourite plan seems to have been to take advantage of the jarring interests which prevailed on the continent, for improving the trade and commerce of England, as will be more particularly shewn when we come to consider the state of Commerce under this reign.

The lord Bacon, in his Life of Henry VII. has fixed the time of the birth of Henry's son Arthur to the twentieth of September this year; which, if true, supposes him to be born in the eighth month. As Henry affected to be the fountain of British as well as English royal blood, he gave the name of Arthur to the young prince in memory of the renowned Arthur, the British hero.

Cardinal Bouchier, archbishop of Canterbury, dying about this time, Henry promoted his favourite and chief minister, Morton, bishop of Ely, to that see. In the course of this year also, Stanley, earl of Derby, was created lord high-constable of England, with a salary of one hundred pounds per annum; and the lord d'Aubeney was made governor of the town and castle of Guisnes and the Marches thereof: and pope Innocent VIII. who was a great friend to Henry, sent the cardinal Imola as his legate a latere into England, with a bull confirming the act of succession, and declaring "the throne of England to belong to him both by right of war, by succession, by the election of prelates, nobles, and people, by the decrees, statutes, and ordinances of parliament;" and also granting a dispensation for his marriage with the princess Elizabeth, to whom Henry was related in the fourth degree of consanguinity*, which, according to the rules of the canon law in those days, was an impediment not to be removed without a papal dispensation: "sentence of excommunication was also denounced against all rebels and disturbers of the king or his peace, or any who should presume to raise any disputes concerning the succession to the throne."

It should seem that Henry had solicited the interposition of the court of Rome in this case, a step which is not only inexcusable in him, on account of the meanness, but as it was a direct breach of the statute of Præmunire, of which the English were so jealous; though Henry, apprehensive of the resentment of the people, had taken care to have it said in the bull, that the pope granted it of his own pure motion, and without any previous request; a clause evidently false: but we shall soon see that this bull was not capable of preventing the king's being frequently molested. The English were no longer, as formerly, such bigots as to imagine the pope's authority could give Henry a title which he really had not, and which they considered as truly existing in the princess Elizabeth alone, and transmitted to him by his marriage with her.

In a word, all Henry's precautions could neither awe nor soothe the spirit of disaffection to his government. The year 1487 was ushered in with many commotions in different parts of the kingdom, which gave occasion to the erection of the court of Star-chamber, of whose authority and powers the reader will find a succinct account in the article of Laws, following this reign. But Henry's peace received a mortal wound by the tidings of the success which Simon and his pupil Lambert had met with in the prosecution of their imposture, which we shall now follow through its several steps. Simon, the instructor and preceptor of this young adventurer, knowing that Ireland had been long attached to the house of York through all its branches, determined (most probably too by the advice of the queen-mother, or those who were in the secret of Simnel's imposture) that he should make his first appearance in that island, as earl of Warwick. Accordingly he carried him over thither, in the spring of this year, where he found the people disposed to give him such a reception as he could wish, the memory of Clarence, who had been their lord-lieutenant, being still adored by them: the archbishops of Armagh and Dublin, and in short almost the whole body of the Irish nobility, owned Lambert for the earl of Warwick, and he was with unanimous consent brought to the castle of Dublin. We cannot pretend, at this distance, to account for the cause, but it is certain that Henry's title and person were so much disrelished in Ireland, that all this was effected without the smallest opposition, the city of Waterford excepted. Henry, indeed, had not taken sufficient precaution in the choice of his officers and administration in Ireland: he had appointed his uncle Jasper, duke of Bedford, lord-lieutenant; but that nobleman had been prevented by some accident from passing over to take possession of his charge, which was executed by Gerald Fitz Gerald, earl of Kildare, as his deputy, who, as well as his brother, the lord Thomas Fitz Gerald, then chancellor of Ireland, were avowed partizans of the house of York; and the earl not only suffered our young adventurer to be formally presented to him, but even affected to believe his whole story.

Nothing could give greater disgust to Henry than the news of this successful imposture: he sent to the earl of Kildare, requiring him to come to England; but the earl excused himself. This confirmed Henry in the suspicions he entertained of that nobleman: and, to add to his perplexity, he was assured from good authority, that Margaret, duchess dowager of Burgundy, sister to Edward IV. supplied the pretender both with money and instructions; that the queen dowager herself was deeply in the plot; and that John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, who had been declared presumptive heir to the crown by Richard III. was gone over to Flanders, where he had for some time kept a correspondence with the lord Lovel, then at the duchess of Burgundy's court; and in fine, that the confederacy was spreading every where in England, by means of these persons and their agents.

In this dilemma, Henry called a cabinet-council at Shene, to deliberate on the measures that were to be pursued. The result of this deliberation was the shutting up of the queen-mother in Bermondsey monastery, in Southwark, in order to hinder her from pursuing her intrigues; and the bringing the real earl of Warwick from the Tower, to expose him through all the principal streets of London, as well to invalidate the malicious reports of his having been murdered there, as to convince the many, who personally knew him, of the falshood of the pretender's assertions. This step, my lord Bacon observes, had the desired effect in England; but the Irish, infatuated with their idol, maintained that Henry had substituted a counterfeit, and that the true earl of Warwick was absolutely with them. Another resolution of Henry's council, and which, indeed, proved the most salutary of all, was to issue a general pardon to all offenders, even those guilty of treason not excepted. At the same time orders were given for strictly guarding the sea-coasts towards Flanders and Ireland.

In the mean time the abettors of Simnel's imposture were not idle: the earl of Lincoln and the duchefs of Burgundy having concerted measures with the disaffected nobles of Ireland, it was resolved that Margaret should send over a body of two thousand Germans, all veteran troops, under the command of Martin Schwartz, a brave and experienced officer; and that the earl of Lincoln in person should assist in the expedition: they accordingly took shipping in the month of May, and, after a safe and quick passage, arrived at Dublin. The Irish now imagined themselves so sure of success, that the great officers of state came to a resolution of solemnly crowning Lambert: accordingly a crown was taken from a statue of the Virgin Mary, and placed with great ceremony on the head of the impostor, in the cathedral church of Dublin, who was then proclaimed king, by the name of Edward VI. and it was resolved immediately to carry the war into England, where they imagined they should be assisted by all the friends of the house of York, so as to be able to dethrone the usurper without the least difficulty.

As soon as Henry certainly knew the intention of the rebels, he assembled two armies, the command of which he gave to the duke of Bedford and the earl of Oxford, in order to secure both sides of the island against a descent; and during the winter he made a tour through the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, where he had most reason to fear an invasion, on account of their neighbourhood to the Low Countries. While he was making some stay at St. Edmundsbury, he heard that the marquis of Dorset was on his way to visit him, in order to clear himself of some aspersions that had been cast upon his character; but Henry, not chusing to have any personal interview with him, which was likely to produce only disagreeable reflections on his late conduct towards the queen-mother, sent the earl of Oxford to meet and convey him to the Tower, there to remain till the present danger was over.

Henry had no sooner returned from his northern progress, than he learned, that, notwithstanding all his precautions, the rebels, with their auxiliaries, had found means to land in Lancashire, and that they were commanded by the earls of Lincoln and Kildare, the lord Lovel, and Martin Schwartz. Upon this intelligence he ordered a general rendezvous of his forces at Coventry, which lies in the centre of the kingdom. Thither Henry repaired in person, accompanied by the duke of Bedford and the earl of Oxford, determined to be ready to encounter any attempts of the enemy. The rebels, on their part, with their mock prince, directed their march towards York, in hopes of being joined in their progress by all the enemies of the present government; but, notwithstanding their sanguine hopes, not an Englishman was added to their standard, except a few under sir Thomas Broughton: this was owing as well to the many wise precautions Henry had taken to strengthen himself against the impending storm, as to the people's conviction of Lambert's being an impostor, and their indignation at beholding their vassals the Irish presuming to place a king on the throne of England. The earl of Lincoln, alarmed at this coldness, and apprehending that his army, amounting to eight thousand men, would rather diminish than increase, determined to venture a battle with the first opportunity.

The same reasons that determined the earl, determined Henry also; and, leaving Coventry, he proceeded as far as Nottingham, where being reinforced by six thousand men, under the command of the earl of Shrewsbury and the lord Strange, he advanced, on the sixteenth of June, to Stoke, a village near Newark, where the earl of Lincoln lay encamped on a rising ground, and offered the enemy battle. The earl, in his present situation, could not decline, and therefore readily accepted the challenge; and marching down the hill with great resolution, began a furious conflict, which was maintained with equal valour on both sides for three hours, though the ranks of the Irish were thinned continually by the shot of the English archers, against which they had no defence, being entirely unprovided with any armour of defence: the English under the earl of Lincoln and the lord Lovel, and the Germans under Schwartz, made so noble a resistance, that the greatest part of Henry's vanguard were cut in pieces; but at last the valour of Henry's troops bore down all before it. The Germans, with their brave leader Schwartz, were all slain fighting on the very spot they occupied; a frightful slaughter was made of the Irish, of whom four thousand, with their commander Fitz Gerald, a brother to the earl of Kildare, were killed; the earl of Kildare, with most of Broughton's English likewise fell in the field, as did the earl of Lincoln: the lord Lovel was never more heard of*; but sir Thomas Broughton escaped to his own estate of Witherlack, in Westmoreland, where he afterwards lived and died in obscurity.

Lambert Simnel and his tutor were taken prisoners; and the latter being committed close prisoner to the Tower, was never heard of more. The former, either as being too young to be arraigned and executed, or because Henry was willing to leave him a living testimony of an imposture, in case he might have occasion to deal with any future claimant of the crown, was employed in the servile office of scullion in the king's kitchen, carrying wood, and doing other menial duties; in which it seems he acquitted himself so well, that he was afterwards raised to be one of the king's falconers: an instance of Henry's deep policy, who by this means deprived his rival even of the smallest degree of consequence in the opinion of any thinking person.

Immediately after the battle, the king marched to Lincoln, from whence he proceeded to York; and in this progress severely punished all who had assisted the rebels, or were convicted of having in any wise favoured them. The delinquents were tried partly by commissioners and partly by martial law; but the punishment fell upon their estates only, the king being satisfied with filling his coffers by fines and confiscations. When he had, as he thought, sufficiently fleeced his enemies, he

* The lord Lovel is by some supposed to have been drowned, in attempting to ford the Trent, after the action; others allege that he lost his life in the battle; and a third set pretend that he passed the remainder of his days in a vault or cavern. This last opinion is strengthened by a discovery made, about sixty years ago, at this nobleman's seat at Minster Lovel, near procured a bull from the pope, Innocent VIII. empowering the archbishop of Canterbury to absolve them of the excommunication they had incurred by violating the former bull of settlement; as if he had been tenderly solicitous about the salvation of even those who had sought his downfall.

While Henry resided at York, deputies arrived from Scotland, to terminate some differences concerning the fishery of the river Esk; and the king took this occasion to begin a negociation with James III. the Scottish monarch, to whose court he sent Fox, bishop of Exeter, and sir Richard Edgcombe, to treat of a tripple alliance. The treaty was projected and agreed to by the Scots, on the following terms:

"I. That the high and mighty prince, James Stuart, marquis of Ormond, earl of Ross, and lord Brechin, second son to king James, should marry the right noble lady Catherine, third daughter of Edward IV. late king of England, and sister to the princess Elizabeth, now queen of England.

"II. That the said James, king of Scotland, should marry Elizabeth, late wife to the said king Edward IV.

"III. That James, prince of Scotland, duke of Rothesay, earl of Carrick, &c. should marry another of the daughters of Edward IV.

"IV. That the king of England should cede, for ever, the town and castle of Berwick to the Scots.

"V. That, in order to settle the articles and conditions of the three marriages, a congress should be held at Edinburgh on the twenty-fourth of January ensuing, another in May, and an interview between the two kings some time in July.

"VI. and lastly, That the truce subsisting between the two crowns should be prolonged for thirteen months."

This indenture and convention was so ill relished by the Scottish nobility, that in the ensuing year they formed a conspiracy against their sovereign, and at last fought, defeated, and murdered him in the field.

The king, in his progress through the North, had frequent opportunities to find that his visible partiality against the house of York was the chief root of disaffection to his government, and that the strongest symptom of his partiality was held to be his refusing to admit the queen to be crowned; therefore he determined to remove this subject of complaint, and, on his return to London, caused all the necessary preparations to be made for that purpose: he constituted the duke of Bedford high-steward for the coronation of the queen, which was performed, with the usual solemnity, on the twenty-fifth of November, being then in the twenty-first year of her age, and about two years after her marriage. The marquis of Dorset was at the same time released, without examination or trial; and, towards the end of the year sent, on a solemn embassy to the pope, with advice of the king's marriage, the coronation of the queen, and offers of service and spiritual obedience. Thus Henry endeavoured to make a coalition of all parties, for supporting his government; and it was this conduct that chiefly contributed to give him the great figure he now made in the eyes of foreign princes, whose affairs it is proper we should once more review.

The war still continued in the Low Countries, where the troops of Charles VIII. surprized St.

Omer's and Terouenne; and the inhabitants of Ghent were incited by a nobleman, called Ruffingham, to revolt against Maximilian. By this time Francis II. duke of Brittany, now very old and infirm, having no sons, with the consent of his estates settled the succession upon his two daughters, Anne and Isabel, the last of which dying before her father, Anne became sole heiress of Brittany. Charles VIII. proposed to unite that duchy with France, by marrying this princess; but his scheme was traversed by Lewis, duke of Orleans, to whom, as we have already observed, the duke of Brittany had given an asylum at his court, together with the count de Dunois, and others of that party; and the lords of Brittany, on their sides, entered into a negociation with Charles, though their motives were very different from those by which the French king was actuated. When he concluded the alliance, he thought the treaty would furnish him with an opportunity to make a complete conquest of Brittany, while they hoped his protection would screen them from the resentment and arbitrary designs of their own sovereign. In pursuance of this treaty, Charles, about May, 1487, marched several numerous bodies of forces towards the frontiers of Brittany, and, after reducing Ploermel, Vannes, and Dinant, laid siege to Nantes; but, after the French had lain before it for the space of six weeks, they were compelled to abandon their enterprize by the count de Dunois, who found means to throw into the city a strong body of troops, which had been sent to the assistance of Francis by Maximilian, king of the Romans, who had views of espousing his daughter.

The gaining of the battle of Stoke had given Henry of England so considerable a figure, that the court of France sent a formal embassy to congratulate him on his success, and bespeak his friendship or at least neutrality between them and the court of Brittany. Henry for some time amused the French ambassadors with promises of mediating between them and the duke, alleging that, as he had been under strong obligations both to the king their master and to Francis, gratitude would not permit him openly to side with either against the other. In the mean time, however, he laid the affair before his parliament, who, on taking the matter into deliberation, and perceiving that the true aim of the French court was to annex the duchy of Brittany to their crown, which could not fail of being very injurious to the English interest on the continent, it was resolved that the duke of Brittany should be assisted, and a subsidy was voted for that purpose; but Henry, who had only asked his parliament's advice on that subject in order to get money from them, and having effected his design, never troubled himself about the affairs of Brittany any otherwise than by multiplying embassies, which he well knew would come to nothing.

However, in the spring of the ensuing year, 1488, at the earnest request of the lord Woodville, the queen's uncle, governor of the Isle of Wight, he gave him a tacit permission of transporting a body of four hundred men to the duke's assistance; and he had even the meanness to disavow his knowledge of this transaction, when Charles sent deputies to make complaint of it.

Lewis de la Tremouille, one of the French generals, had at that time invaded Brittany with an army of twelve thousand French, and taken Chateau Briant and Ancennis; he afterwards reduced Fougères, one of the strongest fortresses on the frontiers of that country, and invested St. Aubin du Cormier. The Bretons advancing to the relief of that place, the two armies came to a general engagement, on the twenty-eighth of July, and the French gained the day by the advantage of their cavalry, in which they were much superior: Woodville, with all his English, and about five thousand Bretons, were killed on the spot; the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange were taken prisoners. This victory was followed by the surrender of St. Aubin; Dinant submitted without resistance, and St. Malo's capitulated after a slight defence.

The duke, being now left without any army to oppose the enemy, was obliged to accept such terms as Charles thought fit to impose: these were, that he should dismiss all his foreign auxiliaries, and solemnly promise never to admit any into his country for the future; that the French should retain all the places they had in their possession; and that the duke should not dispose of his daughter in marriage without the consent of the French monarch. This treaty was concluded at Sablé, on the twenty-eighth of August, 1488; and about ten days afterwards the duke of Brittany himself died, leaving his daughter Anne heiress of his dominions. She had, it is true, an excellent council appointed her by her father; but being without troops or money, she was in no condition to resist the French; for Charles, to make good his pretensions, either by force or marriage, upon that duchy, immediately entered it with a stronger army than ever, and, towards the end of this year, made himself master of almost all the Lower Brittany.

As for Maximilian, instead of being in a condition to succour his future father-in-law, he was himself imprisoned at Bruges, and remained in confinement until his father, Frederic the emperor, marched into the Low Countries, at the head of a numerous army, to his relief. He was so intent upon fortifying himself against the mutinous spirit of the Flemings, that, forgetting all his engagements with the duke of Brittany, he sent an envoy to Spain, to demand of Ferdinand and his queen Isabella, their daughter Isabella for himself, and the younger infant, Jane, for his son Philip. Mean while Philip de Cleves, lord of Ravenstein, being chosen general of the inhabitants of Ghent, surprised the city of Brussels, and Maximilian retired to Germany, leaving Albert, duke of Saxony, to command for his son Philip in the Low Countries: and thus was the duke of Brittany totally abandoned by this ally, on whom he had placed so great confidence, and left to sue for peace in the humble manner we have already described. It is now time to attend the domestic affairs of our own country.

In the latter end of the year 1487, Henry summoned a parliament at Westminster, which continued sitting far into the year 1488, and several excellent regulations were enacted therein, all which will be found under their proper heads, and will give the reader an idea of the first steps taken towards establishing the present excellent form of government now existing, which we hope will be as permanent as is natural order or moral obligation. It was in this parliament that the king had a grant of a subsidy towards enabling him to assist the duke of Brittany effectually: it consisted of two fifteenths, besides a poll-tax upon aliens, and an act of resumption; but the rigorous manner in which these aids were levied, occasioned great murmuring, particularly among the inhabitants of Yorkshire and the bishopric of Durham, who, as old partizans of the house of York, hated Henry, and refused to comply with the conditions of the tax, which, they said, was a grievous oppression, especially the tenth penny laid upon every man's lands and goods.

At length these discontents were blown into open rebellion, by the instigation of one John a Chambre, of Yorkshire, a fellow who delighted in sedition and turbulency, and who soon got together a number of dissolute people, ready for any enterprise into which their factious leader chose to carry them. The most immediate object of their rage was the earl of Northumberland, who was lord-lieutenant in those parts, and to whom they had ineffectually applied for a mitigation of the impost, and who had, indeed, made himself particularly odious to the Yorkists by his behaviour at the battle of Bosworth: in short, the insurgents got to such an height, that they broke into the earl's house at Cocksedge, near Thirsk, about eighteen miles from York, and, after rifling the dwelling, dragged the earl out into the open fields, where, after making him go through a thousand barbarous indignities, they completed their revenge by knocking out his brains. Then, putting one sir John Egremont, a factious knight, at their head, they formed a kind of an army, and openly declared that they would march to London, and give battle to Henry.

The king was no sooner informed of this disturbance, than he sent a body of troops against the rebels, under the command of the earl of Surry, whom he had lately released out of the Tower and taken into his favour. That nobleman attacking the insurgents, defeated them at the first onset, and took John a Chambre prisoner, but sir John Egremont made his escape, and fled for refuge to the court of the duchess dowager of Burgundy, the assured asylum to all who declared themselves enemies to Henry Tudor. As a reward for his services, Henry made the earl of Surry his lieutenant in those parts, in the room of the late earl of Northumberland, and sir Richard Tunstall to be first commissioner for collecting the subsidy, which was done without the abatement of one penny.

We will now pursue Henry's great concern on the continent. The guardians of the young duchess of Brittany dreading lest their sovereign and her dominions should fall a prey to the ambitious views of the French monarch, solicited without ceasing the court of England to interpose its succour. At length Henry began to perceive that he had continued his pacific plan too long. The uniting of the duchy of Brittany to the crown of France was an event which the English had great reason to dread; it would deprive them of an ancient and useful ally; it would increase the power of their most formidable enemy; it would raise the maritime power of France to such an height, as in the sequel might prove extremely dangerous; and it would add to the French dominions a country of large extent, abounding with brave soldiers and hardy seamen, and very conveniently situated either for distressing their trade, or keeping them in continual fear of an invasion.

Influenced by these and the like considerations, Henry determined in good earnest to oppose the designs of the French monarch, and support the duchess of Brittany in the possession of her lawful rights. With this view he appointed sir Richard Edgcombe, comptroller of his household, and Dr. Ainsworth, secondary of the privy-seal, his ambassadors to the duchess of Brittany; and they were so assiduous in executing their commission, that, on the tenth of February, 1489, they concluded a treaty offensive and defensive between Henry and that princess, the principal articles of which were as follow.

I. If the king of England, or his successors, should attempt the recovery of Normandy, Guienne, or any other territory, parcel of the kingdom of France, that then the duchess was to assist him to the utmost of her power. This article was recited on the part of the duchess, in case that she, for the like reasons, should carry the war into France.

II. That Henry shall, at his own expence, send six thousand armed men to the defence of the duchess, of whom not more than five hundred were to be employed by him in garrisoning the cautionary towns to be yielded by this treaty, and those troops to serve till the first of November ensuing.

III. That the duchess shall find ships and victualling for transporting the said troops into England; and that she shall repay, in England, the money expended by Henry upon the said six thousand auxiliaries, which were to be embarked at Portsmouth towards the middle of February next ensuing.

IV. That, as soon as the said auxiliaries are landed, the said duchess shall deliver to Henry, or his deputies, two of the following places, and all their revenues, as cautionary for the repayment of the said sum, till it is repaid, viz. Toncloum near Hennebon, Auray, Vannes, Guerrande: in like manner it is provided, that whatever succours the said duchess should afford to Henry, in his prosecution of a war with France, they should be by him paid, or their expences deducted from those of the auxiliaries furnished by him to her. This condition is reciprocal.

V. That the duchess shall swear, and the marshal of Brittany with three others of the principal noblemen to be bound in the same oath, that she will not reclaim any of the said cautionary towns, before the repayment of her whole debt contracted to Henry, which is to be liquidated by commissioners appointed on both sides.

VI. That the duchess shall give to Henry sixteen hostages, to remain on board the English ships until such time two of the fore-mentioned places, well provided in victuals and artillery, are delivered, according to the king of England's option.

VII. That the duchess, the marshal of Brittany, and three or four of her principal noblemen, shall swear that she will contract no marriage with any person, without the consent and approbation of the said king of England, the said noblemen engaging themselves to make good this article.

VIII. That the said duchess shall not agree to any peace, or other alliance or intelligence, with any prince, the kings of the Romans and of Spain excepted, nor with them unless that he (Henry) is included in any treaty made with them by her; and likewise, that she shall agree upon no truce or armistice for more than two months, but as above; nor for that neither without comprehending the king of England in the same. The latter part of this article is likewise reciprocal.

Such were the principal articles of the treaty of Rhedon, so called from the name of the place where it was concluded. It is easy to perceive, that in making this treaty Henry had three different views; first, to prevent Charles VIII. from becoming master of Brittany; secondly, to frighten that monarch into a compliance, by the sending over to Brittany a strong body of forces; his third and chief aim, was to secure the reimbursement of such sums as he might advance for the maintenance of six thousand men for eight months; in all which Henry, agreeable to his established maxim, made his own interest take place of every other consideration: at the same time, in order to strengthen himself more effectually, he concluded a treaty of alliance and commerce with young Philip, duke of Burgundy, son of Maximilian, king of the Romans; another for reviving the ancient alliances with Portugal, and for making that king (John II.) a knight of the Garter; a third, for removing all differences with the king of the Romans; and a fourth, for treating of a marriage between his son Arthur, prince of Wales, and Catherine of Arragon, daughter to Ferdinand, king of Castile, and for reviving the alliances with that court. To give the greater weight to these negotiations, an army was raised by the advice of the parliament, which met again in the beginning of this year, for the support of Brittany, and it was to be commanded by the lord Brooke and sir John Halwell.

The French regency, alarmed at these resolutions of the court of England, sent over the archbishop of Sens, to expostulate with Henry on the part he was about to act; but the latter, with his usual caution and policy, pretended that he was only an instrument in the hands of his parliament, in taking part with the duchess of Brittany, as it was far from being his own intention or desire to act against a court, to which he owed so many obligations as he did to that of France. The archbishop, however, was not to be so easily imposed upon; he saw into, and gave his court advice of, the true designs of Henry, which they found confirmed by the arrival of the English auxiliaries in March, who landed, to the number of eight thousand, at Guerande, under the command of the lord Willoughby, sir John Cheney, sir John Middleton, Halletown, Corbet, Lighton, Cornwall, and others: they were readily received into Guerande, but refused admittance into Hennebon.

The French, however, by their prudent caution, preserved all the footing they had gained in Brittany; distributed in garrisons through almost all the great towns, they over-ran the neighbourhood without opposition; the duchess had neither forces to check their excursions, nor money to levy and maintain an army, nor even interest enough to procure her new allies, the English, the possession of the places stipulated in the treaty of Rhedon; and these latter were too weak to undertake the siege of large and populous cities; the noblemen of Brittany were resolute in refusing them admittance into any of their castles. On the other hand, the French, fully sensible of what English courage was able to effect, if dared to exertion, prudently declined hazarding a general engagement, and kept themselves within their strong holds, waiting for every opportunity of making successful sallies, fallies, and surprize the detached parties of the enemy.

In these slight and trivial skirmishes the summer was spent without any action of importance; and the English, seeing nothing but discord and dissension in the court of Brittany, returned to their own country, in the month of November, the term of their service being then fully expired. But, in order to have a clear view of Henry's situation at this juncture, we must take a closer view of the history of the Breton court, and that of France, since the death of the duke of Brittany*.

Francis had left the guardianship of his daughter to the marshal de Rieux and the counts de Comminges and Dunois, and committed the principal care of her person to Philip de Montauban, chancellor of the duchy, who, with the prince of Orange, cousin to the young duchess, composed the ruling part of the council, and engrossed the direction of public affairs. These noblemen were greatly divided in their sentiments about the disposal of their young ward in marriage.

The duke of Brittany had, in pursuance of the common practices of that time, amused several suitors with the hopes of marrying his daughter; he had even given a positive promise to Allain, lord d'Albret, who was upwards of forty years of age, while that of the princess was not above eleven. The marshal de Rieux was bent upon giving her to this nobleman: the chancellor Montauban and the count de Comminges observed a neutrality, contented with having the person of the princess in their hands: while the young duke of Orleans made warm pretensions to the lady, which was favoured by the solicitations of the count de Dunois, still at the Breton court.

Whilst cabals were carrying on at the court of Brittany, for the interests of these rivals, a treaty was made at Francfort, on the twenty-second of July, between Maximilian and the king of France, in which a stipulation was made for the latter's putting St. Malo's, and other places he possessed in that province, into the hands of the duke of Bourbon and the prince of Orange (as sequestrators, to preserve them in a neutrality till the right of the duchy was judicially determined), as soon as the English were sent out of Brittany. This treaty was ratified by both parties, and now Maximilian pushing his addresses with more vigour than ever, and having gained the chancellor Montauban and the count de Comminges over to his interest, he, towards the end of this year, was married to the young duchess, by the count de Nassau, his proxy, who, by way of consummation, put his naked leg under the espousal sheets, while the duchess was in bed, a ceremony first invented on this occasion.

The treaty between Charles and Maximilian was executed with great punctuality in such articles as particularly concerned themselves; but in those relating to Brittany, the French started difficulties, and refused to resign the places they possessed, on pretence that the province was not entirely cleared of English forces. In this situation were the affairs of the continent during the year 1489, while Henry was at home pursuing his great plan of abolishing the feudal law, and thereby making room for the safety of government, the exercise of industry, and the influx of commerce†.

The parliament of England, which had been prorogued last year from the twenty-third of February to the fourteenth of October, and, after having sat till the fourth of December, been again prorogued to Monday the twenty-fifth of January, 1490, met on this last-mentioned day, for the usual business of granting supplies, and for the more extraordinary one of attainting some persons on account of a conspiracy, about a month before, for delivering an innocent youth out of prison.

These persons were John, abbot of Abingdon, John Maine and Christopher Swanne, of the same place, Edward Frank and Thomas Rothwell, priest, of London; and they were charged, the three first with designing to go abroad the New Year's day 1487, to the earl of Lincoln, then in Flanders, and to have concerted a scheme for getting Edward, earl of Warwick, out of the king's ward, in order, as was surmised, to excite an insurrection. The four last had consulted once about it, at the house of one Henry Davy, in London, and another time at Abingdon; the abbot had been at neither of these meetings, nor spoken to any of the conspirators except Maine; but, approving the scheme, had furnished them with money to assist in the execution of it. The young earl was kept so close a prisoner, that no one knew for certain where he was, and the design miscarried from the conspirators mistaking the place of his concealment or imprisonment; and the affair being discovered, all their lands and goods were declared forfeited, except such as belonged to the monastery: but this sentence was not to bar the king's prerogative from inflicting such farther punishment on the abbot as he should see fit; however, Henry contented himself with having swept all the wealth of the parties into his own coffers; and, not caring to revive the murmurs of the people by too frequent exertions of revenge on the Yorkists, dropped any farther prosecution. The parliament having granted a considerable subsidy on the twenty-seventh of February, was then dissolved.

The dispute with the court of France and that of Brittany, about the evacuation of places agreeable to the late treaty of Francfort, occasioned a renewal of hostilities; and the lord d'Albret, chagrined at the marriage of the duchess with Maximilian, surprized Nantes, and delivered it into the hands of the French. In this dilemma, Anne, whose marriage with Maximilian had been kept a profound secret, as well from Charles of France as Henry of England, sent the chancellor Montauban, and other envoys, to demand succours of Henry, and even engaged never to marry without his knowledge and consent, and to deliver the town and castle of Morlaix, as a security into Henry's hands for the money he had lent her. The ambassadors arrived in the month of February, but it was September before Henry could be brought to take any definitive measures in her favour: about that time he gave orders to sir Thomas Lovel and Dr. Ainsworth, to meet with the ambassadors of Maximilian, and to enter into concert with them for making war upon the king of France, for the recovery of the towns "which the said king (to use the words of the record, Rymer, vol. xii. p. 397), against all equity of law, villainously usurped, and unjustly detained by force and fraud, from the said Maximilian, or his son Philip, duke of Burgundy, or the duchess of Brittany." The emperor of Germany, the king and queen of Spain, the kings of Denmark and Portugal, were invited to accede to this treaty, together with the electors and princes of the empire. The king and queen of Spain immediately acceded to the same, and their accession was notified by public proclamation throughout all England. But besides this, Henry made a separate treaty with the court of Spain for attacking France, unless she would deliver up the county of Roussillon to the Spaniards, and likewise for renewing the treaty of marriage between prince Arthur and the princess Catherine of Spain; it was even agreed upon, that the marriage should be celebrated as soon as the prince attained the age of fourteen and the princess that of twelve; and that she should have for her portion two hundred thousand crowns, each crown to be valued at four shillings and two pence sterling. This treaty was concluded on the part of Henry by Dr. Savage and sir Richard Naufan.

Great effects might probably have arisen from this formidable alliance against France, could Henry have been persuaded to part with his money; but his fondness for that made him slight every other consideration, and, instead of acting vigorously, he agreed to open conferences, at the solicitation of Charles, who dreaded his junction with the duchess, and sent ambassadors to France, to endeavour to mediate between that court and the duchess and Maximilian. Charles, in the mean time, amused the English ambassadors with evasive professions, in order to gain time, that he might be able to terminate the war to his own advantage, without referring the dispute to Henry, whose arbitration he had no mind to adopt.

During these negotiations the duke of Saxony, who commanded in the Low Countries, in the name of Maximilian, published an edict touching the coin, to which the inhabitants of Bruges refused to submit, and those of Ghent joined in their revolt. The king of France, whose constant aim was to foment domestic troubles in the dominions of his neighbours, sent succours to the rebels, under the command of marshal Desguardes, governor of Picardy; and on the other hand Maximilian sent ambassadors to Henry, to crave his assistance. The king of England, piqued at the manner in which Charles had shuffled with his ambassadors, and unwilling to see the archduke oppressed by his own subjects, sent the lords d'Aubeney, Willoughby, and Morley to his assistance, with a body of three thousand men; these, joining with a body of Maximilian's German troops, threw themselves, unperceived by the enemy into Dixmude, which the Flemings, with the assistance of the French, had invested, after having taken Ypres and Sluys. D'Aubeney, who had the chief command of the English and Germans, sallying forth the next morning by day-break, came unawares upon the enemy, who were lying in full security in their camp, and falling upon them sword in hand, routed them entirely, no less than eight thousand French and Flemings being that day cut in pieces; and of the English, besides the lord Morley, who fell in the beginning of the action, not above one hundred. The small force d'Aubeney had with him not permitting the prosecution of even so considerable a victory, he contented himself with burning to the ground the town of Ostend, which was then in possession of the French, and immediately after marched the English troops into Nieuport, with all the cannon they had taken from the enemy, and so rich a booty that most of the common soldiers were now possessed of fine horses and rich cloathing.

These advantages which Maximilian got on the side of Picardy, and the resolution Henry seemed now to have taken, of supporting his new allies, made Charles resolve to send an embassy into England, to learn what he had to hope or fear from the English monarch, and, if possible, to detach him from the interest of the duchess of Brittany. For this purpose he chose Francis de Luxembourg viscount of Martigues, Valeran de Sannes, and Robert de Gaguin, general of the order of the Trinity. Henry, by an unaccountable spirit of dallying and prolonging the evil hour of parting with his money, agreed to open the conferences, and appointed Fox, bishop of Winchester; the earl of Ormond; Gunthorpe, dean of Wells; the prior of Christ church, in Canterbury; sir John Bourne; sir Robert Tuberville, treasurer of Calais; and Robert Ross, purveyor of the same, to treat with the French concerning a final determination of all differences between the two crowns. Nothing material was transacted at these conferences, which passed chiefly in idle claims and useless altercations on both sides. Morton, Henry's chancellor, indeed affected to talk in a very lofty style, and even told the French ambassadors, that the king his master expected the continuance or renewal of the payment of the appointment or tribute stipulated to Edward IV. by the treaty of Amiens; and when the French ambassadors declared they had no instructions on that head, he peremptorily told them "that the king their master must not be surprized, if, in case of a refusal, king Henry should assert his right, not only to the duchies of Normandy, Guienne, and Anjou, but even to the crown of France itself, as his lawful inheritance *."

The French ambassadors were surprized at this declaration; they behaved, however, with great spirit, and replied, that they made no doubt but the king their sovereign's sword would be able to maintain his sceptre, adding, "that though they had no instructions upon the point started by the court of England; yet they could venture to say, that their master would never consent to dismember from his crown any part of its rights and possessions." This appearance of resolution made Henry fear he had gone too far; he ordered Morton to sound the ambassadors upon the following question, "Whether Charles would accept the disposal of the duchess of Brittany in marriage, with the exclusive condition that he should not marry her himself?" To this question the ambassadors replied, that their king was so far from entertaining any thought of espousing the duchess, that he had given them no instructions on the subject: soon after they took their leave. Henry, upon this occasion, spun his politics too fine; his intention was to intimidate Charles, and for that purpose he made use of a rhodomontade, which produced a contrary effect. The French king knew he was too wise to embark in such a chimerical project as the conquest of France; and therefore interpreted his menaces into an artifice for deterring him from the conquest of Brittany, which he resolved to prosecute without farther hesitation: he was strengthened in this resolution when his ambassadors, on their return home, told him that Henry had notified to them, before their departure, that he was to send an embassy immediately to France, to treat of all differences.

In February, 1491, Henry sent ambassadors into France according to his promise*. Their commission was "to treat of all his differences with king Charles, and in particular of a certain sum due to him from that prince (doubtless meaning the tribute), as also of the affair between Charles and the duchess of Brittany†." These instructions alone, says a modern historian, are a clear evidence that Henry had no design to push his pretensions to the realm of France, or at least to Guienne and Normandy, with any vigour; for is it probable that he would have comprized under the general word Differences, his claim to all France, or to two of the richest provinces, and have specified a debt of one hundred and twenty-five thousand crowns, if the first had been his principal point in view? It is therefore manifest he still persisted in his desire to end the affair of Brittany without war, and to secure the sums he had advanced.

About the same time, viz. the beginning of the year 1491, he appointed commissioners to treat with the ambassadors lately arrived from Brittany. Then it was, probably that the duchess's marriage with Maximilian was imparted to him; or perhaps it was known to him before, though he pretended ignorance of it, as not having been notified to him in form. These ambassadors, who were the lord of Maupertuis and Peter Cajalu, had also in charge to solicit Henry to bestir himself more effectually in behalf of the duchess, who had received certain advice that the court of France was meditating an invasion against her dominions, which must fall into their hands, if not timely succoured. Henry gave them the strongest assurances that, if the present negotiations in which he was engaged with Charles, did not take the desired effect, he would immediately unsheathe the sword in behalf of their mistress, and protect her with all his power against the designs of her enemies. The ambassadors were obliged to put up with these promises, and we shall leave them at the court of England, to take a view of what passed on the continent.

No sooner was Charles informed of the marriage of the duchess Anne with Maximilian, and the promises made to the Breton ambassadors by Henry, than he at once perceived that he should never be able by force of arms to accomplish his designs upon the duchy of Brittany, and therefore determined to have recourse to the only expedient that could insure success, namely, espousing the duchess himself, by which means he should, by an easy and natural consequence, complete his design upon her dominions; and he found no small encouragement in the dispositions of the lord d'Albret and the marshal de Rieux, especially the former, who, by the contract of the duchess with Maximilian, had lost all hopes of becoming her husband: that party therefore closed with the proposition, privately communicated to them by the French ministry, who made no secret of their master's intention to reannex the duchy of Brittany to his own crown, either by arms or marriage. And Charles, making his interest take the lead of every other consideration, and beginning to dislike the conduct of the duchess of Bourbon, went himself and took the duke of Orleans out of the tower of Bourges, where he had been confined ever since the battle of St. Aubin. This generous proceeding united the court and the kingdom of France; and the duke of Orleans so far lost his love in his politics, that he not only resigned all pretensions to the duchess, but had a principal share in contriving and conducting the whole negotiation of her marriage with the king of France.

This scheme, however, was attended with some difficulties, which to a prince of a less enterprising genius than Charles would have appeared altogether unsurmountable. He himself was under an engagement, by the treaty of Arras, A. D. 1482, to marry Margaret of Austria, daughter to Maximilian, who had been near seven years at the French court, considered as queen, and waiting only the proper age to be so declared upon her marriage. The duchess of Brittany had been bred with a high contempt of his person, which was mean and deformed; she thought herself already married to Maximilian, and she had for some time taken the title of queen of the Romans; she had just received fresh assurances from Henry of his readiness to march to her assistance; and she had declared herself resolved to make the most vigorous resistance: but all these impediments were too weak barriers to check the ambitious career of the French monarch. He gained over the count de Dunois and the prince of Orange, and they used all the art they were masters of to dispose the minds of the Bretons to peace: though at the same time they pretended to enter into all the measures of the duchess for calling in the English to her assistance; They soon found means to persuade the noblemen of Brittany to espouse the cause of Charles: the chancellor Montauban was won over by the marshal de Rieux and the lord d'Albret.

These all joined their efforts to bring the young duchess to consent to a match with Charles; but her affection for Maximilian, the frequent attempts which the former had made to deprive her of her inheritance, and the constant regard which the latter had expressed for her interest, the contract of the French monarch with Margaret of Austria, her hereditary hatred to the French nation, her treaties with the kings of England and Castile, and especially her marriage with Maximilian, all concurred to make her resolve not to hearken to any remonstrances on the subject; and she stood the attacks of her nobility, all won with French gold, with a steadiness which was wonderful in so young a princess: and the count de Dunois, finding her inflexible, sent word to the king of France, that if he meant to accomplish his purpose, he must enter Brittany immediately with a numerous army, and force the refractory princess to a compliance, before the arrival of the English succours.

Charles followed this advice, without losing a moment; and, while he was amusing Henry's ambassadors with negotiations, all on a sudden he marched a great army into Brittany, and encamped within a league of Rennes, where the duchess then resided. This sudden irruption, and the danger she was in seemed at first to have no effect on the duchess; she declared herself ready to fall beneath the ruins of her state, rather than give her hand to the base invader of them: but Charles at length laying siege to her capital, and having nobody about her but a council she could not trust, all her nobility being professedly in the interest of the French king, and no prospect of relief being at hand, she found herself at length constrained to yield to what the exigency of her circumstances and the importunities of her faithless ministers, taking advantage of that exigence, demanded of her: she waved her objections, and her compliance was signified to Charles; hostilities ceased, the contract of marriage was drawn up, and the princess, being carried to Lagny, in Touraine, was, on the sixteenth day of December, 1491, married to Charles, and soon after crowned at St. Denis.

As to the king of the Romans, this proceeding of Charles and the French court exasperated him beyond all measure; he breathed nothing but revenge when he heard that he was robbed of his wife in such a cruel and outrageous manner, and peremptorily insisted that his daughter Margaret, who had been affianced to Charles, and, as we have already observed, had resided so long in France, should be sent back to his own court: in a word, he filled all Europe with complaints and remonstrances, but without any hope of being either redressed or revenged. He had, moreover, the mortification of reflecting, that his own negligence had not a little contributed to the disgrace and disappointment with which he now smarted; for had he been so prudent to consummate his marriage with the duchess in person, instead of doing it by proxy only, it would have been impossible for Charles to have dissolved the sacred union; but as he had neglected to take this necessary precaution, the other politically availed himself of such an impolitic omission.

Nothing could be more unexpected or unacceptable to Henry, than was the marriage of the French king with the duchess of Brittany: he saw, not without confusion, that he had been the dupe of his own avaricious policy, of which he had now lost all the fruits, not only as Brittany was entirely gone, but as the reimbursement of the sums he had advanced for its defence was more precarious than ever. In the first emotions of his resentment and vexation, he publicly declared a resolution of heading his army in person against France; he issued out orders to levy forces, and prepare transports, and put on a determined air of acting with vigour.

His next step was to assemble a parliament, which met on Thursday the sixth of January, 1492, when, in a set speech, he acquainted the two houses with the king of France's seizing the duchy of Brittany, while he amused him with a sham treaty, and declared his resolution to recover the kingdom of France, as the inheritance of his ancestors; he reminded the members of the victories of Cressy, Poitiers, and Agincourt; mentioned the different powers that were ready to co-operate with his measures in attacking that kingdom; demanded a supply suitable to the greatness of the occasion, exhorting the commons to spare the purses of the poor, and let the burthen of the tax fall upon the wealthy. Though the commons had very little reason to grant a supply; considering how the last had been imbezzled: the conquest of France was such a temptation as they could not resist; they not only advised him to engage in the enterprize, which in truth he had no mind to undertake, but they supplied him with uncommon alacrity, and, according to his desire, empowered him to renew the unpopular Benevolences, which his predecessor Richard, bad as he was, no less prudently than justly abolished.

Henry now appeared extremely intent upon his French expedition; and judging it proper to be secure from any diversions the Scots might make in his absence, sent ambassadors to Coldstream, upon the river Tweed, to confer with others sent by James IV. who had succeeded to the throne of Scotland upon the murder of his father James III. by his own nobility, who had taken up arms against him. The conferences were not long, both kings being equally desirous of each other's friendship, so that a five years truce was concluded, viz. from the twenty-first of December, 1491, to the same day, 1496. By this treaty the town of Berwick, with its territory, was to be declared a neutral town; and the lordship of Lorn, in Scotland, and the little island of Lundy belonging to England, were excepted out of the truce. Henry ratified the treaty on the ninth of January, 1492; but the king of Scotland, whether bribed by France, or from some other motive, refused to confirm it; he agreed, however, to a much shorter truce, on the twentieth of February following, which was to last only eleven months.

His next step was to send ambassadors to summon Maximilian and Ferdinand of Spain to assist him in invading France, according to treaty; but, notwithstanding the high and lofty strain in which Henry affected to talk to his parliament, it is pretty evident he had no intention to push the war with vigour; for, at the very time we are now speaking of, viz. the months of February and March, when the flame of his resentment seemed to blaze highest, we find him opening a negociation with two agents from his cousin of France*.

On the third of May, however, the staff-officers and purveyors of the army were appointed; sir Reginald Bray, knight of the Garter, being made pay-master of the troops. On the ninth of the same month, Henry entered into an indenture with his principal officers for their quotas of men, which were to serve in the ensuing campaign, at the rate of eighteen pence for every man at arms, with a servant and page; and sixpence for every archer on foot or horseback†. As we have but imperfect accounts of the art of war in those days, it is not easy to say in what manner these troops were formed and disciplined; it is not unlikely that every contractor acted as colonel of the men whom he had indentured to raise; and that the whole, being divided into van-guard, centre, and rearward, flanked by the horse in two bodies, as wings, were commanded by the general officers, who, upon this occasion, were the king himself, the duke of Bedford, and the earl of Oxford. Mention is also made of the marquis of Dorset, the earls of Kent, Devonshire, Surry, Arundel, Derby, Shrewsbury, Suffolk, Essex, and Ormond; the lords Latimer, Powis, Barnes, Grey, Scroope of Bolton, Scroope of Upsal, Audley, and Strange; the viscount Wells; sir Reginald Bray, sir Charles Somerset, sir Roger Cotton, sir Richard Holt, sir William Courtney, sir Richard Corbet, sir William Stanley, sir John St. John, sir Walter Hungerford, with several other gentlemen, all of them contractors for furnishing men and arms, and also a brave body of Welsh troops under the command of Richard Thomas*.

The rendezvous of the whole army was appointed to be held near London, and upon a review it appeared to amount to the number of twenty-five thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse, or men at arms, which, allowing two servants to each man at arms, make in the whole an army of about twenty-nine thousand eight hundred fighting men†. But before this army could be got together, and through Henry's affected delays, the season for fighting was over. It was the twentieth of September before Henry got to Canterbury, where he made sir Robert Nanfan judge-advocate of the navy, with a power of punishing capitally all offences committed in the same; and sir Robert Willoughby de Brooke (as he is called in his commission) marshal of the army, with the like powers‡.

On the second of October, Henry, being ready to embark at Dover, appointed his son Arthur, prince of Wales, guardian of the realm. On the sixth of the same month he embarked with his army, and next day landed at Calais.

Henry had scarcely landed on the continent when the ambassadors he had sent to the king of the Romans arrived, and told him that Maximilian was wholly unprepared to enter France, as he had promised; this news was immediately made known to the whole army. Some days after, he received from his ambassadors in Spain, letters, which were likewise made public, importing that Ferdinand had concluded a peace with the king of France, upon that monarch's promising to restore to the crown of Castile the province of Roussillon, without receiving the three hundred thousand crowns, which Lewis XI. had lent upon that county. We shall not venture to affirm with some historians, that Henry knew all this before, but had so ordered, that these advices might come together after his arrival in France, that he might appear forced to make a peace, which he had before privately concerted with the court of France, and that all his vigorous preparations were only made to save appearances with his subjects. Setting aside all bold and ill-grounded conjecture, we shall stick to facts, and leave our readers to judge for themselves.

It is, however, certain, that the public began to entertain some suspicions not greatly to his advantage, when Desguardes, who had just received from Charles VIII. a marshal's baton, appeared openly at the head of an embassy, and produced his powers for making up all differences between the two kings, and that Henry ordered the bishop of Bath and Wells and William, lord d'Aubeney, governor of Calais, to hold conferences with the marshal at Estaples, a few leagues distant from that garrison. Henry was no stranger to the murmurs of his soldiers on this occasion; and, to make a shew of doing something, he, on the nineteenth of October, advanced to invest Boulogne, after demolishing the small towns of Ardres and Moulery: but the army were but too well acquainted that a peace was upon the carpet, which was no small mortification to the gentlemen who had sold or mortgaged their estates, that they might come with the greater number of followers to reconquer that kingdom which their ancestors had more than once subdued before.

But Henry VII. was a very different prince from either Henry V. or Edward III. glory was their passion, money was his: he had promised his parliament that he would make the war pay itself, and he took care it should. His commissioners and those of France seem to have understood one another so perfectly, that little remained to be discussed, and with such celerity were the negotiations carried on at Estaples, that on the thirtieth of October, Henry produced in public a paper, which had been drawn up by the plenipotentiaries on both sides, as preliminaries for a peace: the articles were as follow.

"That Henry should be reimbursed the expences he had been at in assisting the duchess of Brittany, which, according to the English ambassador's account, amounted to an hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds; and also twenty-five thousand pounds as arrears for the tribute due to the crown of England in consequence of the treaty of Pequigny between Edward IV. and Lewis XI. The said sums to be paid to Henry at the rate of fifty thousand franks a year, and Charles giving him for the said payments the like security as king Lewis had given king Edward upon the conclusion of the said treaty.

"II. The particulars of the said expences were, within a reasonable time, to be verified by the English before commissioners appointed for that purpose by the king of France: and the allies of both kings were to have four months after the conclusion of the treaty, for determining whether they should be included in the same.

"III. If, after Maximilian and his son Philip should declare themselves as included in the said treaty, the king of France should act hostilely against them, or their possessions, the king of England shall be at liberty in that and no other case to give them assistance. Proper hostages to be given for the performance of the whole ¶."

Such were the conditions of this scandalous treaty; such were Henry's exploits in an expedition, from which, out of a ridiculous vanity, or to flatter theirs, he had encouraged his subjects to expect no less than the conquest of France. Conscious of the discontent this bargain (as lord Bacon styles it) rather than treaty, would give the whole English nation, and foreseeing the storm to which he might be afterwards exposed from the resentment of a people whom he had plucked to feather himself, by trepanning the commons into a grant of exorbitant taxes on false pretences, he thought proper to get the marquis of Dorset and twenty-three others, either noblemen, privy-counsellors, or chief officers of his army, who were all of them his creatures, and entirely guided by him, to petition him to accept of the proposed preliminaries. Accordingly they presented him with a long memorial, under all their hands, setting forth their reasons for desiring him to conclude a peace, the principal of which were,

“The late season of the year and the approach of winter, which would expose their king's and the soldiers lives to danger, and render the passage of provisions by sea from Calais uncertain: the strength of the fortifications and garrison of Boulogne: the security Calais would receive from Sluys being lately reduced by the duke of Saxony to Maximilian's obedience: the saving the English nation from the expence of a war: Henry's disappointment in not being reinforced by his allies: and the different situation in affairs now, from what there was in the time of Edward IV. who, having the duke of Burgundy and all Picardy on his side, might have safely advanced with his army into the very neighbourhood of Paris: but what they imagined rendered it a peace truly honourable, was that France was to pay a greater sum of money than she ever paid or granted before*.”

But the most remarkable part of this address is towards its conclusion, where the petitioners bound themselves to stand and fall by Henry's person and government, should any discontent or murmurs arise upon the said peace being accepted: they farther declare that they were willing to have it believed that the peace was concluded upon their request†.

Henry, feigning to be determined by these reasons to accept of a peace, the treaty was drawn up in form, and signed at Estaples on the third of November; Charles, who was then at Tours, ratified it on the eighth of the same month: after the ratification there was another article added, on the thirteenth of December, by which the contracting parties obliged themselves not to shew favour, nor give advice nor assistance to any of each other's rebellious subjects that should take refuge in their territories; and it was provided, that the whole treaty should, within three years, be ratified by the estates of both kingdoms. Henry then raised the siege of Boulogne, and retired to Calais, from whence he took shipping for England, and arrived at London on the seventeenth of December, undisturbed at the murmurs of an abused people, which he was enabled to disregard by the payment of seven hundred and forty-five thousand ducats for the expence of his armament, and the promise of twenty-five thousand crowns yearly, which were punctually remitted in the sequel, and was called a continuance of the tribute paid to England by his father Lewis XI.

Such were the transactions of this busy year, 1492; others of a more private nature we shall now throw together. On the twenty-second of June, Henry had a second son, afterwards the famous Henry VIII. born to him at Greenwich. Jufts and tournaments were particularly encouraged by Henry, as the most effectual means to introduce that degeneracy and luxury which he wanted to establish amongst his nobility: in one of these sir James Parker was killed by one Vaughan, a domestic belonging to the court. But what distinguished this year above all transactions was the attempt made by Christopher Columbus to discover a new world. This fortunate adventurer was the son of a mechanic in Genoa, a wool-comber it is said: he first offered his services to our Henry, but this monarch's frugal caution, and the multiplicity of affairs he had at this time on his hands, prevented his entering into any engagements with Columbus, who, despairing of success in England, repaired to the court of Spain: but for a more particular account of this great man and his brother Bartholomew, with the several discoveries they made, we shall refer our readers to the article of Commerce, at the end of this reign.

We are now to enter upon an event of a most intricate nature, which has puzzled all our historians properly to account for, and which has been represented in as many different lights as passion, prejudice, or vague conjecture in the several writers led them to furnish; as to ourselves, we shall, without blindly adopting the sentiments partiality might inspire on either side, relate in a simple order the facts as history has furnished them to us.

Towards the beginning of the year 1492, a young man, whom all his enemies allow to have possessed a very elegant figure and a bewitching address, appeared in Ireland, a country devoted to the house of York, and wrote letters to the earls of Kildare and Desmond, requiring them to acknowledge him as the rightful heir to the crown of England, he being Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, the second surviving son of Edward IV. These two noblemen either not giving credit to his allegations, or still smarting from their unsuccessful attempt in favour of the impostor Simnel, disregarded his application, and he was forced to throw himself for protection upon John Waters, an eminent merchant, and then mayor of Corke, who warmly espoused his cause: and his appearance and claim being bruited about, the common people flocked to him from all parts, offering hearty but unavailing vows for his success. At this time the court of France was under expectation of a visit from Henry of England, and, according to its constant practice of taking pretenders to the crown of England by the hand as often as it has any difference with English kings, one Frion (who had been secretary to Henry VII. but had left his service for that of Charles) was sent into Ireland, to enquire about the matter, and, if there appeared any feasibility in his story, to invite the young claimant (whom we must hereafter call by the name of Perkin Warbeck, which all writers have fixed upon him) over to France. Frion, who, we are told, was a penetrating, sensible, and active man, either convinced, or pretending to be convinced, that this was the real duke of York, carried him over to Paris, where Charles acted as if he certainly believed the same, and continued so to do, even after a good understanding was restored between him and Henry.

No sooner was Perkin arrived at the court of France than sir George Neville, sir John Taylor, and several other persons of distinction, to the number of one hundred, came to see him, and, after several long conversations with him, declared themselves entirely convinced that he was Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, escaped, as he himself said, from the Tower, where he had been confined, and by every one thought to have been murdered by order of the usurper Richard. Charles, upon these testimonies in his favour, ordered him an appointment suitable to the character he assumed, with a guard to attend his person. In this manner he lived at Charles's court till the conclusion of the peace of Estaples, when that monarch and his ministry could no longer with decency entertain him; which Perkin wisely perceived, and, without waiting to be told to retire, withdrew from Paris privately, and going into Burgundy about the beginning of the year 1493, applied to the duchess dowager of Burgundy, sister of Edward IV. and the declared enemy of the Lancaster family.

This princess, though she had seen him received by Charles of France, and owned by all the English at that court as the duke of York, not only received him as a mere stranger, but even affected to treat him as an impostor: she quoted the recent case of Lambert Simnel, as an instance how far easy credulity might be imposed upon, and even went so far as to threaten Perkin with imprisonment. To this rebuff he opposed only a graceful modesty, accompanied with that decent assurance which is usually seen to wait on truth. This first startled the duchess: she now put a thousand questions to him in public, to try whether he was the real duke of York or not; but all his answers were so apposite and ready, and his behaviour had in it so much dignity and sweetness, that he was generally believed, as well by the principal personages of the Burgundian court as those of inferior rank, to be the true duke Richard; the duchess herself at length seemed to be so convinced of his being no impostor, that she assigned him a guard of thirty halberdiers, and distinguished him by the name of the White Rose of England*; and all the court, Flemings, Dutch, and strangers, shewed him the same respect as to one of the blood royal.

The news flew like lightning into England, that the duke of York was certainly alive (the name of Perkin Warbeck not being yet come to light); that he had been entertained in Ireland, countenanced in France, and was now publicly avowed and greatly honoured in Flanders. It must be admitted, that, whether Perkin was a counterfeit or not, he appeared at a time when Henry's conduct had added many to the enemies he had before. Thus much was in favour of Perkin; but, at the same time, the minds of the people were still possessed with the impudent attempt and ridiculous fall of Lambert Simnel, and therefore most people were very cautious and backward in giving credit to the like tales or appearances. As to Henry, he affected to treat the whole affair as a scheme of that restless woman, the duchess of Burgundy; and, whatever he might really think, appeared wholly unconcerned, lest his fears should encourage his enemies; or, perhaps, because he thought it would make Perkin too considerable, should he take any public measures to destroy him.

In the beginning of March, Henry sent the order of the Garter to Alphonso duke of Calabria, eldest son of Ferdinand king of Naples. Alphonso had been extremely desirous of this honour, to insinuate to the princes of Italy, that he had in the king of England a protector who would not suffer him to be oppressed. He would have thereby induced them to league with the king his father, against Charles VIII. who was going to undertake the conquest of the kingdom of Naples.

A few days after, Henry concluded at London a treaty of perpetual peace and amity with Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Castile and Arragon. This alliance, which was a reciproc-cal engagement of mutual assistance upon all occasions, was particular in that it extended not to all the kings of England and Spain without distinction, but only to all their successors descended from them. In the treaty, the marriage articles between prince Arthur and Catherine, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, were confirmed and renewed.

In the mean time, however, the people of England began to shew more and more their disgust against the king, who was now become extremely unpopular: they scrupled not to tax him with avarice and extortion, in fleecing his subjects for the support of a war undertaken merely with a view to fill his own coffers, and terminated by a dishonourable and disadvantageous peace; with behaving to his queen rather with the rigour of a tyrant, than the tenderness of a husband; and with embracing every opportunity of oppressing the friends and adherents to the house of York, to a princess of which he was alone indebted for his title to the crown he wore: and as a person of that house now appeared, who had a prior right to that of Henry's wife, they looked upon their relation and allegiance to him as virtually dissolved.

In this situation of sentiments, encouraged by the many concurrent circumstances in favour of the youth who assumed the character of duke of York, and increased by Henry's avaricious temper, which had alienated several of the firmest friends to his person and the house of Lancaster, it is no wonder that many in England began to reflect and reason within themselves, and next to debate and cabal with others. Sir William Stanley, to whom, and his brother, Henry owed his success at Bosworth, and consequently in part his crown; John Radcliffe, lord Fitz Walter; sir Robert Clifford, sir Thomas Thwaites, and others, entered into a secret confederacy to espouse the cause of the young adventurer, and deputed sir Robert Clifford, son of the lord Clifford, and William Borley, a gentleman of fortune of Aldeburgh, in Hertfordshire, to go to the court of the duchess of Burgundy, to enquire minutely into the merits of the youth's identity, and, on receiving satisfaction therein, to concert with that princess the means of restoring him to his lawful inheritance.

After sir Robert Clifford had been some time at Margaret's court, and after having several conversations with Perkin, he wrote over to the conspirators in England, that he knew the youth's person as well as that of his own son, and that he was sure he was no impostor, but the real duke of York. This report worked the conspirators almost into certainty; and Henry, who by this time was no stranger to the discontents of the people, and plainly foresaw the storm that was ready to fall upon his head, thought the matter too serious to be neglected any longer. He had already received a confused account of the conspiracy being hatching, and that emissaries were passing between the court of Burgundy and some of his own subjects; he therefore sent certain officers, with a band of soldiers, into every port, to keep the shores and sea coasts, that no one might come in or go out of the kingdom without being searched and examined. His next, and indeed principal business was to undeceive the people, by proving the murder of the two young princes.

* The badge by which, in the course of the civil wars, the house of York was distinguished; as the family of Lancaster was by that of the red.

This could only be done by discoveries made by the murderers, of whom two were still alive, sir James Tyrrel, ordered by Richard III. to put the princes to death, and John Dighton, one of those employed by Tyrrel to commit the fact; Miles Forrest, the third, being dead some time before. Sir James Tyrrel was then a man in very high reputation; he had been employed by Henry in most of his important transactions with the courts of France and Burgundy, and was then governor of Guisnes: we shall forbear to remark the infamy which attended Henry's countenancing such a person, or indeed suffering him to live, and proceed in our narrative.

Tyrrel and Dighton were apprehended by the king's order, and sent to prison, where they underwent a private examination; after which it was given out, that they agreed in their depositions; namely, "That Dighton and Forrest smothered the two princes in their bed, and shewed their dead bodies to Tyrrel, and that a priest afterwards buried them under a stair-case; that soon after king Richard ordered them to be removed elsewhere, by the same priest, who was since dead, without discovering where he had laid them." It is probable, however, that Tyrrel's deposition was not so favourable to Henry's purpose as Dighton's, since he was detained in prison, whereas Dighton was released, to spread abroad his own evidence; but we find no discovery that he made reduced into any form of a record; and, indeed, the whole of this transaction, relating to the evidence of the murder of the young princes, leaves a strong suspicion that the vulgar story of that fact must be false; though this may not perhaps be a sufficient proof of the truth of Perkin's pretensions.

Lord Bacon, who has dressed the whole story of Perkin in the best form it will admit, as writing his adventure under a government who was deeply concerned to represent him as an impostor, informs us that Henry was so extremely solicitous in coming at the bottom of this whole imposture, that he filled all the continent of Europe with his spies and emissaries, well furnished with money, to trace Perkin from his original. The effect of this was, that they published the following account, which we shall transcribe, in the very words of the noble author.

"That there was at Tournay one John (or, as some say, Peter) Osbecke, a converted Jew, who had borne an office in that town, and married Catherine de Faro, whose business drew him to live for a time, with his wife, at London, in king Edward IV's days, during which time he had a son by her; and being known at court, the king, either out of a religious nobleness because he was a convert, or upon some private acquaintance, did him the honour of being god-father to his child, and named him Peter; but afterwards, proving a dainty and effeminate youth, he was commonly called by the diminutive of his name, Peterkin or Perkin: as for the name of Warbeck, when it was given him they did but guess at, before examinations had been taken; but he had been so much talked of by that name, that it stuck by him after his true name of Osbecke was known. While he was a young child, his parents returned with him to Tournay: then he was placed in the house of a kinsman of his, called John Stenbeck, at Antwerp; and so roved up and down between Antwerp and Tournay and other towns of Flanders, for a good time, living much in English company, and having the English tongue perfect: in which time being grown a comely youth, he was brought by some of Margaret's spies to her presence, who, viewing him well, and seeing he had a comely face and personage that would bear a noble fortune, and finding him otherwise of a fine spirit and winning behaviour, thought she had now found a curious piece of marble to carve out an image of a duke of York; she kept him with her a great while, but with extreme secrecy, instructing him the while by many cabinet conferences."

We must not forget to observe, from the above author, that Henry, in order to procure the better credit to his spies with the contrary side, used to have them excommunicated (as they passed one after another over to the continent) every Sunday at St. Paul's, in virtue of the bull of Innocent VIII. enforcing the act of succession.

Henry having now received what he called a perfect information of every thing relating to Perkin Warbeck, dispatched sir Edward Poynings and Dr. Warham, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, to the court of young Philip, archduke of Austria, son to Maximilian, and sovereign of the estates of the duchess of Burgundy, to remonstrate against the conduct of Margaret, who was the author of this imposture, and to insist that the archduke would deliver Perkin into his hands: "pirates and impostors of this sort (saith Dr. Warham, in the close of his speech) being fit to be accounted the enemies of mankind, and no way to be protected by the law of nations*."

The Flemish ministers, however, seem to have looked upon the affair in a very different light to that in which Henry's ambassadors represented it; for, after some deliberations on the king's demand, they returned for answer, in their master's name (the archduke being then a minor), "That, for the love of king Henry, the said archduke would in no sort aid or assist the pretended duke (of York), but in all things conserve the amity he had with the king: but for the duchess dowager, she was absolute in the lands of her dowry, and that he could not lett (prevent or refuse) her to dispose of her own, nor controul her conduct in what she should see fit to act towards any person†." This answer, being founded on an assertion false in fact, viz. that the duchess was absolute in the lands of her dowry, nettled Henry so much, that, to humble the Flemings, he published a proclamation, ordering all of that country to depart out of England, forbade all commerce with Flanders, recalled all the English merchants from thence, and removed the mart of cloth from Antwerp to Calais: the archduke's council in return ordered all the English to quit his dominions. We must now attend Henry's other transactions with respect to connections foreign and domestic.

The truce with Scotland had, it seems, been so ill observed, that there was a necessity for renewing it: accordingly, on the seventeenth of June this year, conferences were held at Edinburgh, between the commissioners of both kings, and, on the twenty-fifth of the same month, a truce was concluded, to hold till the last day of April, 1501, and Henry paid the king of Scotland a thousand marks by way of compensation for the injuries that nation had received from the other, before the conclusion of the truce†.

On the first of November, Henry wrote to the king of France, desiring to be included in the peace of Senlis, made between Philip, archduke of Austria, and Charles VIII. on the third of May this year, according to the tenor of the treaty. On the seventeenth of the same month, he notified to him the same thing from Ferdinand, king of Naples, and Alphonso, duke of Calabria, his son, who were expressly included in the treaty of Senlis, on the part of the emperor and the archduke; but nevertheless king Charles still persisted in his project of conquering Naples.

About the beginning of the year 1494, Henry's emissaries in Flanders made a great acquisition for their master's interest, by gaining over sir Robert Clifford, who was intrusted with all the secrets of Perkin and his protectress the duchess dowager of Burgundy, and who now discovered all he knew of Perkin's party, though nothing of his person. The first effect of these discoveries was the apprehending and seizing of John Radcliff, lord Fitz Walter, sir Simon Montfort, sir Thomas Thwaites, William d'Aubeney, Robert Radcliff, Thomas Cressener, and Thomas Ashwood, who were all taken on the same day, tried, convicted of holding treasonable correspondence with Perkin, and condemned to die the death of traitors. The lord Fitz Walter was conveyed to Calais, with hopes in time he might obtain his pardon; but his impatience of confinement prompting him to attempt an escape, on being discovered he lost his head. Montfort, Radcliff, and d'Aubeney suffered the rigour of the law; but all the rest were pardoned; and many others, of the clergy as well as of the laity, arrested on the same suspicion, were discharged without trial.

As Clifford had informed the king of the application which Perkin had made to the earls of Kildare and Desmond, and they not having discovered the same to him, Henry justly thought that they only waited for an opportunity to declare themselves enemies to his government; he therefore resolved to take care of that island, which had been hitherto much neglected. With this view he, on the eleventh of September this year, issued letters patent, creating his second son Henry, then but two years of age, lieutenant or governor of Ireland, appointing for his deputy sir Edward Poynings, a man well versed in affairs, and whom he had successfully employed in several important embassies. He gave him a very extensive power, as well over the military as the civil government, that he might be the better able to put the island upon a good footing: he associated with him Henry Deane, lately made bishop of Bangor, and now appointed chancellor of Ireland; and gave him a body of a thousand veteran troops to enforce his authority.

The first step Poynings took after his arrival in Ireland was to secure the persons of Maurice and Gerald Fitz Gerald, the former earl of Desmond, the other of Kildare: Desmond, however, found means to elude his vigilance and escape; but Kildare was seized, and sent prisoner to England; from whence, Henry sent him back again, loaded with favours, on his promise to exert all his great interest to Henry's advantage.

Poynings next called a parliament, which rendered itself famous for the statutes it enacted to the advantage of the crown and of the English settled in that island. He had found, on his beginning to exercise his authority, great difficulty, without hazarding a general rebellion, to bring any of the rebels against the English government who resided in Ireland, to justice by the course of law. This was owing to the management of Richard, duke of York, father to Edward IV. who, when he was lord-lieutenant there, had rendered it a sanctuary to all rebels, by an act which he passed, "That Ireland should be a sanctuary for refugees; and that it should be treason to disturb any body there by any writ, privy-seal, or other matter from England." An act therefore was now made under Poynings, "annulling all prescriptions which traitors and rebels claimed in Ireland, and all receivers and maintainers of traitors were made guilty of treason; and obedience was commanded to be paid to the great-seal and privy-seal of England, and to letters missive under the king's signet‡." The famous statute called Poynings's Act was also now enacted, the substance of which was, "that the parliament of Ireland should not be assembled before the lord-lieutenant and council had acquainted the king with the reasons, and obtained the royal licence under the great-seal." It was also enacted, "that all the statutes of England concerning the public should be observed in Ireland." These two statutes are still in force to this day*.

While these things were transacting, in Ireland, sir Robert Clifford arrived in England, and repaired privately to Henry, who was then keeping his court in the Tower, and, according to secret instructions he had received, appeared before the council, and, falling on his knees, implored the king's mercy, which he said he would merit by discovering all he knew of the plot. Pardon being promised him on that condition, he made his great discovery, which was that sir William Stanley, who was lord-chamberlain, was one of the abettors of Perkin. Henry affected to be almost petrified with astonishment at this declaration; he sat for some time buried in a thoughtful silence; at length, in a severe tone of voice, he charged Clifford to be sure of what he advanced, vowing that if he failed in the least tittle of his charge, his life should pay the forfeit of the injury done to the character of the man he held foremost in the rank of his friends. Clifford, with a well acted resolution, staked his head upon the truth of his allegation, upon which the lord-chamberlain was ordered not to stir from his lodgings in the Tower; and shortly after he was arraigned of high-treason, when Clifford swearing that he had declared to him, in private conversation, "that if he thought the young man (Perkin) was really the son of Edward IV. he would never bear arms against him;" and Stanley confessing that he had spoken those words, or others to the like purport, the judges, who knew no will but Henry's, and whose venality was equal to their abilities, thought this a sufficient ground for his condemnation, and he was accordingly beheaded on Tower-hill, the sixteenth of February, 1495.

Thus, by an infamous judgment, for no one overt-act appeared in the course of the trial that could convict him of treason, Stanley fell a victim to Henry's jealousy, ambition, and avarice. His post of chamberlain was bestowed on Giles, lord d'Aubeney, a nobleman of great valour and capacity. Besides an estate of three thousand pounds a year, which fell to Henry by the forfeiture of his estates, there were likewise found in Stanley's castle of Holt forty thousand marks in money and plate, together with jewels, furniture, and effects to an immense value; with these Henry consoled himself for the secret curses and imprecations of the people, who not only detested his avarice and ingratitude, but likewise trembled for their own safety, as the chamberlain had suffered for a crime from which very few Englishmen were free, namely, the preferring the title of the house of York to that of the family of Lancaster.

This execution, and several subsequent acts of infamous rapacity, in which Henry neither considered honour nor justice so he could fill his coffers, so much increased his unpopularity, as to give new life to Warbeck's faction, which was rather checked than suppressed. His party in the North began to be in motion; and it appears that in the beginning of this year 1495, some foreigner had landed there, and had endeavoured to stir up the Scottish borderers; for there is, in the Collection of Public Acts, a commission issued out to the earl of Surry, warden of the Scottish Marches, and bishop Fox, whom he had lately translated to the see of Durham, on the twenty-second of March, to array all within their jurisdiction capable of bearing arms, to oppose any invasion from the northward: at the same time the necessary measures were taken to guard the sea-coasts against a foreign invasion.

In the summer Henry, in order to convince the world that the proceedings against sir William Stanley had not at all diminished his regard for his brother, the earl of Derby, who had married his mother, the countess of Richmond, made an excursion to the earl's house at Latham, near Lancaster, where he staid three days, and seemed very well pleased with his entertainment. Much about the same time the king created his second son, Henry, duke of York †, and appointed him warden of the Scottish Marches, in the room of the earl of Surry, who, on account of some impolitic severities, was now entirely removed from that government: Henry also entered into a new negotiation with James IV. king of Scotland. On his return to London, he graced a call of serjeants, at Ely-house, with his presence and that of his queen; a distinction which he was ready to pay, because, as lord Bacon justly observes, "as he governed his subjects by his laws, so he governed his laws by his lawyers."

Hitherto Perkin Warbeck had not ventured to make any attempt in England, knowing that the king was informed of all his correspondence; but as the duchess of Burgundy could not think of relinquishing her hopes of gaining some advantage over Henry by means of this young adventurer, she resolved at length to send him into England, and in the beginning of July Perkin sailed from Flanders, and arrived off Sandwich, on the coast of Kent; which gives some reason to believe that it had been concerted between the party in the North and in the South to make an insurrection in both places at the same time: however that might be, the Kentishmen, who were to a man in Henry's interest, were so well prepared to receive the invaders, that it seemed as if Henry had made a progress into the North with no other view than to tempt his rival to land in a county which he had taken a particular care to secure by a stronger force than any other. Perkin, mistrusting something of this kind, landed a small party only, to sound the disposition of the Kentishmen, and prepare the way for his landing in person with the rest of his forces, which were indeed only a crew of undisciplined foreigners, and their chiefs either unknown, or of little consideration.

The Kentishmen gave this party, consisting of about one hundred and seventy persons, the most friendly reception, in hopes through their means to decoy the whole armament into their power; but finding that Perkin and his friends on board still hesitated, and were not to be inveigled ashore, they took all the party prisoners, and sent them up to London, chained two and two, by sir John Peachy, sheriff of Kent; and no less than one hundred and fifty of them were, by Henry's orders, executed at Tyburn, and their bodies hung upon gibbets along the sea-coasts of Kent, Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. Perkin, upon this miscarriage of his attempt, sailed for Corke in Ireland, where he expected a different reception, but found affairs were altered in that country, by the prudent manner in which Poynings had settled the government there; but the most essential service he did, was the fixing Maurice Fitz Gerald, earl of Desmond, and Gerald Fitz Gerald, earl of Kildare, in Henry's interest, insomuch that Perkin, discouraged by the evident coolness he saw in the behaviour of his former friends, quitted Ireland and sailed for Scotland.

Henry, successful over this effort of his rival and of the duchess of Burgundy, the ever plotting enemy of his family, called a parliament on the thirteenth of October, who secured to him the forfeitures of such as had been put to death, or had taken refuge in sanctuaries and been outlawed upon non-appearance, all of which were now attainted, together with sir George Neville, and some other gentlemen of Perkin's party, taken by the Kentishmen. Henry found his revenues greatly increased by these forfeitures; but, ever thirsting after money, he now procured all the offices in Wales to be voided; he got the wardship of the estate of the lord viscount Beaumont, who was lately become a lunatic; and also made a resumption of the grants which had been made by Edward III. and Richard II. to Edmund of Langley, duke of York: he likewise got the parliament to countenance his illegal exaction of the late benevolence, by ordering the arrears of what people had compounded for, to be levied, which brought immense sums into the king's coffers, as great part of the tax remained unpaid, on account of the short duration of the French war. This session, however, passed several laws, which tended greatly to the ease and advantage of the subject †.

In the course of this year pope Alexander VI. sent into Ireland a bull, empowering all the archbishops and bishops of that kingdom, whom the king should require, and none other, to absolve all rebels in Ireland; a prudent precaution of Henry, to prevent his rival being joined by persons out of despair of living under the present government, on account of their past offences.

On the thirty-first of May this year died, in a very advanced age, Cicely, relict of Richard, duke of York, and daughter of Ralph, earl of Westmoreland, at the castle of Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, and was buried at Fotheringham castle, in Northamptonshire. By her husband she was mother of Edward IV. and Richard III. through the long course of her life she had seen her husband murdered in the field, three princes of her body crowned, and four murdered.

This year likewise is famous for the conquest of Naples by Charles VIII. king of France. As this transaction has a connection with the history of the reign we have now under consideration, it will be necessary to give a brief account of its rise and principal events.

The posterity of Charles of Anjou, first king of Sicily of the house of France, were divided into two branches, whereof one reigned in Naples, and the other in Hungary. After sundry revolutions, the crown of Naples fell at length to Joan, the first of that name; but, in 1380, Charles de Durazzo, of the branch of Hungary, pretending to the same crown, and repairing into Italy, attacked queen Joan, who finding herself pressed, adopted Lewis I. duke of Anjou, uncle to Charles VI. king of France. From that time there was a continual war between the two houses of Anjou. At last, Charles de Durazzo remained in possession of Naples, and was succeeded by Ladislaus his son, who dying in 1414, left the crown of Naples to Joan II. his sister. Mean time Lewis I. duke of Anjou, and Lewis II. his son, always styled themselves kings of Sicily, and preserved their pretensions to Sicily on this side the Pharo, or the kingdom of Naples. Lewis II. who died in 1417, left three sons, namely, Lewis III. Renè, and Charles.

The latter dying in 1481, left Lewis XI. king of France his sole heir. By virtue of which will Charles VIII. son of Lewis XI. pretended the kingdom of Naples was fallen to him.

In pursuance of this claim, in which he was supported by the papal chair, Charles had, with an unprecedented career of success, entered into Italy the year before; but growing so formidable, even the pope himself, who was Alexander VI. and the family of Medicis declared against him. Notwithstanding all those discouragements, he surmounted infinite difficulties; he entered the state of Florence, and obliged Peter de Medicis, its duke, to submit, and the state of Sienna to receive a garrison. Afterwards he approached and entered Rome with his army, while the pope shut himself up in the castle of St. Angelo. At last Charles invested the kingdom of Naples, of which, with its capital, he made himself master; while Alphonso of Arragon, putting the crown of Naples upon the head of his son, the duke of Calabria, went on board his galleys, and took refuge in Sicily. But Charles had entered upon this expedition like a young man: he had no money to pay his troops, but that which he took up at extravagant interest; the continual success of his arms rendered his soldiers and generals excessively haughty and odious to the Italians; he had not men to spare for garrisoning and keeping the places that had submitted; he could not trust the natives; and, when master of his ambition, he neither knew how to retain or how to dispose of his conquests: to crown his misconduct, he fell at variance with Ludovic Sforza, duke of Milan, who had brought him into Italy to support himself against the league formed by the pope, the king of Naples, and Peter de Medicis, to keep him out of his duchy of Milan.

At last Charles, after taking the usual oaths as king of Naples, thought of returning to France, and that too without using any precautions for maintaining his conquests, farther than the oaths and assurances the natives afforded. In the mean while all the states and princes of Italy were alarmed at his progress, and a league was forming at Venice to strip him of his conquests, and cut off his retreat to France. The parties in this league were the pope, the emperor Maximilian, who had already succeeded his father Ferdinand in the empire, the kings of Spain and Naples, the archduke of Austria, Maximilian's son, the duke of Milan, and the republic of Venice. This formidable league, according to our English historians, Henry had no small hand in forming (though in what respect does not appear, nor is it probable he had any hand it), from which he rather escaped than retreated; but before he returned to France, he fought the battle of Fornova, and won it against the forces of the allies, which were treble the number of his army, through the treachery chiefly of the Italian generals*.

The emperor Maximilian now resigned the government of the Low Countries to his son Philip, archduke of Austria, though he was still a minor; and soon after this young prince dispatched an embassy to Henry, in order to renew the treaty of commerce between his dominions and England. Henry was too wise a politician ever to retain a resentment, where it was his interest to forget an affront, and therefore seeming to have forgot the rebuff his ambassadors had met with at the prince's court, he readily embraced a proposal that promised no less advantage to the English than the Flemings, and, on the twenty-fourth of February, 1496 (as I always suppose the year to commence on the first of January), a treaty of peace and perpetual amity was concluded between the two sovereigns, and the laws of commerce were settled to the entire satisfaction of both nations ‡. The archduke also

* It appears from cardinal Bembo, and other Italian authors, that the king of France retired, after this battle, in the utmost hurry; and that Ludovico Sforza, and Francisco Gonzaga, the Italian generals, favoured his escape. As their forces were much superior to those of the French king, they might easily have cut off his retreat, if they had not acted treacherously, as it is undeniably plain they did. See card. Bembo. Hist. Venet. p. 65. edit. 1718. and Paul Jovius, &c.

by one of the articles of the treaty, engaged to hinder the duchess dowager of Burgundy from harbouring or assisting the enemies of the king, and "that if she does, he shall strip her of all the places which she holds by dowry, or otherwise."

We have already observed, that the claimant Perkin, on meeting with a very cold reception in Ireland, had gone over to the court of James IV. king of Scotland. That monarch treated him with great kindness and hospitality, owned him as the son of Edward IV. and appeared so perfectly convinced of his being the true duke of York, that he rejected the proffered alliance of Henry, who this very year sent the bishop of Carlisle, the earl of Surry, the lords Neville and Dacres, and sir William Tyler, to settle the fortune which James was to have with the princess Margaret, Henry's eldest daughter, and also gave the young adventurer in marriage his own kinswoman, the lady Catherine Gordon, daughter of the earl of Huntly, one of the most beautiful and accomplished young ladies of the age, and publicly declared that he would assist him with all his might in recovering the inheritance of his ancestors; and it was agreed by the Scottish council to put this resolution of their monarch into immediate execution. A numerous army being assembled, James, about the middle of this summer, led it in person into Northumberland, attended by the young adventurer, who there published a manifesto, in which he inveighed against Henry as an usurper, tyrant, and murderer, and promised great honours and rewards to those who should join him, their lawful prince, and help to destroy the robber who had usurped his throne*.

This proclamation, though drawn up with great spirit and precision, produced little or no effect; the truth is, that this claimant of the crown could not come in worse company than he did; the Scots were odious to the English nation; the animosity against them ran higher in the North, the usual scene of their depredations, than in any other part of England: James therefore, seeing no prospect of receiving any assistance from the English in that part of the country, and not chusing that his soldiers should lose their labour, ravaged the whole county of Northumberland in a miserable manner: Richard in vain complained in a moving manner of so ruinous a method of making war, protesting he would rather renounce the crown, than purchase it by the desolation of his country; the Scots were too fond of plunder to refrain: but hearing that Henry was sending a superior force against them, they retreated to their own kingdom. We must now attend to the other transactions of this year.

Henry, it seems, had some intimation that the court of France underhand assisted Perkin; for we find that, on the twenty-third of September, he approved and ratified the Venetian league, but excused himself from furnishing any quota of men, because of the great distance between England and Italy†.

On the fifth of March this year, we find in our records‡, that the king granted a patent to John Cabot, a Venetian, and his three sons, for discovering new lands under the English flag, on condition that, after all the expences should be deducted, he should receive one fifth of the profit.

The Scottish invasion furnished Henry with an opportunity to make money out of the misfortunes of his people ||, that he resolved not to let slip; accordingly, having convoked a parliament on the sixteenth of January, 1497, he opened it by a severe speech against the perfidy of the Scots, whose barbarities, he said, went even beyond their most barbarous proceedings in former times; and concluded with telling them, his honour and the protection he owed his people, would not suffer him to let these wrongs pass unrevenged. The parliament, who perfectly well understood his meaning, granted him a supply of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, besides two fifteenths; and as soon as he had obtained this supply, he dissolved the assembly. As he did not like delays where money was to come in, he set his assessors and collectors to work immediately, who proceeded in their business with such inhuman rigour, that he was obliged to recal the lord d'Aubeney, then on his march towards Scotland, to suppress an insurrection of a very serious nature at home.

Of all the inhabitants of England, the Cornishmen were at this time the most sturdy in their inclinations, and the stoutest in their persons: their manner of living and their language were different from those of the rest of England; and in short the crown itself treated them, both at this time and some time after, as an independent people. They had particular reasons for being disaffected at this juncture; for Brittany being now annexed to the crown of France, they were abridged of their commerce and intercourse with that coast and people, who used the same language with themselves.

It was no wonder if so many circumstances concurring, and backed by the demand of a heavy taxation, exasperated the Cornishmen to a high degree: they complained loudly, that what they earned by the sweat of their brows and hard labour in the tin mines, should be exacted from them by exorbitant taxes. These murmurs were encouraged by one Michael Joseph, a popular and factious blacksmith, of Bodmyn, and Thomas Flammock, a lawyer of like turbulent disposition. These two incendiaries, who seem to have been underhand encouraged by persons of greater consequence, friends to young Perkin and his claim, bestirred themselves so effectually among the ignorant populace, that they worked them up to a belief that all subsidies of any kind were illegal and oppressive, and that the nation never could be happy till archbishop Morton and sir Reginald Bray, whom they accused of being the principal advisers of the late heavy imposts, were removed from the king's councils; and the flame of discontent was soon blown to such an height, that, each taking the arms that fury administered, they formed a considerable body, headed by the two demagogues, and marched, to the number of sixteen thousand, from Cornwall, through Devonshire, to Taunton, in Somersetshire, where they killed one of the king's collectors of the subsidy; from whence they proceeded to Wells, where James Touchet, lord Audley, who had a principal share in setting Flammock and the blacksmith to work, put himself at their head.

This nobleman, by his authority, kept the malecontents from committing the least violences or disorders during their march, which they now prosecuted till they came to Winchester, in Hampshire, when, instead of marching directly to London, as common prudence would have directed, and agreeable to their original design declared in their progress, they took it into their heads to turn short and march into Kent, from a ridiculous prepossession, that the people of that county, who had on all occasions shewn themselves zealous for the liberties of the subject, would join them in great numbers; but so far were they from finding their expectation answered, that their numbers, instead of increasing, daily diminished, scarcely one Kentishman declaring in their favour. Proceeding however in their march, they advanced as far as Blackheath, where they encamped between Greenwich and Eltham, to the no small terror of the citizens of London, who dreaded that their wealth might tempt the insurgents to plunder the city.

Fortunately, however, for them and for Henry, the army, which he had provided and sent against the Scots, returned by his orders on the first news of this insurrection, and were now ready to act: Henry accordingly ordered it to the field, and divided it into three bodies, one commanded by the earl of Oxford, another by himself, and the third by the lord d'Aubeney, a general in whom the troops had great confidence.

The earl of Oxford, who had with him Henry Bouchier, earl of Essex, Edmund de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, sir Rice ap Thomas, and sir Humphrey Stanley †, was ordered to take post with the left wing of his division near Lewisham, and to extend his right south-east towards Foot's Cray, so as to secure all the defiles and roads by which the rebels could escape that way.

The lord d'Aubeney was ordered to front the rebels, so that his right wing should form as it were an angle with the earl of Oxford's left.

Henry himself encamped in St. George's Fields, with a strong body in the nature of a reserve.

By this excellent disposition it was impossible for any of the rebels to escape; as they had no shipping, the river Thames hemmed them in towards the north; the earl of Oxford's division cut off their retreat either by the south or the east; and in their front, towards the west, they had two armies.

Henry, by giving out that he intended to attack them on the Monday following, whereas he really intended to give them battle on the Saturday, which of all days in the week he fancied to be most fortunate to him, drew the rebels into a capital mistake; for while their main body lay encamped almost within the heath on Woolwich Common, between Woolwich and Shooter's Hill, their advanced guard lay at Deptford Bridge, without any intermediate line upon the brow of the hill between them and the main body.

On the afternoon of Saturday the twenty-second of June, the lord d'Aubeney made a sudden motion, and attacked the rebels advanced body at Deptford Bridge, whom, after a stout resistance, he drove from their post, and followed them up the hill in close pursuit. The alarm by this time had reached the main body of the rebels, and they were preparing to put themselves in order, when the lord d'Aubeney and all his division appeared upon the top of the hill, from whence advancing to the middle of the heath, they fell upon the Cornishmen with great fury, who received the attack with as great intrepidity: the lord d'Aubeney, charging at the head of his men, was taken prisoner, and the fate of the day might have been favourable to the Cornishmen, had they not been attacked at the same time in the rear by the earl of Oxford with his division; but being charged on all sides, ill-armed, ill-conducted, without either horse or artillery, and much inferior in number, they were soon broken by the king's cavalry, and fifteen hundred or two thousand of them cut in pieces, most of the rest being taken prisoners, with their leaders. As to the royal army, it lost about three hundred men, most of them shot dead with arrows of the length of a taylor's yard, proofs of the amazing strength of the old Cornish! but we read of no person of note killed.

Among the prisoners were the lord Audley, with the two incendiaries Flammock and Joseph; the former was beheaded on Tower-hill*, and the two latter executed at Tyburn†; the rest, being ordinary labourers, were disarmed and sent home, Henry hoping to obliterate the remembrance of former severities by this instance of unusual lenity.

The king of Scotland took advantage of this commotion in England, to make a second inroad upon the northern counties, where he laid siege to Norham castle. The earl of Surry had been ordered by Henry to take the command of the few forces in those counties; and, after the suppression of the Cornish rebellion, the king sent the best of his troops to join that nobleman in Yorkshire, who, being thus reinforced, advanced against the Scots, and obliged them to raise the siege; but they retired with such precipitation, that the earl could not overtake them: he however continued his pursuit, and took the strong castle of Ayton, situated between Berwick and Edinburgh. And thus the campaign was finished with very little loss or gain on either side.

Henry however, willing at all events to keep this troublesome neighbour quiet, and, if possible, draw off James from his connection with his competitor, proposed a fresh negotiation with the Scots, by means of Peter d'Ayala, the Spanish ambassador at Henry's court, who, upon founding James, found him so well inclined towards a pacification, that in a short time it was agreed that both kings should send plenipotentiaries to Ayton, to treat of a peace, d'Ayala performing the office of mediator by the joint consent of both parties, who obliged themselves to stand by his award. A truce was proposed to be made for seven years, the allies of both crowns were included in the same, and it was to be prolonged during the life-time of both kings, and a full year after the decease of the longest liver‡. The greatest difficulty in the negotiation was concerning Perkin Warbeck, the English ambassadors insisting warmly that the person of that pretender should be delivered into their master's hands; but James was firm in his refusal, and all that either d'Ayala or the English ministers could obtain of him, was to send Perkin, in an honourable manner, out of Scotland. Accordingly James, furnishing him with every thing that befitted royal rank, and, putting him and his family and retinue on board three ships, he arrived at Corke in Ireland, on the twenty-first of July; and no farther obstacles remaining, the truce was signed on all sides, at Ayton, on the thirtieth of September.

Before we conclude the transactions of this year, it will not be impertinent to take a cursory view of Henry's situation with regard to the princes of Europe, among whom he had connections.

Philip, archduke of Austria, governor of the Low Countries, not only confirmed the treaty of commerce made with England, but desisted from his demand of one florin for every-piece of broad-cloth sold within his dominions by English merchants.

After the treaty of Estaples, there was neither war nor difference between France and England during the rest of Henry VII's reign. Charles and Henry stood in awe of each other. Charles, who at first had formed vast projects, perceived the king of England was the only prince that could lay obstacles in his way. Afterwards, when he had desisted from the war of Italy, and indulged his pleasures, he always feared that a war with Henry would disturb his tranquility. Henry on his part dreaded all foreign wars, and particularly with France, by reason of his domestic enemies. Thus the two monarchs having the same interest, lived in peace till Charles's death, on the sixth of April 1498. The duke of Orleans, who succeeded him by the name of Lewis XII. was no less careful to preserve a good understanding with England. As he turned his thoughts to Italy, it highly concerned him to keep fair with Henry, who would have it in his power to overthrow all his projects by a diversion in Picardy. As soon as Lewis was on the throne, he caused his marriage with Jane, daughter of Lewis XI. to be annulled, in order to espouse Anne of Brittany, his predecessor's widow. Otherwise he would have run the risk of seeing that duchy once more severed from France, and in the hands of a foreign house.

As to the king and queen of Spain, who now made a great figure in Europe, they continued to cultivate a strict friendship with Henry, which was greatly cemented by the contract of marriage between the princess Catherine and the prince of Wales.

Maximilian, emperor of Germany, continued in the same jealousy of France, and had now the same good disposition with regard to England as before: while the northern crowns had all concluded treaties with Henry. And, towards the close of this year,

Pope Alexander VI. sent him a present of an hallowed sword and a cap of maintenance, which were delivered to him by his holiness's nuncio, with great solemnity, in St. Paul's cathedral.

But though Henry was thus happy in his situation abroad, he still found great uneasinesses in the untoward disposition of his own subjects; for the Cornish rebels, rather hardened than gained over by Henry's late clemency to them, boasted, on their return home, that he had pardoned them only because he was afraid that their deaths or punishment would have roused the whole nation, who were in general of the same way of thinking, to take up arms against the government. These discourses making their friends and neighbours believe the whole kingdom was ready to rise, they began to flock together, and shew they were not discouraged by the battle of Blackheath: at length, some of the most fiery of them hearing that Perkin was in Ireland, proposed to send for him, and set him at their head.

Perkin had found a very cool reception in Ireland, and in a short time saw himself destitute of friends, money, and support; the principal of his abettors now remaining about his person was one Hern a broken mercer, Skelton a taylor, and Astley a scrivener; for Henry had found means to take Frion off. When the proposal of the Cornishmen therefore came to be laid before Perkin and his council, they readily and joyfully embraced it; and, picking up as many followers as he could, amounting, according to lord Bacon, to about one hundred and twenty, embarked on board four small vessels, and landed, on the seventh of September this year 1498, in Whitland Bay, on the coast of Cornwall. As soon as he had landed his little troop, he repaired to Bodmyn, the blacksmith's town who was hanged after the battle of Blackheath. There he quickly got together three thousand men, and issued out a proclamation, in which he assumed the title of king of England, by the name of Richard IV.

Elated with the hopes of victory, where there was no force to oppose them, the hot-headed undisciplined rabble that composed the young claimant's army, resolved to march and lay siege to the city of Exeter, of which they promised themselves an easy conquest. This wild project they put in execution; but being destitute of artillery, and almost every other requisite to form a regular siege, and the inhabitants of Exeter acting like men of spirit, the assailants were, after a vain attempt to scale the walls, repulsed on all sides. In the meantime, several lords and gentlemen of Devonshire and the neighbouring parts, associated in defence of Henry's government, and, drawing forces together, put themselves under arms. The king also, on receiving the news of Perkin's invasion and the steps he was taking, dispatched the lord d'Aubeney, with four thousand men, to the relief of Exeter, spreading a report that he himself was following with a more numerous army.

All this being made known for certain to Perkin, he raised the siege, and drew his men off to Taunton. His army, when at the strongest, was about seven thousand men; but many of those having joined him through hopes of plunder, left him upon breaking up the siege: and here Perkin seems for the first time to have given the lye to his pretensions; the blood of York had never ran in the veins of a coward, which, if we are to credit our historians, Perkin proved himself to be on this occasion; for, after he had rendezvoused his army, and made all the necessary dispositions to fight, when the lord d'Aubeney advanced to attack him, he fled, with threescore horse to the monastery of Beaulieu, in the New Forest, where he and his retinue registered themselves as persons entitled to the benefit of sanctuary.

The lord d'Aubeney hearing of his retreat, detached a party of three hundred horse in pursuit of him; him; but finding him already in the sanctuary, they surrounded the house until they should receive farther instructions. Mean while the rebels, finding themselves deserted by their chief, laid down their arms, and submitted to the mercy of the king, who, with a politic moderation, pardoned them all, except a very few of the most irreclaimable and desperate, whom he capitally punished in terror to others.

The king, who, before Perkin's flight, was lying between Taunton and Exeter with a body of reserve, in case of a battle, now entered Exeter in triumph, and presented the sword which he wore by his side, to the mayor, to whom and his successors he gave the liberty to have it carried before them on all public occasions: he likewise gave them a right to use a cap of maintenance, and bestowed the greatest commendations on the citizens for their courage and loyalty.

But Henry could not think himself in safety till he was master of the pretender's person; he thought if he could once compass this point, that he might be able to satisfy the world, by the methods he should then be in a condition of taking, about an imposture of which it was impossible to convince them otherwise. With this view promises of life and pardon, with other fair means, were used to persuade Perkin to quit his sanctuary, and being destitute of all hopes, knowing no country where he could be received, and apprehending that force would be employed if he did not yield with a good grace, he came out, and was sent under a strong guard to London, whither Henry had gone some days before, and where the unhappy youth was exposed to the insults of an hireling mob as he was carried through the streets to the Tower. Henry, who saw Lambert Simnel every day, could not, it seems, bear the presence of Perkin; but, to gratify his curiosity, it was contrived that he should see him out of a window.

Though Perkin had obtained a pardon, he was still retained in custody, till, weary of confinement and desirous of liberty, he broke loose from his guard, and escaping to the monastery of Shene, which had the privilege of a sanctuary, he implored the prior's intercession for Henry's pardon. The good prior undertook the office, and Henry was prevailed upon to promise the pretender his life; but, in order to render him truly contemptible, he obliged him to sit whole days before Westminster Hall gate, and the most public parts of the city, in the stocks, and to read a paper which he owned to be his confession, and was as follows †.

“ It is first to be known, that I was born in the town of Tournay, in Flanders, and my father's name is John Osbeck; which said John Osbeck was comptroller of the said town of Tournay; and my mother's name is Catherine de Farro; and one of my grand-fires, upon my father's side, was named Dorich Osbeck, who died; after whose death my grand-mother was married unto Peter Flamin, who was receiver of the fore-named town of Tournay and dean of the boatmen that row upon the water or river named le Scheld: and my grand-fire on my mother's side was Peter de Farro, who had in his keeping the keys of the gate of St. John's, within the same town of Tournay: also I had an uncle, called John Stalin, dwelling in the parish of St. Pias, within the same town, who had married my father's sister, whose name was Joan, or Jeane, with whom I lived a certain season; and after was led by my mother to Antwerp, to learn Flemish in the house of a cousin of mine, an officer of the said town, called John Steinbeck, with whom I was the space of half a year. After I returned again to Tournay, by reason of the wars that were in Flanders, and within a year following, I was sent, with a merchant of the said town of Tournay, named Barlow, to the mart of Antwerp, where I fell sick, which sickness continued upon me five months: and the said Barlow set me to board in a skinner's house, that dwelt beside the house of the English nation; and by him I was from thence carried to Barrow market, and I lodged at the sign of the Old Man, where I abode for the space of two months. After this, the said Barlow set me with a merchant of Middleburgh to service, to learn the language, whose name was John Strow, with whom I dwelt from Christmas to Easter; and then I went into Portugal, in company with sir Edward Brampton's wife, in a ship which was called the Queen's Ship. And when I was come thither, then was I put in service to a knight that dwelt in Lisbon, who was called Peter Vaiz de Cogna, with whom I dwelt a whole year; which said knight had but one eye. And because I had a mind to see other countries, I took licence of him, and then put myself in service of a Breton, Pregent Meno, who brought me with him into Ireland. Now when we were arrived in the town of Corke, they of the town (because I was arrayed with some cloaths of silk of my said master's) came unto me, and threatened upon me, that I should be the duke of Clarence's son, that was before time at Dublin.

“ But inasmuch as I denied, there were brought unto me the holy Evangelists and the cross, by the mayor of the town, who was called John Llewellyn, and there, in the presence of him and others, I took mine oath (as the truth was), that I was not the aforesaid duke's son, nor none of his blood. After this came unto me an Englishman, whose name was Stephen Poiton, and one John Water, and laid to me, in swearing great oaths, that they knew I was king Richard's bastard son; to whom I answered, with like oaths, I was not. They then advised me not to be afraid, but that I should take it upon me boldly; and if I would so do, they would aid and assist me with all their power against the king of England; and not only they, but they were well assured that the earls of Desmond and Kildare would do the same; for they cared not what part they took, so that they might be revenged upon the king of England: and so, against my will, made me learn English, and taught me what I should do and say; and after this they called me duke of York, second son to king Edward IV. because king Richard's bastard son was in the hands of the king of England. Upon this the said Water, Stephen Poiton, John Tyler, Hubert Burgh, with many others, did assemble themselves, and the French king sent an ambassador to Ireland, whose name was Loit Lucas, and Mr. Stephen Frion, to advertise me to come into France; thence I went into France, thence into Flanders, from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, and so into England.”

Lord Bacon observes of this confession (which some writers will have to be extorted from the young man by the rack ), “ That the king, in what he did now, did himself no right; for (proceeds this noble author) as there was a laboured tale of particulars of Perkin's father and mother, grand-father and grand-mother, uncles and cousins, by names and surnames, and from what places he travelled up and down, so there was little or nothing to purpose of any thing concerning his designs, or any practices that had been held with him, nor was the duchess of Burgundy herself (whom all the world knew to be the person that had put life and being into the whole business) so much as named or pointed at; so that men missing what they looked for, looked for they knew not what, and were in more doubt than before." Some, however, believed the king was thus silent out of complaisance to the king of France, the emperor, the archduke, his aunt the duchess of Burgundy, and the king of Scotland, all of whom had abetted the imposture, if it was one; and that there were even some English lords engaged in the plot, against whom, on account of their great credit and popularity, Henry did not think proper to proceed. But now, leaving Perkin to his sufferings, and Henry to his triumph, we will notice the other principal transactions of this year.

I have already observed, that in the years 1495 and 1496, Henry empowered his ambassadors to treat of a marriage between Margaret, his daughter, and the king of Scotland: this affair was again brought on the carpet this year, in an interview which James had with Fox, bishop of Durham, at Melrose, to settle some dispute which had arisen between the two nations, on account of mutual depredations committed by the borderers on both sides; and here it was that the articles were proposed of that marriage, which afterwards effected the union of both kingdoms under one head. This affair, however, was not finished till January, 1502, owing to a strong opposition in Henry's council at this time, who would by no means hearken to an alliance, which, in case of the extinction of Henry's male issue, might bring the kingdom of England under the government of a king of Scotland.

Great part of this year was spent in negotiations between Henry and Lewis XII of France, which latter not only renewed all the family and national treaties between them, but also engaged to continue the payment of the yearly sum of fifty thousand livres. Henry likewise concluded a new marine treaty, for preventing all piracies and depredations between the subjects of the two kingdoms by sea; and a separate article passed between the two kings, that the one should give no shelter or support to the rebels of the other†.

The year 1498 ended with an accident which gave the king no small concern. Whilst he was at his palace of Shene, in Surry, a fire broke out, on the twenty-ninth of December, with that violence that in a few hours the building was entirely consumed, with all the rich furniture. As Henry was very fond of that palace, he caused it to be rebuilt from the ground in a more magnificent manner, and gave it the name of Richmond, from his title whilst earl, which name it retains to this day.

In the beginning of the year 1499, one Patrick, an Augustine friar, finding a disciple, the son of a shoe-maker, by name Edward Wilford, fit for his purpose, tutored him into an earl of Warwick, who, he gave out, had escaped from the Tower. The friar had the impudence to preach publicly, about the county of Kent, that this was the true earl of Warwick, and to exhort the people to take up arms in his favour. Notwithstanding the impudence of this imposture, the actors would not have been without their followers, had not the government used great diligence in apprehending both the pupil and the preceptor, the former of whom was hanged, and the other condemned to perpetual imprisonment.

This attempt served as a sufficient excuse for Henry to free himself at once from all his uneasinesses occasioned by Perkin and the earl of Warwick; he was also furnished with a still more plausible pretext by the inconsiderate behaviour of Perkin himself, whose intriguing spirit led him into a plot which deprived him of his life. He had tampered so effectually with four servants belonging to sir John Digby, lieutenant of the Tower, that they had actually engaged to assist him in making his escape; and, by their contrivance, he entered into a close correspondence with the earl of Warwick, who was confined in the same prison of the Tower. That unhappy prince, who, from his earliest youth had been cut off from all social intercourse‡, had fallen into a simplicity that rendered him susceptible of any impression, and he agreed with Perkin to take the first opportunity of escaping, which they perceived could not be done without killing sir John Digby. Perkin, however, undertook to conduct the whole enterprize.

This conspiracy could not long escape the quick and penetrating eye of Henry; it has even been affirmed by some historians, that the scheme was contrived by himself, in order to draw Perkin and Warwick into the snare: however this might be, Henry ordered both the earl and Perkin to take their trials for their lives. Perkin, on the sixteenth of November, was brought up to Westminster Hall, before a commission of Oyer and Terminer, and tried as a foreigner, condemned, and sentenced to be hanged, which sentence he suffered at Tyburn, on the twenty-third of the same month, together with Waters, the mayor of Corke, who had been his constant companion in all his adventures. Such was the end of Perkin Warbeck, who had been acknowledged for lawful king, in Ireland, France, Flanders, England, and Scotland, and been the moth that for a long time had preyed on Henry's quiet. Perhaps he might have succeeded in his designs, had he been to deal with a less political prince: however, it is certain the public was never thoroughly satisfied of Perkin's being an impostor. As to his confession which, if we may believe our historians, he read, declaring it to be true, it is upon the whole a loose, unconnected, improbable narrative; whereas one might have expected, had he been sincere, a very instructive and particular detail of a deep-laid and well-conducted conspiracy. On the other hand, may we not, without sinning against probability, suppose him to have been influenced by hopes given him of pardon even to the last moments of his life?

years old, and had been a prisoner fifteen years, and kept so from the company of men and beasts, that he is said not to have known a goose from a capon.

As to that unhappy prince the earl of Warwick, he was brought down to take his trial before the earl of Oxford, created lord high-steward of England for that purpose. He was accused, not of attempting his escape (for as he was not committed for any crime, an attempt of that nature was not arraignable), but of forming a design to disturb the government, and raise an insurrection in favour of Perkin, and to destroy the king. The poor earl, void of all knowledge of man's deceit, was persuaded to confess his indictment, and thereupon received sentence, which the unrelenting Henry suffered to be executed on him, on Tower Hill, on the twenty-eighth of November, 1499, and in him perished the last heir male of the house of York. The shedding of this innocent blood cried aloud for vengeance; in vain did Henry endeavour to lessen the odium of the crime, by dividing it with his ally Ferdinand, king of Spain, who, he said, refused to give his daughter in marriage to Arthur, while one prince of the family of York remained alive; the people held the Spanish cruelty and inflexibility as no excuse: the prince of Wales and the princess Catherine had been actually married the May before by proxy †, Dr. de Puebla, a Spanish lawyer, representing the princess.

Lewis XII. had solemnly ratified and sworn to the peace of Estaples a little after his accession to the crown; but being desirous to shew Henry he really intended to keep it, he caused it to be approved and ratified by the states general, assembled at Nantes in the beginning of the year: then he sent ambassadors to the pope, to pray him to confirm it by his authority. The pope, seeing no farther obstacle from France, issued out a bull of excommunication against whoever of the two kings should not observe the treaty.

Having thus secured the friendship of Henry, Lewis put himself at the head of his army, entered Italy, and, after taking several places, forced the duke of Milan, Ludovico Sforza, to fly to Inspruck, after losing all his duchy except the castle of Milan.

The year 1500 was ushered in with a dreadful plague, which swept off upwards of thirty thousand people within the city of London only, among whom was cardinal Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, a prelate of great experience in business, a supple tool to Henry's will, and a man of whom we find not the least vestige upon record that he possessed any one virtue of humanity; accordingly his death furnished a subject of the highest exultation to all the kingdom, especially the poor and middling families, whose faces he had long ground by his diabolical knack at inventing the most oppressive taxes, and enforcing the payment of them by the most cruel methods. He was succeeded in the see of Canterbury by Henry Deane, bishop of Salisbury.

As this year was the beginning of a new century, the see of Rome, ever watchful of opportunities to fleece or to delude the people, now published a jubilee; those who lived at a great distance from Rome were allowed to purchase, for a certain sum, the privileges of the jubilee without being obliged to repair to Rome, according to the received custom. In order to levy the money arising from this indulgence, Alexander dispatched commissioners into all the states of Christendom, and appointed a Spaniard, by name Gaspar Pons, as his agent in England, who collected large sums for the use of the papal see: but when he applied to Henry, in his holiness's name, to make one in a crusade which had been planned against the Turks, and in which each prince of Europe had his particular department allotted him, Henry, who, from the known character of pope Alexander, concluded that his only aim was to amass money by contributions for this enterprize, and having several things depending at the pope's court at this time, did not think fit to disoblige his holiness, returned an answer very vague, but very respectful; he excused himself from attending on the expedition in person, but offered to contribute a large sum of money; but then this promise was made on condition that some good towns on the coast of Italy might be put into his hands, as a security for the sums he might advance.

Though it is evident from the whole of this answer (which is to be found in lord Bacon's Life of Henry VII.) that Henry at that time both declined and despised the proposal, yet his pompous professions of zeal for the interest of religion wrought so much in his favour abroad, that the knights of Rhodes chose him protector of their order. Alexander having pretty well stored his coffers, the affair of the crusade vanished into air.

The plague continuing to rage in England, Henry, about the middle of May this year, thought fit to remove with his court to Calais, in the neighbourhood of which place he had a conference with Philip, archduke of Austria, in which they discussed the means of improving the good understanding between their two people. It is said they had likewise some conversation about a closer alliance, by the intermarriage of the king of England's second son, Henry, with the archduke's sister; and between the princess Mary, Henry's second daughter, and the archduke's son Charles; but the parties being all too young, the matter went no farther than a proposal, and the marriage never took effect*.

Soon after the king's return to London, two bulls arrived from the pope, the one subjecting the person of Lewis XII. of France to an excommunication, and his kingdom to an interdict, if he should ever fail in paying Henry the fifty thousand crowns agreed upon by the treaty of Estaples; and another of dispensation for the marriage between James IV. king of Scotland, and Margaret, the eldest daughter of Henry, which had, by several negotiations in the course of this and the preceding year, been brought pretty nearly to a conclusion; the young lady, who was but ten years and six months old, was within the fourth degree of consanguinity to king James.

Henry's thoughts, however, were not so taken up by these alliances as to make him forget any means of filling his coffers: he was already possessed of more personal riches than any sovereign in Europe; but his avarice seemed to increase in proportion as it was gratified. He now issued out commissions for imposing fines and redemptions upon all persons in the counties of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, and Devon, that should be found to have favoured in any respect the Cornishmen, when they rose, three years before, under Perkin Warbeck or the lord Audley. With the like view of fleecing the subject, he, about the same time, issued orders to all the sheriffs throughout England to summon all gentlemen having forty pounds a year in land, to come before the next Candlemas, and receive knighthood. Never was king of England more hated by his subjects, though this hatred was mingled with fear, produced by his uninterrupted success, and the opinion of his great abilities, both as a monarch and politician. All the powers upon the continent courted his alliance, and all the malecontents of England, were over-awed into a peaceful acquiescence.

Notwithstanding this felicity, the busy, restless, furious passion of jealousy still encroached upon his repose. Henry was of a disposition never to be easy under the smallest ground of apprehension, and an accident happened towards the close of this year, which not a little disturbed him. Edmund de la Pole, second son of John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth, eldest sister of Edward IV. was, on the death of his elder brother, John earl of Lincoln, who was slain in the battle of Stokefield, deemed the next lineal heir to the crown, whenever the lines of Edward or of George, duke of Clarence, should become extinct: the prospect was remote, but Henry's hatred and fears of the house of York made him look with a jealous eye even upon the remotest branches of that family. Upon the death of John, duke of Suffolk, in 1491, Edmund claimed inheritance of his title and estates; but Henry had obliged him to compromise, by giving up the title of duke, a dignity he, by his extravagance, was in no condition to support, and, in consideration of this cession, he was allowed to retain the lands of the earldom, with the dignity of earl of Suffolk.

The earl was a nobleman of tried courage, but immoderately passionate: he had, about this time, the misfortune to kill a man in one of his furious sallies; and, though he was a branch of the house of York, the king did consent to indulge him with a pardon, but, in order to leave a stigma upon his character, he obliged him to appear at the bar of the King's Bench court, and plead the royal pardon like a common felon. This touched the earl's pride so sensibly, that he fled over to Flanders, and resided at the duchess dowager of Burgundy's court. Henry was not a little alarmed at his retreat; he thought he saw a new pretender ready to dispute with him his throne; and, in order to anticipate any designs he might hatch to his prejudice, he sent over emissaries, who, by dint of promises and professions, persuaded him to return and be reconciled to the government. The earl accepted of the invitation, and came back to England, where he plunged into all his former excesses, to the ruin of his character and fortune. Before we close this year, it will be necessary briefly to mention what passed in Italy.

After Lewis XII. was become master of the duchy of Milan, he turned his thoughts to the conquest of Naples. Though probably he might alone have conquered that kingdom, he made however an alliance with the king of Arragon, whereby they agreed to join their forces, and share the conquest between them: Ferdinand was to have Apulia and Calabria; and Lewis the city of Naples, Abruzzo, and Terra di Lavarò. The treaty being signed, Ferdinand sent an army into Italy, under the command of the famous Gonzalvo, commonly called the Great Captain. Lewis gave the conduct of his army to d'Aubigni, the earl of Gallazzo, and Cæsar Borgia, the pope's bastard, who, having quitted the cardinalate, was become duke of Valentinois. The French fleet was commanded by Philip of Cleves, lord of Ravenstein. In a very short space, each of the two kings became master of the portion assigned him by the treaty; and the unfortunate Frederick, king of Naples, was forced to cast himself upon the mercy of Lewis XII. who sent him to live in France, with a pension of thirty thousand crowns.

The year 1501 produces nothing remarkable for history to transmit, save the marriage of Arthur, prince of Wales, with the princess Catherine of Spain. According to Stowe, that princess arrived at Plymouth on the second day of October, and the nuptials were celebrated at London, with great pomp and solemnity on the fourteenth of November, the prince being then turned of fifteen, and the lady about the age of eighteen. Her dower amounted to two hundred thousand ducats, in money, jewels, and plate; and the third part of the principality of Wales, dukedom of Cornwall, and earldom of Chester, was assigned to her as a jointure, provided her husband should die before his accession to the throne†.

This year we find the first mention upon our records of the famous Thomas, afterwards cardinal Woolsey, who was then rector of the parish-church of Limington, in Hampshire, and master of arts, and had now a bull from the pope for enjoying of two livings*.

The marriage of prince Arthur was succeeded by the contract of another match between the king of Scotland and Henry's daughter Margaret, her father having over-ruled all opposition of his council, by convincing them that even if the crown of England should devolve to the king of Scotland, in default of his (Henry's) male issue, that in such case Scotland would become an accession to England, as the smaller would always be swallowed up in the greater dominion; a political prediction which we have found fully verified.

All matters being adjusted between the plenipotentiaries on both sides on the twelfth of February, 1502, the marriage articles between the king of Scotland and the princess Margaret were engrossed. As this was, perhaps, in its consequences, the most remarkable transaction of Henry's reign, we shall here give an abstract of the articles, which will shew the depth of Henry's policy, and the soundness of his judgment.

"I. That James, king of Scotland, shall, at Candlemas next, in person or by his proxy, marry the princess Margaret (who, on the last day of November by-past, had attained the full age of twelve years), and that no exceptions shall be made against their consanguinity or affinity, both having been beforehand dispensed with by the sovereign pontiff.

† The magnificence of Henry's court, and the profuseness of this marriage ceremony, must be surprising even to a modern reader, who will have some idea of the manners and improved luxury of this age, by Stowe's account of this ceremony, p. 482, 483. of his Annals.

* Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xii. p. 783.

"II. That

"II. That the said princess shall be conveyed, at the charges of the said king her father, and delivered to her said husband, or to any impowered by him to receive her, at Lamberton Kirk, about the beginning of September, 1503, and not till then.

"III. That, before the first day of July, 1503, the said princess be legally infeoffed and seised in all the lands, castles, &c. which the queen's dowager of Scotland usually enjoy; and if all these lands, &c. be not found to yield the yearly revenue of two thousand pounds English, or, which was then the same, six thousand pounds Scots money, that her said husband shall assign her as many other lands as will make up the deficiency.

"IV. That the said princess shall be allowed always by her at least twenty-four servants of the English nation, men or women, as she shall incline, over and above her Scottish domestics; and that all these shall be maintained at the charges of the king her husband, who shall give her every year the sum of one thousand pounds Scots, or five hundred marks sterling, by equal proportions, at the feasts of Easter and Michaelmas, to be disposed of at her pleasure.

"V. That, in case of the death of the said king her husband, she shall be allowed to reside within or without the kingdom of Scotland, as she shall think fit; and although she should think fit to reside without the kingdom, yet her whole jointure, amounting to the aforesaid sum of two thousand pounds sterling, or six thousand pounds Scots, shall be faithfully paid.

"VI. That the king her father shall pay for her portion, to the said king James her husband, thirty thousand pieces of gold called angel-nobles, or the equivalent in the current coin of England; whereof ten thousand to be paid at Edinburgh, eight days after the consummation of the marriage; other ten thousand on the same day of the ensuing year, 1504, at Coldingham; and the last ten thousand towards the end of the year 1505.

"VII. That in case the said princess shall chance to die without issue before the complete payment of her portion, the remainder unpaid shall be no more due; but if she should chance to leave issue behind, then the whole shall be faithfully paid, as if she was alive*."

At the same time a peace was concluded between both kingdoms, upon the following terms:

"I. That, in all times to come, there shall be a sincere, complete, and inviolable peace, friendship, and league between the most illustrious and excellent princes, James, king of Scotland, and Henry, king of England, their heirs and lawful hereditary successors, their kingdoms, and subjects, whether ecclesiastic or laic, &c.

"II. That neither of the said kings shall favour the rebellious subjects of the other, directly or indirectly, but shall, on the contrary, commit them to prison as soon as they are known to be such.

"III. That all safe-conducts granted, or promises made, to any of the English rebels by king James, shall be recalled, and never renewed; and vice versa.

"IV. If either of the said kings shall be attacked by another emperor, king, prince, &c. that the king who is not attacked shall assist him who is, and with as many forces as shall be required, provided that these forces be maintained at the charges of that king to whose assistance they shall be sent.

"V. That the king of Scotland shall not molest or besiege the town or castle of Berwick; nor shall the inhabitants thereof give any disturbance to the subjects of the said king of Scotland.

"VI. That the fish garth of Esk shall be equally free to the subjects of both kingdoms, so that either the Scots or English may break or repair without being quarrelled by either of the kings.

"V. That the allies of both kings shall be comprehended in the treaty, namely, the king of the Romans; Lewis, king of the French; the kings of Spain, Portugal, and Denmark; the archduke of Austria; the dukes of Venice, Ferrara, and Savoy; and the Hanse Towns of Germany, on the part of king Henry: and on that of king James; Lewis, king of France; John, king of Denmark; the king of Spain, the king of the Romans, the archduke of Austria, the dukes of Gueldres, Alsace, and Cleves, and the marquis of Brandenburg: that all these shall be informed of the treaty, and be invited to come into it, within eight months; and if they do not accept of the offer, they are in that case to be considered as unconcerned: as also, that if the king of England shall chance to make war with any of the said allies of the king of Scotland, the said king of Scotland may assist his said ally with auxiliary forces, to be sent to his assistance and defence; but shall not offer to make a diversion on his behalf by attempting any thing against England itself; & vice versa: so that the peace between the two kingdoms shall remain inviolable, as before.

"VIII. In case, which God forbid, that the said king James, or princess Margaret, should die before the consummation of their marriage, the peace shall nevertheless continue, unless either of the kings, their heirs or successors, do make known to the other, within two months after the decease of the said king or princess, that he will not adhere to the treaty. And,

"IX. In that case, that is to say although the peace should not take effect, by reason of the death of either of the parties, or non-delivery of the princess at the time appointed, yet the truce formerly concluded shall continue during the life of both the said kings, and one year longer.

"X. That both kings shall obtain a ratification of the present treaty from the pope, before the first day of July, 1503; and that the party breaking shall submit himself to the sentence of excommunication, and be actually excommunicated†.

Henry had carried a great point in this treaty, by re-annexing Berwick for ever to the crown of England; but, not contented with that, he used every method of flattery and entreaty that he could devise, in order to detach James from any of his engagements with the court of France: James went so far in his complaisance to his future father-in-law, as to promise him all that he desired. Henry, on his part, shewed so great an earnestness to preserve a good understanding with his right dear and entirely beloved son, as he calls him, that he gave the bishop of Murray, the Scottish ambassador at his court, a list of the names of those who were to attend his daughter to Scotland; but the consummation of the marriage was, on account of the tender years of the princess, deferred till the ensuing year.

But the joy occasioned by this union was too quickly damped by the death of Arthur, prince of Wales, who expired at Ludlow castle, where he resided, on the second day of April, about five months after his nuptials. His fate was deeply lamented by the people of England, who flattered themselves with the prospect of a happy reign under a prince of his accomplishments; and in about six months after his decease, his brother Henry was, in the twelfth year of his age, created prince of Wales and earl Chester.

About this period the king received an embassy from the emperor Maximilian, proposing a league against the Turks, and desiring the loan of ten thousand pounds sterling, to be employed in reducing the rebels; which Henry granted, and at the same time concluded a treaty of commerce, friendship, and alliance with him, to remain in force for one year after the death of the longest liver: he also sent sir Thomas Brandon and Dr. West as his commissioners to invest Maximilian with the order of the Garter.

And now the spirit of faction being entirely quelled among the English, and Henry's throne and family established by every success and precaution that can give duration to empire, he had it in his power to have rendered himself the most amiable, as he was the most fortunate, of monarchs; but his avarice, which was insatiable, increased with his years, and was continually prompting him to try new methods to amass riches, which he seems to have coveted merely for the sake of possessing them and not to use them, since few persons were ever better economists than himself. Morton was dead, and he now chose for the agents of his rapaciousness sir Richard Empson and Edward Dudley. Empson was the son of a sieve-maker, and by the boldness of his measures endeavoured to conceal the meanness of his birth. Dudley was a man of fortune and family, as well as of great abilities, all which render his memory, if possible, more execrable than that of his fellow-labourer in iniquity. Empson served as the saw (says a modern historian), Dudley as the razor of oppression in the hands of Henry: such was the insolence of these two infamous ministers, that they did not even observe the common forms of justice, but proceeded with the most arbitrary licentiousness to fleece the subject; and such who would not tamely yield up their property were imprisoned, fined, and some even executed in consequence of private trial, without fair examination or verdict of jury. Henry, who shared the fruits of this oppression, covered the authors with the ægis of his authority: informers, promoters, quest-mongers, and the like vermin, swarmed over the face of the land; while Henry was deaf and insensible to the groans of the oppressed and the reproaches of his people. The two following anecdotes, as handed down to us by the lord Bacon, will serve to shew us, that as Henry let slip no opportunity for amassing money, however base or ungrateful it might be, he was also meanly mechanical in the pursuit of oppression, and even affected to observe a conscientiousness in the methods of injustice.

To the family of Vere the house of Lancaster owed more than it did to any in the kingdom: the earl of Oxford, the head of that family, and one who had been the most strenuous in the cause of Henry, having one day magnificently entertained his sovereign at his castle of Henningham, upon the king's taking his leave the earl's servants, wearing their master's livery and badges, were ordered to form a long row on each side of the hall through which Henry passed, who, perceiving a greater number of domestics in livery than the law against retainers allowed the earl to maintain, said to him, "My lord, I have heard much of your hospitality, but it exceeds all report: are all these gentlemen and yeomen your menial servants?" Oxford answering, that he had retained them only on that occasion, to do his highness the more honour, Henry was mean enough to make him this reply, "By my faith, my lord, I thank you for my good cheer; but I may not endure to have my laws broken in my sight; my attorney must speak to you." The earl was afterwards put to so much trouble for this unseasonable magnificence, that he was obliged to compound for his offence, by paying a fine of fifteen thousand marks.

The noble author just quoted informs us likewise, that he had seen a book of accòmpts of Empson's, that had the king's hand subscribed in almost every leaf: among other articles he found the following, "Item, received of (such a one) five marks for a pardon, which if it do not pass, the money to be repaid, or the party otherwise satisfied:" opposite to this memorandum was another, in the king's own hand, in these words, "Otherwise satisfied."

Nothing extraordinary passed in England the rest of this year, except the following events, which we shall cursorily note.

James and Henry were employed in confirming and ratifying their late treaties, and swearing to observe them. We find in the Collection of Public Acts*, that James observing that the title of king of France, given to Henry, had slipped into his oath, he ordered a public instrument to be drawn up, to disclaim giving Henry that title, and to have the same erased; but James at the same time expressed his readiness of renewing his oath as often as Henry should think proper.

On the fifth of August, this year, died sir Reginald Bray, knight of the Garter, often mentioned in these pages, of whom Hall† gives the following character, "He was the very father of his country, a sage and grave person, and a fervent lover of justice, who would often admonish the king, when he did any thing contrary to justice or equity." About the same time likewise died Henry Deane, who had succeeded Morton as archbishop of Canterbury, and was himself succeeded by Dr. Warham, bishop of Lincoln, a very great politician and an able negociator, who was often employed by Henry in treaties of the greatest consequence.

On the ninth of December, this year, Henry gave a patent to James Elliot and Thomas Ashurst, merchants of Bristol, to John Gonzalez and Francis Fernandez, natives of Portugal, to go with English colours in quest of unknown countries, upon certain terms expressed in the patent, which is to be found at large in the Collection of Public Acts *.

About this time (according to Stowe the annalist†) were brought to court three men, taken in the new-found islands by Sebastian Cabot, the Venetian. They were cloathed in the skins of beasts, and spoke a language unknown. Two of them were seen two years after at the king's court at Westminster, dressed like Englishmen, neither could they be distinguished from such.

In the beginning of the year 1503‡, Henry, to complete the measure of his happiness, lost his wife Elizabeth, whom he had endured for the sake of decency to remain the partner of his bed and state: she died in child-bed, within the Tower, and the child died soon after. Henry's hatred to the house of York was extended to this princess, nor could all her virtues, her beauty, or her merit, ever conquer that innate aversion to her family: the concern he gave her by confining the queen her mother in a convent, and confiscating all her estate, is said by some to have hastened her death.

The conduct of the king and his ministers had by this time rendered them extremely odious to the people, who murmured incessantly against the government, and so loudly that it came to Henry's ears, who was not a little alarmed thereat, and his apprehensions were farther increased by the following event.

The vast profusion of money in dress and equipage on account of the wedding of the late prince Arthur and the princess Catherine of Spain, had run several noblemen in debt, and among the rest Edmund, earl of Suffolk, of whom we have already spoken. He had borrowed large sums for that purpose, and, either pressed by his debts, or having reason to apprehend his life in danger from Henry, who had, ever since his return from Flanders, set spies about his person, and whose jealousy he knew to be equally fatal and incurable, the earl fled again, in February, or the beginning of March, this year, over into Flanders, with his brother Richard, whose fine accomplishments and great merit had recommended him to the post of first gentleman of the bed-chamber to prince Arthur.

The king, alarmed at the earl's going off, and suspecting that he was engaged in practices against his crown and state before his departure, and had his accomplices, was eager to know his scheme, and the names of those who had favoured his flight or corresponded with him during his retreat; and, to satisfy himself in these points, repeated the expedient he had so successfully used in the case of Perkin Warbeck, and privately employed a spy, one sir Robert Curson, governor of the castle of Hammes, near Calais, who, being properly instructed, abandoned his charge on pretence of disaffection to the government, and retired to Flanders, where he offered his service to the earl of Suffolk, then at the court of the old duchess dowager of Burgundy.

The earl, not suspecting his design, admitted him into his intimacy, and, without reserve, disclosed to him the names of several persons of distinction, who were his correspondents, and who, in their letters, which he shewed to this treacherous confidant, had spoken pretty freely of their dislike to the king's measures; all which the knight punctually communicated to Henry. The result of this was, that all the earl's correspondents were immediately seized; and, among others, the lord Courtney, son and heir to the earl of Devonshire, and husband to the lady Catherine, daughter to Edward IV. sir James Tyrrel, sir John Wyndham, the lord Abergavenny, and sir Thomas Green; but the two latter were discharged. Of the others, sir John Wyndham and sir James Tyrrel only were beheaded, while the rest were hanged. As to sir James Tyrrel, there is the strongest reason for believing that he died without giving any account that was satisfactory to the government, concerning the death of Edward IV's two sons, because if he had, it would undoubtedly have been published.

Henry was not yet satisfied; he was desirous to get at the bottom of that plot he suspected was hatching against him: he therefore ordered Curson to continue his correspondence, and fell upon the following extraordinary method to give that informer a high degree of credit with the earl of Suffolk; he caused Innocent VIII's bull of excommunication to be published at St. Paul's Cross against all persons that should disturb him in possession of the throne, and ordered the names of the earl of Suffolk and sir Robert Curson to be particularly mentioned therein: but as soon as the latter had, by the help of this trick, wormed every thing out of Suffolk that he thought necessary for the service of his employer, he was ordered over to England, where Henry received him into particular favour. The earl, finding by this that he was betrayed, and receiving but small encouragement from the duchess of Burgundy, who was probably tired of being the continual screen to the disaffected English, without any hopes of prejudicing the possessor of that throne, he led for some time a vagrant life in Germany, and at length threw himself upon the protection of Philip, archduke of Austria, who received him, notwithstanding his treaties with Henry, who, knowing that the earl had not a party in England to support him, shewed no farther uneasiness about him for the present.

On the sixteenth of June, this year, all the necessary preparations, which were extremely magnificent, being accomplished, the princess Margaret was sent to Scotland; the king her father conducting her from Richmond, in Surry, as far as Yorkshire, where he took leave of her, after ordering the earls of Northumberland and Surry, with a very pompous retinue of noble personages, to attend her to Edinburgh, where the marriage was celebrated with extraordinary magnificence on the eighth of August.

Henry, prince of Wales, was now about thirteen years of age, of pregnant parts, and of a robust constitution. His father had designed him for the church, and therefore he had received a more liberal education than had been given to his elder brother. By the death of this latter, however, he was now become apparent heir to the crown; and the king saw, with infinite regret, that he should be obliged to refund the fortune which he had received for his late son with the princess Catherine, unless he could fall on some means to elude the treaty on that head. As nothing carried with it the appearance of dishonesty that tended to the getting or saving of money, in the eye of this avaricious monarch, he bethought himself of the expedient of bringing about a marriage between young Henry and the widow of his late brother, on pretence that the former marriage had never been consummated by the parties; and accordingly he caused the proposal to be made to the king and queen of Spain. Ferdinand and Isabella, having as little delicacy in matters of interest as Henry himself, lent a ready ear to the overture, and quickly agreed to the match, provided the pope's dispensation could be obtained. This agreement we find in the Collection of Public Acts, dated June 23, 1503*.

Alexander VI. dying in the summer of this year, was succeeded by Pius III. who himself not outliving the eighteenth of October, Julius II. was elected, on the first of November, into the papal chair, and it was to him that the two courts applied for the dispensation. This pontiff, who was a mortal enemy to the French king, was very fond of an opportunity to oblige Henry, and thereby bring him into his interest. Accordingly, on the twenty-sixth of December, he granted a bull for dispensing with the marriage of Henry, prince of Wales with Catherine, the widow of his deceased brother. This bull, as we find it quoted in bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation†, was to the following effect:

"That he (the pope), in the fullness of his authority, having received a petition from prince Henry and the princess Catherine, bearing, that whereas the princess was lawfully married to prince Arthur, who was dead without issue, though the said marriage was perhaps consummated by carnal copulation, but they being desirous to marry, for preserving the peace between the crowns of England and Spain, did petition his holiness for his dispensation; therefore the pope, out of his care to maintain peace among all catholic kings, did absolve them from all censures under which they might lie, and dispensed with the impediment of their affinity, notwithstanding any apostolical constitutions or ordinances to the contrary, and gave them leave to marry; or, if they were already married, he, confirming it, required their confessor to enjoin them some healthful penance for their having married before the dispensation was obtained."

It was necessary to give so much of this bull, on account of the important consequences this affair produced in the following reign.

Towards the close of this year, Henry bestowed the office of lord high-steward of England on the earl of Surry, for trying the lord Dudley, who had been indicted for a felony committed in Staffordshire.

As to foreign affairs, we have to observe, that Philip, archduke of Austria, having been on a visit to the king and queen of Spain, returned this year into Flanders. As he passed through France, he endeavoured to adjust a difference between king Ferdinand, his father-in-law, and Lewis XII. concerning the kingdom of Naples; he even took upon him to conclude, in Ferdinand's name, a treaty which was afterwards disclaimed. Had he been concerned with a prince of less goodness and equity than Lewis XII. that disclaiming might have thrown him into great trouble; but Lewis was too generous to take the advantage. The occasion, in short, of the rupture between the two monarchs was this:

They had, as hath been observed divided the kingdom of Naples, after conquering it. It was hardly possible that these two princes should long possess the portion fallen to each, without some occasion of quarrel; accordingly a dispute arose concerning the province of Capitanata, which each would have to be in his division: whereupon the French and Spaniards came to blows. At first the French had the advantage, but afterwards lost two battles, one near St. Severina, in Calabria, on the twenty-first of April, the other on the twenty-eighth of the same month, at Cerignoles, where the duke de Nemours, their general, was slain. After these two victories, Gonzalvo, who commanded Ferdinand's troops, became master of the whole kingdom of Naples. Lewis, desirous to repair his losses, sent a powerful army into Italy, which was, by sundry unforeseen accidents, rendered unserviceable.

Henry was not fond of parliaments, yet he held them when he found any tolerable prospect of getting a supply; with this view he assembled the two houses on Thursday, January 25, 1504, in order to obtain an equivalent for two ancient aids due to the crown, on account of the knighthood of the king's eldest son and the marriage of his eldest daughter. Nothing can afford a stronger proof of the almost absolute power of the king, than his getting the commons to chuse Edward Dudley (one of his infamous ministers, and the most odious man in the kingdom) their speaker. Besides the many emoluments that accrued to Henry from this session (which, together with the several laws enacted therein, will be found under their proper heads), he got a considerable sum by the confiscation of the estates of a number of persons, going as far back as the beginning of his reign to search for such as had offended, who were accordingly, upon his complaint, attainted of high-treason: yet, not content with this acquisition of riches, he issued out commissions for a general benevolence, though he had no war upon his hands, nor any appearance of one. Among other instances of rapaciousness and oppression, he obliged the city of London to give him five thousand marks for a confirmation of their liberties; and a vast sum was also paid into the royal coffers by the nation upon a recoinage.

In order to make some sort of atonement for these extortions, and do something that might recommend him to the friends of the house of Lancaster, he ordered the body of Henry VI. to be removed from Windsor to Westminster, where it was interred with great pomp; and he applied to the pope for a bull to canonize that monarch; but the miracles attributed to the deceased after his death were so ill asserted, that his holiness would not admit him to a place among the saints, without such a pecuniary consideration as Henry did not think proper to advance, and therefore the design was laid aside. A foreign event now fell out, which gave Henry no little uneasiness.

On the twenty-sixth of November, this year, Ferdinand, king of Spain, notified the death of his queen Isabella, by a letter to Henry, and that she had left him administrator of the kingdoms of Castile, Leon, and Grenada, for their daughter Juanna, wife of Philip, archduke of Austria, who immediately assumed the title of king of Spain; but being then engaged in a war with the duke of Guelderland, he was not at leisure to go and take possession of his new inheritance, and therefore was obliged for the present to leave the administration in the hands of his father-in-law, but determined to deprive him of it the first favourable opportunity.

Ferdinand, however, claimed a right to the government during his life, on pretence that no particular time was fixed by Isabella's last will. It was of the utmost consequence for Henry to support Ferdinand in this matter against the archduke; he was sensible that the greater part of his subjects considered his late consort, the princess Elizabeth, as the rightful queen of England, and that her right had now of course descended to the prince of Wales, her heir and lawful successor, who might one day be encouraged to supplant him in the throne; he therefore regarded the issue of the dispute between Ferdinand and Philip as a precedent either for or against his own title, and he actually took part with such of the Spaniards who advised Ferdinand to break through his wife's entail, and declare himself king of Castile, Leon, and Grenada in his own right. But Ferdinand, though far from wanting ambition, declined this point, as too difficult to attempt, and contented himself with fixing Henry in his interest by putting the finishing hand to the marriage between his daughter Catherine, princess dowager of Wales, and Henry, prince of Wales, which was celebrated in the spring of the ensuing year, 1505.

In the beginning of this same year Henry entered upon a treaty of marriage for himself: he had cast his eyes upon the queen dowager of Naples for a wife, in order to enjoy the large dower assigned her in that kingdom. Perhaps he had also another view in this match, namely, the becoming umpire of the differences between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, concerning the kingdom of Naples. However, Henry's ardour was quickly damped on receiving information that the queen's great jointure in land had, ever since Ferdinand came into possession of that kingdom, been converted into an annuity for life.

His advices from Spain were likewise of a disagreeable nature; his agents there having informed him, that Ferdinand still continued in the post of administrator, which he hoped to preserve for life, partly by his interest with the archduke Philip's counsellors, some of whom he had engaged in his interest; and partly by threatening, that in case the archduke should attempt to deprive him of the government, he would marry again and beget an heir to the kingdom of Arragon: but, at the same time, that the nobles and people of Spain were more strongly attached to Philip, in right of his wife, than to Ferdinand, who had oppressed them with intolerable taxes. These agents likewise wrote over, that there was actually a treaty of marriage on foot between Ferdinand and madame Germaine de Foix, niece to Lewis XII. which would certainly take effect, should Philip presume to dispossess his father-in-law of the administration. They farther informed him, that Lewis XII. had determined to give his daughter, madame Claude, in marriage to the count d'Angoulême, his own presumptive heir as king of France. At the same time they gave Henry to understand, that if Philip and his queen should continue to reside quietly in the Low Countries during Ferdinand's administration, that prince would endeavour to effect a match between the young prince of Austria and Mary, second daughter of the king of England.

In the mean time, however, Philip and Juanna were proclaimed king and queen of Castile at Brussels, which shewed they did not intend to resign the administration of that kingdom to Ferdinand for life, as he had flattered himself; though they were hindered from going to take possession themselves by the war of Guelderland, and the pregnancy of the queen, who was in a little time brought to bed of a daughter, named Mary, afterwards queen of Hungary: and some days after, Margaret of Austria, Philip's sister (the same who had been contracted to Charles VIII. of France), lost her husband, the duke of Savoy, who died on the tenth of September.

This year was very barren of remarkable events with regard to England. Besides what has been related, we find only a treaty of alliance between Henry and George, duke of Saxony, hereditary governor of Frieland, which was concluded on the thirtieth of December.

Philip of Austria, having received repeated invitations from the nobility of Castile to come over and supersede the administration of Ferdinand, and having happily finished the war of Guelderland, and his queen being in a condition to travel, set sail from Middleburgh, in Zealand, about the middle of January, 1506, with a fleet of fourscore ships; but a furious storm arising from the south west, which continued for a week together, prevented him from clearing the Channel, and dispersed his numerous fleet in such a manner, that there were only two small barks with him when he was driven, in his own battered vessel, into Falmouth. Spent with a long course of fatigues, and the severity of a continued sea-sickness, he resolved to go ashore to get a little rest and refreshment for himself and his consort, contrary to the advice of his council.

Henry being apprized of their landing, sent the earl of Arundel to compliment them in his name; to assure them he would, with all possible dispatch, have the pleasure of embracing them; and that, in the mean time, they might command in his dominions. Philip would have excused himself from waiting for an interview by the pressing call there was for his presence in Spain; but he soon found that he was not at liberty to deny, and therefore accepted the invitation made him with a good grace; and, in order to save time, set out immediately for the court, which was then at Windsor, where he and his consort were received with all the marks of the most cordial friendship by Henry. But this interested prince, who never did a favour without views of advantage to himself therein, proposed to Philip, during his stay, that as he had changed his condition, in being become king of Castile, the treaty of commerce between England and the Low Countries should be renewed. That prince, comprehending perfectly well the delicate nature of his present situation, did not think proper to make any objections to this proposal, and the treaty was renewed, with some alterations in favour of the English: among other things they suppressed that article of the former treaty, by which Philip's subjects were permitted to fish on the coast of England. Philip was, no doubt, sensible of the infinite difference which this made to his subjects, but found it necessary to temporize: on this account the Dutch and Flemings termed this treaty Intercursus Malus, or the Bad Treaty, to distinguish it from that made in 1496, which, on account of the advantages it brought them, they had named Intercursus Magnus, or the Noble Treaty.

The next business of importance proposed by Henry to Philip, was a marriage between himself and Philip's sister Margaret, widow of the duke of Savoy. The famous Thomas Wolsey, being then the king's chaplain, was employed in managing this affair, which was ended greatly to the advantage of Philip, as by this alliance he made a friend of Henry, and prevented him from traversing his designs of depriving his father-in-law of the administration of Castile: accordingly the proposal was readily accepted, and the king of Castile engaged to pay the sum of three hundred thousand French crowns, each crown worth four shillings sterling (an exorbitant sum!) together with an annuity of thirty thousand eight hundred and fifty French crowns, as Margaret's fortune, during their wedlock. This treaty was signed by both parties, at Windsor, on the twentieth day of March. Henry however, who judged of mankind by himself, could not forbear expressing his uneasiness lest Philip should go from his bargain, when out of his power; but Dr. Wolsey, who had already begun to display those able talents for negotiating, for which he afterwards became so famous, fell upon an expedient for preventing all difficulties and quieting Henry's suspicions; for, after the king of Castile had agreed to the matter, he had an article inserted in the treaty, which obliged twelve of the principal lords in the Low Countries to swear they would use their utmost endeavours to procure the accomplishment of the marriage.

Henry having thus settled his foreign concerns with the king of Castile, proceeded to a matter of great consequence to his own quiet. It was Henry's peculiar misfortune to realize the phantoms of troubles, and find to himself matter of uneasiness where there were no grounds of apprehension. We have also remarked, that he understood no delicacy when interest was in question; and on the following occasion he broke through all the rules of decorum and hospitality, to compass a matter on which his future quiet depended.

The earl of Suffolk, who, as we have before related, had taken refuge in Philip's territories, was a perpetual object of Henry's outrageous jealousy, nor could he be easy while that nobleman was at liberty, who had the unpardonable demerit of being of the blood of York. One day, therefore, he took the opportunity, when the king of Castile and himself were alone, to press him in a manner that shewed he would not be denied, to deliver up the earl. Philip was greatly startled at the meanness and injustice of this request; but seeing what hands he was fallen into, and impatient to depart for Spain, did not chuse to affront Henry by a flat denial, but excused himself by saying, "Sir, this I cannot do, consistent with my honour, and much less with your's, for you will be thought to have used me like a prisoner." But Henry presently replied,

"Then I will take all the dishonour upon me." This answer convinced Philip that Henry was determined to make the most of that advantage which fortune had put in his power, and, after some hesitation agreed, but on condition that Henry should swear that he would not take the earl's life. Henry submitted to this restriction, and even condescended to send a letter under his own hand, assuring the unfortunate exile of good usage; who, being over-persuaded by these assurances, backed with others from Philip, surrendered himself to the king of England's officers at Calais, who sent him over hither; but no sooner was he landed in his native country, than he was sent under a guard to the Tower of London, where we shall see him, in the next reign, inhumanly sacrificed to the prevailing jealousies of the state.

The earl being thus secured, and Henry's apprehensions lulled to sleep, he permitted the king of Castile to resume his voyage, after having detained him by a thousand pretexts for upwards of three months, during which time he had created him knight of the Garter; and Philip, in return, a little before his departure, made Henry knight of the Golden Fleece: at last, on the twenty-third of April, Philip and his consort set out for Spain, and, after a short and pleasant passage, landed safely at Corunna (now called the Groyne), in Galicia, before Ferdinand knew of their arrival. They were received with such marks of universal love and affection, that Ferdinand did not think proper to insist upon his right of administration, but withdrew to his own kingdom of Arragon. Within a few months, however, Philip was carried off by a surfeit, which he contracted by drinking plentifully of cold water when in a sweat, and died on the twenty-fifth of September following. His queen was so afflicted with his loss, that she fell into a deep melancholy, which at length turned to a phrenzy; and Ferdinand, having yet a powerful party in the council of Castile, was declared administrator of that kingdom during the non-age of Charles of Luxembourg, their orphan son, who afterwards proved the scourge and terror of France and all Europe, by the name of Charles V.

By a treaty made at Blois, two years before, between Lewis XII. and the emperor Maximilian and his son Philip, archduke of Austria, it had been agreed that this young prince Charles should espouse madame Claude, the king of France's only daughter by Anne of Brittany, on certain conditions therein specified, which were to the last degree detrimental to the realm of France; but this year the general estates of that kingdom, held at Tours, remonstrated against this fatal treaty, by which the king's council, with one stroke of a pen, had mutilated and destroyed the French monarchy. Lewis, either repenting what he had done, or overcome by the remonstrances of the nation, agreed to annul that treaty: in fine, the heiress of France and of Anne of Brittany was taken from the heir of Austria and Spain, as her mother had been from Maximilian; and, before the assembly broke up, was married to the count d'Angoulême, afterwards Francis I. and Brittany, which had been twice annexed to the crown of France, and was twice very near slipping through its hands, was now incorporated with it, and Burgundy likewise was still preserved*.

* Voltaire's Essay on General History, chap. xci.

In the mean time the Flemings, who were left in a manner without a head, by the death of their archduke Philip, king of Spain, and the minority of his son, sent to invite the emperor Maximilian to come into their country, and assume the administration of public affairs during the minority of his grandson Charles. The emperor promised to accept the invitation; and, till he could pass over himself, sent his daughter Margaret, widow of the duke of Savoy, in the beginning of the summer of 1507, with the character of governante of the Low Countries: and that princess had no sooner arrived at Brussels, than she concluded with Henry a provisional treaty of commerce, until some differences between the subjects of the two princes could be amicably adjusted. As to the marriage which was to have taken place between the princess and Henry, the death of her brother Philip gave it a contrary turn: besides, Henry, about this time, began to feel his constitution impaired by a phthical disorder, which gave him frequent intimations of his approaching dissolution.

But no distemper, however violent, could call off Henry's attention to his two favourite objects, that of aggrandizing his family and heaping up riches; and he sent orders to his ambassadors*, who had just concluded the treaty with the governante of the Netherlands, and were now assembled at Calais, to set on foot a negociation for a marriage between the infant Charles, archduke of Austria, sovereign of the Low Countries and king of Castile, and his third daughter the princess Mary. After much time spent in this project, the finishing hand was put to the treaty, at Calais, on the twenty-first of December, 1507, and ratified by Maximilian the emperor, and by the dukes of Savoy. By the articles of this contract it was stipulated, that the marriage should be consummated as soon as Charles should have attained his fourteenth year, and that Mary's dower should be two hundred and fifty thousand crowns of gold; in consideration of which she was to be entitled to the same jointure which was settled upon the dukes dowager of Burgundy, sister to Edward IV†. At the same time Henry concluded an alliance with Maximilian, as tutor and guardian to the king of Spain, in which all the former treaties were confirmed.

All this while Henry went on in heaping up money; and Empson and Dudley's oppressions were now more raging than ever. Sir William Cappel, who had been lord-mayor of London, was prosecuted upon a frivolous charge of not punishing a person who had paid him false money in the time of his mayoralty, in the year 1503, and fined two thousand pounds: upon his refusal to pay so exorbitant a fine, he was clapped up in the Tower, where he remained all the rest of this reign. Sir Laurence Aylmer, mayor of London, and his two sheriffs, were in like manner prosecuted upon frivolous charges, and fined each one thousand pounds: upon refusing to pay, they were committed to the King's Bench prison. Sir Thomas Knefworth, who had been mayor in 1505, and both his sheriffs, were committed to prison on pretence of some irregularities which had happened during their magistracies, and obliged to pay fourteen hundred pounds for their release‡. While such measures prevailed, we are not to be surprized that Henry amassed the prodigious sum of one million eight hundred thousand pounds. This year the sweating-sickness raged again in England, though not so violently as it did before; among others it carried off, was Giles, lord d'Aubeney, one of the greatest statesmen and generals that England had seen for many years.

The year 1508 affords us no one event worthy historical record, except the marriage of the princess Mary with the archduke Charles, king of Castile, to secure the accomplishment of which Henry employed all his attention. At length, on the seventeenth of December, the young couple were affianced in a chamber of Henry's palace of Richmond, in "verba de præsenti," or words of the present tense; Charles by his proxy, John, marquis of Berghes, or Bergen op Zoom, and Mary in person, before the archbishop of Canterbury and a considerable number of the English nobility; the ceremony concluded with Charles's proxy kissing the young princess, in his name, as a token of the espousal, and putting a gold ring on her middle finger. Henry was so delighted with this alliance, that he could not forbear boasting, "that he had now built a wall of brass round his kingdom," meaning the marriage of his daughters with the king of Scotland, and the prince of Spain, by which he had provided the best security that human prudence could devise for establishing his family on the throne of England; but he did not live to see this last marriage completed, and it was at last broken off entirely.

About the time of performing this ceremony the marquis of Berghes borrowed from Henry, for the use of the archduke, the sum of fifty thousand pounds, for which he pawned a jewel belonging to that prince, called the rich Fleur de Lis, which weighed above two hundred and eleven ounces in gold and precious stones, and the emperor, as guardian and grand-father to Charles, approved the mortgage for the money, which he converted to his own use.

Though crowned with success in all his undertakings, triumphant over all his enemies, his alliance courted by every foreign crown, and his power dreaded at home, yet Henry now found that neither riches, power, nor success could secure him against the attacks of the thousand ills incident to human nature: he had for some time laboured under a disorder of the lungs, which had baffled all the art of medicine in behalf of a life that he was at once the most unwilling, and the least prepared, of any man to part with. His disorder at length became so violent, that he found his latter end could not be far off: we are told, that in this humiliating situation he entered somewhat into himself, and when he found that he could no longer continue in the practice of rapaciousness and oppression, and that the treasures he had thus hatefully accumulated, were insufficient to satisfy the demands of that stern creditor, death, he expressed some contrition for what he had made his subjects suffer, and determined to do something that might recommend him to the mercy of Heaven and the forgiveness of men; he distributed large sums in charity, and released, at his own expence, all prisoners that were confined for debt under forty shillings. He then made his will, in which he strictly enjoined his heir and successor to make restitution of all that those infamous agents of his oppressive avarice had unjustly taken from the people; and on the twenty-second of April, 1509, expired, at his favourite palace of Richmond, after reigning twenty-three years and eight months, and in the fifty-third year of his age, leaving his son Henry the crown of England, together with one million eight hundred thousand pounds sterling in ready money, jewels, and plate, deposited in the vaults of his palace.

If we consider Henry either as a man or a king, we shall find him in many respects inferior to many of his predecessors, and even contemporaries, in several important respects; but at the same time it must be confessed that few of them possessed so many excellencies as he did upon the whole. His reign was more advantageous to his people than honourable to himself. He put an end to the civil wars with which the kingdom had been so long distracted. He maintained order and regularity in the state; he depressed the exorbitant power of the nobility; and, together with the friendship and alliance of some foreign princes, he acquired the esteem and regard of all.

As he had known how to conquer, so he knew how to govern, and his reign somewhat humanized the manners of the English nation. His parliaments, with whom he always kept fair, enacted wise laws: justice, under him, resumed her functions; and trade, which had begun first to flourish under the third Edward, and which had been almost annihilated during the civil wars, was again revived. Henry was, through inclination more than necessity, avaricious; had he been only saving, he would have shewn his prudence; but the fardness of his disposition and his rapacious exactions have tarnished the glory of his reign; indeed he seems to have hated his subjects, and to have made it his business to keep them low, by loading them with taxes, and seizing all opportunities of ruining them by excessive fines. He was cool, close, cunning, dark, distrustful, and designing: he possessed in a peculiar manner the art of turning all his domestic troubles, and all his foreign disputes, to his own advantage: and it is not a little remarkable, that one so fond of peace, should be so fortunate in war; for his arms, whether employed within his own kingdom, or abroad, were always crowned with success; and he hardly knew what ill fortune meant, but as he saw it in others. In his private disposition he was rather inclined to be merciful, whenever the shewing of tenderness was compatible with his own interest, the regard for which was the standard of all his actions: in a word, his soul seems to have been engrossed by two ruling passions, the fear of losing his crown, and the desire of amassing riches; passions which, however base and fard in themselves, were nevertheless productive of considerable advantages to the nation. He inherited a fund of good sense, which was greatly improved by study and experience; and so high an opinion had the world conceived of his sagacity and penetration, that he was commonly distinguished by the name of the English Solomon; though many indifferent actions, which were the effect of pure chance, were generally ascribed to his consummate policy: as an instance of this we need only mention the marriage of his daughter Margaret with James IV. king of Scotland, which proved the means of uniting that realm to the crown of England, and in bringing about of which Henry's sagacity and foresight have been so greatly extolled by writers, who have been warped by interest or prepossession; whereas nothing is more apparent, than that these nations owe that benefit to Perkin Warbeck, since it was to draw off James from giving him protection and assistance that this match was agreed upon and settled by d'Ayala, the Spanish mediator; and lord Bacon justly observes, that Henry was more dexterous in removing, than in foreseeing or preventing dangers.

Henry was in stature somewhat above the middle size; his person was straight and handsome, and his limbs elegant and well proportioned, though extremely delicate and tender; his countenance was grave and melancholy; his temper sour and saturnine. He was difficult of access, but affable when once engaged in conversation, and irresistibly eloquent and persuasive when he had any favourite point to gain. We shall here take our leave of this great prince's character, and relate the honours paid by his successor to his remains.

His body was brought into the great chamber, where resting three days, a solemn mass and dirge were sung by a mitred bishop: whence being removed into the hall, the same service was performed there, the like space of time; as also in the chapel three days longer: and in every place a hearse, adorned with banners, escutcheons, and pennons, with mourners attending. From thence, on Wednesday the ninth of May, it was put into a chariot, covered with cloth, black and gold, drawn by five great coursers, covered with black velvet, ornamented with escutcheons of fine gold; with his effigies, apparelled in rich robes, the crown on his head, and sceptre and ball in the hands, laid on a cushion of gold, and environed with banners of arms of all his dominions, titles, and genealogies; a great number of prelates praying, with his servants and others in black, before the body; and nine mourners, with about six hundred torches, following. In this order it was attended to St. George's Fields, near Southwark, and there met by the religious of the several orders in or about the city, with the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, in black; it was thence brought through London to St. Paul's, and placed in the choir, in a stately hearse of wax; whence, after a solemn mass, and a sermon preached by the bishop of Rochester, it was the next day, with the same state, conveyed to Westminster, sir Edward Hayward, with the king's coat of arms, bearing his banner, on a courser, trapped with the arms of the defunct; and there, by six lords, taken out of the chariot, and set under a most curious hearse, full of lights, the effigies lying on the coffin, on a pall of gold; about which the mourners being sat within the first rail, knights bearing banners within the second, and officers of arms without the same, Garter, king of arms, cried aloud for the soul of the noble prince Henry VII. king of this realm; when the choir beginning with "Placebo," and ending with "Dirige," closed the solemnities of that day. The next day three masses were solemnly sung by bishops, at the last of which were offered the banner, courser, coat of arms, sword, target, and helmet, the nobility likewise offering their rich palls of cloth of gold and bodkins.

Then

Then when the choir had sung "Libera me," the corpse was interred, the treasurer and comptroller breaking their staves into the grave: when, Garter having cried with a loud voice, "Vive le roy Henrie le huitieme, roy d'Angleterre & de France, syere d'Ireland," the mourners, with them of the household, departed to the palace, where they had a sumptuous feast; and thus the funeral ended.

By his queen Elizabeth Henry had issue as follow:

1. Arthur Tudor, born at Winchester, on the twentieth of September, 1486; was married, on the fourteenth of November, 1501, to the princess Catherine of Spain; and died soon after, at Ludlow, in Shropshire, on the second of April, 1502, and was buried in the cathedral of Worcester.

2. Henry Tudor, his second son, born at Greenwich, on the twenty-eighth of June, 1491, and succeeded by the name of Henry VIII.

3. Edmund Tudor, third and youngest son, born at Greenwich, on the twenty-first of February, 1498, who, dying soon after, was buried within the abbey of Westminster.

1. Margaret Tudor, queen of Scotland, his eldest daughter, was born on the twenty-ninth of November, 1489. She was first married to James IV. king of Scotland, anno 1503; and next to Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus, in the year 1514, and had children by both.

2. Elizabeth, second daughter, born the second of July, 1492. She died at Eltham, on the fourteenth of September, 1495, and was buried at Westminster.

3. Mary, born A. D. 1498; affianced to Charles, prince of Castile, afterwards emperor; married first to Lewis XII. king of France; and, after his decease, to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

In the second year of Henry VII. John Percival, the lord-mayor's carver was chosen one of the sheriffs of London in this manner: sir Henry Collet, the lord-mayor, took a cup of wine, and drank to John Percival, who then waited at his table, standing bare-headed; the lord mayor drinking to him, and styling him sheriff of London for the ensuing year, so far made use of his privilege of election that way, as to cause Percival to put on his hat and sit down at table; accordingly the carver sat down, took on him the office of sheriff, and was afterwards lord-mayor himself, and knighted.

In his seventh year, Robert Fabian was an alderman and sheriff of London: he wrote a History of England and France, from the creation of the world to the third year of the reign of Henry VIII.

In his ninth year, on the twenty-eighth of April, Joan Boughton, a widow, was burnt in Smithfield, for heresy and professing Wickliff's opinions. This year wheat was sold in London for four shillings a quarter; and Bourdeaux wine, or claret, for thirty shillings a hogshead.

In the tenth year of his reign the body of one Alice Hackney, which had been buried one hundred and seventy-five years, ever since the beginning of the reign of Edward II. was accidentally dug up in the church of St. Mary Hill, London; the skin of the corpse was whole, and the joints of the arms pliable.

In the seventeenth year of his reign, sir John Shaw, then lord-mayor, first caused his brethren the aldermen to ride to the water-side, when he went to the Exchequer-bar to be sworn: he was also the first that held the mayor's feast in Guildhall, which was before done at Mercers-hall, or Merchant-taylors-hall.

In the following year, on the eighteenth of January, the first stone of the chapel known by the name of Henry VII's Chapel, was laid, within the monastery of Westminster, by John Illip, the abbot; sir Reginald Bray, knight of the Garter; Dr. Barnes, master of the Rolls; sir Edward Stanhope and others assisting at the ceremony. The charge of this building amounted to no more than fourteen thousand pounds, if we may believe the lord Bacon.

In the same year the king gave the title of Merchant Taylors to the company of Taylors, of which he himself was a member, as several of his predecessors had been before him.

The colleges founded in this reign were, Christ's college and St. John's, in Cambridge, by Margaret, countess of Richmond, the king's mother; Jesus college, in the same university, by John Alcock, bishop of Ely: Corpus Christi, in Oxford, by Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester; and Brazen Nose college, by William Smith, bishop of Lincoln.

It was likewise in the course of this reign that St. Paul's school was founded by John Collet, dean of that cathedral.

Of RELIGION, and of the CHURCH.

WE have already given some account of the severities exercised against the Lollards, in the reigns of Richard II. and Henry IV*. The general persecution raised against them had kept them, for some time, quiet; but in the beginning of the reign of Henry V. they began to appear with more assurance. The king had been remarkably attached to several of the sect, when prince of Wales, and they now thought that they should find in him a patron and protector; but they soon found themselves miserably deceived. Henry had already formed the great scheme of conquering France, and was sensible he could never effect this favourite project without a perfect good understanding between the crown and the church; he therefore resolved not to interrupt the clergy in any matters pertaining to their jurisdiction: accordingly, in the very beginning of his reign, he delivered up sir John Oldcastle to ecclesiastical censure. The severities exercised against him have been already related; but it may not be amiss here to mention some of the professed tenets of that great man, and for which he suffered by the spiritual power.

Upon his examination before a convocation held by archbishop Arundel, at Black-friars, on the twenty-seventh of September, 1413, assisted by the bishops of London, Winchester, and Bangor, when he was questioned concerning the eucharist, he professed his belief, "that, after consecration, Christ's very body was present in form of bread, the same individual body that was born of the Virgin Mary." But being asked by one of the divines present, to declare, without reserve, "whether he did not hold the bread, after consecration, to be material?" turning to the archbishop, he said, "I believe it is Christ's body, in form of bread. Sir, believe you not this?" "Yea, marry, do I," replied the archbishop. "But (redemanded the doctors) think ye that any part of the bread remains after consecration?" He replied, "It is both Christ's body and bread: for what saith St. Paul, 2 Cor. x. "The bread which we take, is it not the partaking of the body of Christ?" Now (added the knight) is it not plain that the substance is called bread?" As these answers were directly repugnant to the established opinion of those days, which held the bread, after consecration, to be no longer material, but absolutely changed into the very body of Christ, sir John's enemies, who formed the great majority of the assembly, cried out that he had confessed heresy; and Dr. Walden, a noted theologian of those times, undertook to confute Oldcastle by argument; but both their reasonings are miserably lame and scurrilous. The behaviour of the latter on this occasion was quite indefensible; for, being warmed in his own defence, he compared the members of the court to Annas and Caiaphas, who sat in judgment upon Christ, and afterwards upon his apostles; launched forth into the most bitter and indecent reflections on the church of Rome, and those of the English clergy who supported her cause; concluding his harangue thus: "Rome is the very nest of Antichrist, from whence came all his disciples; prelates, priests, and monks are the body; and the shaven friars the tail, which covers the most filthy parts." Such obloquy could not fail to exasperate the assembly, which being unanimous in finding him guilty, the archbishop pronounced sentence of condemnation against him; and, though he made his escape from the Tower, he was afterwards apprehended, and suffered death both as a traitor and heretic, by being hanged and burned at Tyburn†.

But we are now to give an account of the famous council of Constance, in which the English made so great a figure. There were at this time no fewer than three popes; Peter of Candia, who took the name of Alexander V. Peter de Luna, who took the name of Benedict XIII. and Angeli Corrario, who called himself Gregory XII. The emperor Sigismund had been indefatigable in endeavouring to bring their several pretensions under some compromise: in the mean time Alexander V. dying, his tiara was given to Balthazar Corra, who took the name of John XXIII. His holiness was at this time highly distressed by Ladislaus (Charles Durazzo), king of Naples and Sicily, whose victorious troops had shut him up in Bologna; in this extremity he had recourse to the emperor Sigismund, who was come into Italy to conclude a treaty with the Venetians.

Sigismund, as emperor, had an opportunity of exalting his own power, by the humiliation of the pope; but, on the other hand he was the mortal enemy of Ladislaus, the tyrant of Italy. John proposed to him to form a league, and assemble a council; the one to expel the common enemy, and the other to confirm his own right to the pontificate.

A council was in fact necessary, that of Pisa‡ having ordered one to be called at the end of three years: accordingly Sigismund and John issued their joint proclamation for the holding this council in the little city of Constance, seated on the western bank of the lake of that name; but Ladislaus opposed his victorious army to these negotiations, and nothing but an extraordinary turn of affairs could deliver the emperor and the pope from their critical situation; this happened by the death of Ladislaus in 1414, brought about, as was suspected, by poison, a custom in those times but too prevalent.

John XXIII. thus delivered from his most implacable enemy, and having now only the emperor and the council to fear, wanted to put off the meeting of this high assembly, which may not improperly be styled the senate of Europe, as having the power of judging over the supreme pontiffs themselves; but, notwithstanding all John's arts, the meeting was proclaimed, the emperor pressed for its sitting, and those who had a right to assist at it were hastening from all parts to take possession of the august title of arbitrators of Christendom: John therefore was obliged to go to the council; but he made a secret convention with the duke of Austria, to protect his person against all attempts, and to assure him an open and safe retreat from Constance when he pleased: in short, he omitted nothing that could secure his person and authority.

On the sixteenth of November, 1414, the council met, and never had there been a more numerous convocation. Besides the crowd of prelates and doctors who assisted at this council, there were twenty-eight great vassals of the empire present, and the emperor himself constantly attended, as did the electors of Metz, Saxony, the Palatine, and Brandenburg, with the dukes of Austria and Bavaria, and twenty-seven ambassadors from the several courts of Europe*. The bull for calling this council being read, it was declared to be convoked, not only to abolish the schism which still continued in the church, but also to root out the heresy of Wickliff, which had by this time made great progress abroad, and manifestly tended to the dissolution of the papal dignity, which served for the basis and foundation to most of the privileges claimed by the clergy, and indeed to the hierarchy itself. The council next chose its officers and servants, which were equally elected out of the four nations of which it was composed, viz. the English, Italians, French, and Germans: but a question of a very interesting nature for the English now happened; it was started by Peter de Chiacco, cardinal de Camera, who was put upon it by the French. It was, "Whether the English should sit as a distinct nation in the council, or be considered as comprehended in that of Germany?" After much altercation on both sides, the matter was at last decided in favour of the English, and it was agreed that the fathers of the council should be ranged under five nations, viz. Italy, France, Germany, England, and Spain; and that the plurality of voices should determine all matters proposed.

On the twenty-third day of December the emperor appeared in council, which proceeded to business; and, after much debate, it was found absolutely necessary towards the re-establishment of peace and union in the church, that not only the antipopes, Gregory and Benedict, should be divested of all authority, but even John XXIII. who was the only lawful pope (as having been elected and acknowledged by the cardinals of the council of Pisa, and succeeded to the pope chosen by the same council) should abdicate his papal dignity. This last, conscious of many enormities in his own conduct, for which he dreaded prosecution, seemingly agreed to the proposal; but this consent was the effect of dissimulation, for he knew that Sigismund had made himself master of the council, by placing soldiers round the city of Constance, under the specious pretext of providing for the safety of the fathers; so that the pontiff now found himself a prisoner in the midst of the very council where he sat as president.

He had now no resource left but to make his escape. The emperor caused him to be narrowly watched; the duke of Austria, who was desirous to favour the pope's flight, could not think of any better way than by giving the council the diversion of a tournament; in the midst of the hurry and confusion usual on these occasions, the pope made his escape in the disguise of a postilion, and the duke of Austria set out immediately after him: they both retired into a part of Switzerland which still belonged to the house of Austria. The duke of Burgundy was likewise ready to protect the pope: this duke was very powerful, both on account of his great possessions and the authority he had in France. Thus a new schism was on the point of being kindled; the heads of religious orders who were in the pope's interest, were already retiring from Constance, and the council by this turn of affairs might have become an assembly of rebels. Sigismund, who had been unfortunate on so many occasions, proved successful in this: he had, as we have already observed, a body of troops at hand, with these he made himself master of all the duke of Austria's territories in Alsace, Tyrol, and Switzerland. This brought the duke back to the council, where he asked pardon on his knees of the emperor, and promised in the most solemn manner never for the future to undertake any thing contrary to his will, and resigned all his dominions to him, to be disposed of as he should think proper, in case of infidelity. The emperor upon this gave the duke his hand, and pardoned him, upon condition that he would deliver up the person of the pope.

The fugitive pontiff was accordingly seized at Fribourg, and conveyed to a neighbouring castle.

* The deputies sent to this council from England were, first, the bishops of Salisbury, Bath, and Hereford, the abbot of Westminster, and the prior of Worcester; but, upon the death of the bishops of Salisbury and Hereford, the English prelates understanding that other churches were represented by a more numerous delegation, sent Clifford, bishop of London, the chancellors of both universities, with twelve doctors, to this council. Walsingham, p. 387. The deputies mentioned in Rymer's Fœdera, are these: Nicholas, bishop of Bath and Wells; Robert, bishop of Salisbury; John, bishop of St. David's; William, abbot of Westminster; John, prior of Worcester; Thomas Spofford, abbot of St. Mary's at York; Richard, earl of Warwick; Henry Fitz Hugh, lord-chamberlain; sir Walter Hungerford, sir Ralph Rocheford, John Honyngham, doctor of laws. Vol. ix. p. 162, 167, 169.

Every one of the members of this council (says Mr. de Voltaire, in his Essay on General History, vol. ii. chap. 60. from whence we have chiefly extracted the above account) vied with the other in luxury and magnificence; they brought in their train five hundred players on instruments, called in those days minstrels; seven hundred and eighteen courtizans, who were openly protected by the magistracy of Constance. They were obliged to build a great number of wooden huts, to lodge all the ministers to luxury and incontinence which these lords, rather than fathers, of the council brought with them. No one was ashamed of these practices, which were then as publicly authorised in every state, as they had been formerly in most of the heathen nations. On this occasion the church of France allowed every archbishop it sent to the council ten franks a day (which is equal to fifty livres [about two guineas English] of our present currency), eight to a bishop, five to an abbot, and three to a doctor.

In the mean time the council proceeded to his trial: he was charged with having sold benefices and reliques, with poisoning the pope his predecessor, with having murdered a number of innocent persons, in short he was accused of the most impious licentiousness, and of the highest excess of debauchery, even of sodomy and blasphemy; they however suppressed fifty-five articles of the verbal process, which they thought too great an infamy on the pontifical character. At length, on the twenty-ninth of May, the sentence of his deposition was read, in the presence of the emperor. This sentence imported, that the council reserved to itself the power of punishing the pope for his crimes, according to justice or mercy.

John XXIII. who had formerly given proofs of the greatest courage, was all resignation, when they came to read his sentence to him in prison. The emperor kept him prisoner three years at Manheim, where he treated him with such severity, that the public began to compassionate him more for his sufferings than it had even hated him for his crimes. Thus far I have thought necessary to carry the transactions of this council, in relation to the settling the schism in the church; it now remains to give an account of the fires which were afterwards lighted up by the mistaken religious zeal of this same assembly.

The fathers of this council did not originally meet about deposing a pope, their principal view seemed to be the reformation of the church. The doctrines of Wickliff had been condemned by the university of Oxford, and by the bishops and clergy, but this did not hinder its spreading; his books, though obscure and ill written, were every where circulated by mere dint of curiosity, which the subject of dispute and the boldness of the author had raised in all degrees of people, and which received no little weight from his unspotted manners and purity of life. His works made their way into Bohemia, a country newly risen out of barbarism, and which, from the grossest ignorance, had arrived at another species of it, at that time called erudition.

The emperor Charles IV. the lawgiver of Germany and Bohemia, had founded the university of Prague, on the same model as that at Paris. In this university, which, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, contained no less than twenty thousand students, the Germans had three voices in all deliberations, and the Bohemians only one: John Hus, a native of Bohemia, who had attained to the degree of a bachelor in that academy, and was confessor to the queen, Sophia of Bavaria, wife of Wenceslaus, obtained of that princess, that, for the future, his countrymen should have three votes, and the Germans only one. These latter incensed at this change, withdrew from the university, and became so many irreconcilable enemies to John Hus. At the same time some of Wickliff's works had fallen into his hands; and, though he totally rejected the speculative doctrine contained in them, he adopted the author's passionate invectives against the lives of the popes and bishops; against the excommunications, thundered out with equal levity and fury; and, in fine, against all ecclesiastical power; in which neither he nor Wickliff had properly distinguished between the rights and usurpations. This step made him many more enemies, but at the same time it procured him a number of protectors, especially the queen, whose spiritual director he was. He was accused before John XXIII. and summoned to appear in the year 1411, which summons he did not obey. In the mean time the council of Constance assembled, which was to pronounce judgment upon the popes and the opinions of men: hither he was also summoned, the emperor himself writing to the court of Bohemia to desire he might be sent to give an account of his doctrine.

John Hus, full of confidence, repaired to the council, when both he and the pope ought to have kept away. He arrived there, accompanied by several Bohemian gentlemen and many of his disciples; and, what is most remarkable, he came with the emperor's safe-conduct, dated the eighteenth of October, 1414, and drawn up in the fullest and most favourable terms; but no sooner was he arrived, than he was committed to close confinement, and the council proceeded to try him, at the same time with the pope. He, like the pope, made his escape; and, like him, was brought back again, and they were both confined for some time in the same prison.

At length he appeared before the council, loaded with chains, and was examined concerning several passages in his writings. It is certain any man may be ruined by wresting the meaning of his words: what teacher, what writer is sure of life, if we condemn to the flames a person who says, "there is but one catholic church, which contains all the predestined in its bosom; that a reprobate is not a member of this church; that the temporal lords ought to oblige the priests to observe the law; and that a wicked pope is not a vicar of Jesus Christ?" And yet these, and no others, were the propositions maintained by John Hus, and which he explained in such a manner as might have acquitted him, had not the council put such a sense upon them as was found necessary to condemn him.

The fathers of the council were determined that Hus should retract his opinion; and Hus, on his side, persuaded he was in the right, would not acknowledge himself in an error. The emperor, moved with compassion, said to him, "What harm is there in abjuring errors, falsely attributed to you? I am ready this moment to abjure all kind of errors, does it follow from thence that I have held them?" Hus, however, remained inflexible: he demonstrated the difference between a general demonstration of errors, and retracting an opinion as an error, and chose rather to be burnt than acknowledge that he had been in the wrong.

The council were as obstinate as himself; but his obstinacy in rushing to certain death was something heroic, whereas that of condemning him to the flames was an act of great cruelty. The emperor, notwithstanding the safe-conduct he had granted, ordered the elector Palatine to see him carried to execution, and he was accordingly burnt alive in presence of the elector, chanting out hymns of praise to the divinity till the flames stifled his voice. After his death, the duke of Bavaria ordered the executioner's servant to throw all the martyr's cloaths (for that title he certainly deserved, if ever man did) into the flames; and his ashes, being carefully collected, were cast into the Rhine.

Some months after, the council exercised the same severity against a disciple and friend to John Hus, named Jerom, whom we commonly call Je-

rom of Prague. This man was greatly superior in understanding and eloquence to Hus; he at first had subscribed to the condemnation of his master's doctrine; but being informed with what greatness of soul he had encountered death, he was ashamed to survive him, and having made a public retraction, he was consigned to the flames.

Poggio the Florentine, secretary to John XXIII. and one of the first restorers of letters, who was present at his examinations and execution, says that he never heard any thing that approached so nearly to the eloquence of the Greeks and Romans as the speech which Jerom made to his judges: "He spoke (says he) like Socrates, and walked to the stake with as much cheerfulness as that great philosopher drank the cup of hemlock."

The council having deposed the true pope in the manner we have already related, wanted the renunciations of those who pretended to the pontificate. Corrarion sent them his; but the proud Spaniard, Luna, would never yield: the council found no difficulty in deposing him, but it was an affair of greater importance to fix upon the choice of one to succeed him. The cardinals claimed the right of election as immediately vested in themselves; and the council, as representatives of the whole Christian church, pretended likewise to the same right. The present question was about giving a head to the church and a sovereign to Rome. It was but just that the cardinals, who constituted the privy-council of this sovereign, and the fathers of the general council, who acted in conjunction with them, as representatives of the church, should with them enjoy an equal right of suffrage: thirty deputies of the council joined with the cardinals in electing Otho Colonna, of the same family who had been excommunicated by pope Boniface VIII. to the fifth generation. This pope, who, after his election, changed his illustrious name for that of Martin V. possessed all the qualities of a prince with the virtues of a bishop.

Never had the inauguration of a pontiff been attended with greater pomp: he went in procession to the church, mounted on a white palfrey, the emperor and the count Palatine on foot, leading it by the reins, a numerous croud of princes, and all the members of the council closed the train. When he arrived in the church, the tripple crown was put on his head, which the popes had worn for upwards of two centuries.

There had been great complaints made in this council, for above two years, against the annates or first-fruits, the exemptions, the reservations, and the taxes imposed by the popes on the clergy, for the profit of the holy see; and against the torrent of vice with which the church was at this time overflowed. But how did this so much desired reformation end? Pope Martin declared, first, that no exemptions ought to be granted, without shewing just cause. Secondly, that an enquiry should be made into the re-united benefices. Thirdly, that the revenues of vacant churches should be disposed of, according to common law. Fourthly, he made an ineffectual prohibition of simony. Fifthly, he ordered for the future, those that had benefices should be distinguished by the tonsure. Sixthly, he forbade the celebration of mass in a lay habit. These were the laws promulgated by the most solemn assembly in the universe.

Gerson, and the deputies of the university of Paris, even found great difficulty in getting the two following propositions condemned, viz. "That in some cases the assassination of a person might become a virtuous act: that it is more meritorious in a knight than in an esquire, and far more in a prince than in a knight." This doctrine of assassination had been maintained in France by one John Petit, a doctor of the university of Paris, upon the occasion of the murder of the king's own brother. The council for a long time evaded Gerson's petition, but at length it was obliged to condemn this doctrine of murder, though without mentioning the cordelier John Petit's name.

We cannot close our account of this council, without noticing some transactions thereof, which were peculiarly honourable to the English nation.

In the nineteenth session of this council, the question of precedency between the English and the Arragoneze, or Spaniards, was again revived, through the intrigues of the French deputies, and for a while by its violence caused a total cessation of all business; but the noble stand made by the English, and the great credit their nation was in at this time with all Europe, was such, that, before the end of this council, an end was put to this affair entirely in their favour; and the question running between the right of precedency of the universities of Oxford and Salamanca, the antiquity, privileges, and excellency of the former were defended by Henry de Abingdon, of Merton college, in Oxford, in a formal speech, with so much glory and advantage, that the council gave the point entirely in favour of that university.

On the twenty-second of April, 1418, the council of Constance was dissolved by the new pope, Martin V. after having been assembled four years and an half, viz. from the first of November, 1413, and after having rendered itself famous by the irretrievable blow it had inflicted upon the papal authority by the spirited decree passed in its fourth session, by which a general council was declared above any pope, and that, "being gathered together in the Holy Ghost, and representing the catholic church militant, it received a power immediately from Jesus Christ, which persons of all conditions, even popes themselves, were obliged to obey in every thing which concerned the faith, the extirpation of schism, and reformation of the church in head and members." In short, the authority of a general council was ultimately confirmed by the approbation of two unquestionable popes, John XXIII. and Martin V*.

In the mean time the Lollards underwent severe persecutions in England. Presentments of heretics were formally ordered by Henry Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury (in the room of Arundel, who died in 1415), in a convocation held at London, July 1, 1416, enjoining every parish to give in the names of all persons suspected of heresy within their respective districts; and ordering that the diocesans, upon such informations, should issue out process against the accused persons.

These injunctions were carried into execution with a most fiery zeal, and the bishops obliged all whom they suspected, to swallow abjuration in the most copious terms. It was about this time that sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham, was taken by the lord Powis, and sent up to London, where he suffered death in the manner related in the civil history*.

In the year 1418, a synod was called by the archbishop of Canterbury, at London, which granted two tenths as a supply for the war with France; and the duke of Bedford notified to the assembly the election of pope Martin V. whose elevation was celebrated with rejoicings and acts of devotion. The assembly then enacted a decree for regulating the graduations at the two universities, which decree met with great opposition at Oxford and Cambridge, though it was at last received by the interposition of king Henry V. who was himself a patron of learning.

The meek Martin V. proved as encroaching a pope upon the English church as any of his predecessors had ever been: he disposed of bishoprics by way of provision, and vacated the elections of the chapters. Henry V. in order to put a stop to this usurpation, as also to reform a number of abuses which had crept in among the clergy, sent John Ketterick, bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, to demand an express concordat upon the abuses so much complained of. The pope, who knew too much of Henry to think of dallying with him, on the seventeenth of April, 1419, established the following concordat between the see of Rome and the church of England.

“That it was agreed by pope Martin V. for the reformation of the church of England, and of the dominions of Ireland and Wales, that the number of cardinals should be so moderate that it might not be a burthen to the church, nor render the dignity mean and contemptible.

“That they should be elected indifferently out of all the nations of Christendom, and be created with the consent of the college of cardinals, or the greatest part of them.

“That since, on occasion of indulgencies granted by the popes, and the great number of those persons who distributed them, which now abounded in England more than formerly, many encouraged themselves in a bold licentiousness; and, neglecting their proper cures and proper churches, flocked to make their confessions in those places where the indulgencies were given out; it should therefore be in the power of the diocesan of the place to enquire into the quality of those indulgencies, to suspend those which were scandalous, and to send notice to the pope that he might revoke them.

“That there should be no appropriations of parochial churches, without the knowlege and consent of the bishop of that diocese.

“That all appropriations of perpetual vicarages in the parish churches, made during the late schism, should be recalled; and perpetual vicars be ordained in them by the ordinaries of the place: and that in every parochial church there should be one constant vicar to have the cure of souls, who should be sufficiently endowed to maintain hospitality, and to support the charges of his function.

“That all the privileges of using the pontifical vestments granted to inferior prelates since the death of Gregory XI. should be revoked; but those which had been obtained before, should continue.

“That whereas the plurality of benefices was contrary to the canons, and no dispensations could be lawfully made in this case, unless in favour of persons of noble birth or excellent learning, yet such dispensations were now common; it was therefore ordained, that they should not be granted for the future; though those which had been, might continue in force, excepting only such as were scandalous, of which the ordinary of the place should take cognizance.

“That whereas the popes, in latter times, had given dispensations to persons who had obtained benefices supplied with curates before, to enjoy them for a term of years, or for ever, to the great scandal of the church; it was therefore ordained that all those dispensations should be recalled, and the persons be left to common law.

“And whereas dispensations granted by the popes for non-residence, or to give to the archdeacons licence of visiting by their proctors, had caused not only a great neglect of the cure of souls, but a contempt of episcopal authority, it was therefore ordained, that no such dispensations should be made for the future, unless upon very great reasons; and that all which had been, should be revoked.

“That all letters of licence to obtain any ecclesiastical benefices, whether cures or sine-cures, which had been given to monks and friars, and not yet put in execution, should be revoked; and that there should be no more of them for the time to come.

“That those of the English who were fit for places or offices in the court of Rome, should stand as fair to be elected as those of other nations.”

The pope, after passing an act so much in favour of the church of England, applied to Henry to have all those laws which had been made to the prejudice of his authority, abrogated; but Henry soon gave his holiness to understand that this was not in the power of the crown to grant. About this period another convocation was held in London, wherein one Richard Walker, a priest of Worcester, was tried and convicted of witchcraft, which he solemnly renounced, and did public penance. Many people were likewise obliged to abjure Lollardism; and the assembly granted a large subsidy to the king, who suppressed French monasteries in England, and granted their lands to other colleges of the learned. After Henry's marriage, a convocation, held at London, made the king a present of a tenth, but upon the following conditions, proposed by the famous Lyndwood:

“First, that the king's purveyors should not over-reach upon the goods of churchmen.

“Secondly, That no clergyman should be imprisoned, but for theft or murder; and that when prosecuted for other crimes, they should beailable†.” It is pretended that these exceptions were confirmed by act of parliament, but no such act is to be found upon the records.

Pope Martin V. having summoned a new council at Pavia, in the beginning of the year 1421, the archbishop of Canterbury held another convocation, for the election of delegates, the names of whom were returned to the king, whose prerogative it was to pitch upon what number he thought proper to represent the English clergy in the ensuing council: a sum of money was likewise voted to the delegates who were to act on this occasion. At this convocation also several were punished for heresy and other crimes.

Archbishop Chicheley was famous for a great number of constitutions which he enacted, enjoining the celebration of festivals, regulating the probates of wills by administration, instituting a kind of inquisition against Lollardism, providing against false weights, reviving the constitutions of John Peckham, archbishop of Canterbury, who decreed that in those cases and articles in which the sentence of the greater excommunication was incurred, should be publicly declared in every parish church for the information of the people; and augmenting the stipends of vicars, who were allowed to sue for such augmentation "in forma pauperum."

The last ecclesiastical occurrence in the reign of Henry V. was the reformation of the Benedictine monks, who were become so luxurious and dissolute that the king himself interposed to reduce them to greater regularity; and by his orders a provincial chapter was held in the year 1422, in the chapter-house at Westminster, where the following regulations passed.

"That the abbots should employ their attention in the cure of souls; and that the extravagance of their equipage should be retrenched, so that none should be attended by above twenty horse, under a severe temporal penalty.

"That none of the monks should ever make gifts of the effects of the convent above the value of forty shillings.

"That they should be uniform in the colour and fashion of their habits.

"That their necessities should be supplied, not in money, which none of the order ought to possess, but in provision of things needful.

"That they should not have distinct private cells for the entertainment of female guests.

"Lastly, That, since the way to preserve chastity was to avoid the conversation of women, therefore none of the monks should have liberty to go into the cities or towns to visits or merry-makings."

No sooner had the illustrious Henry V. paid the common debt of nature, and the reins of government were devolved into the hands of an infant king, than the see of Rome began to take advantage of a circumstance which appeared so favourable for her purpose, and to endeavour at levelling that terrible fence against her usurpations, the statute of Præmunire. This statute, which has been already mentioned on several occasions, though it did not directly attack the pope, since the parliament had no jurisdiction over him, yet as it hindered the English from applying to the court of Rome for things contrary to the prerogative of the crown and the laws of the realm, it abridged the pope of good part of the advantages which he pretended to reap from his apostolic power. It will, perhaps be thought strange that the popes should be silent at the time, and so long after the time this statute was passed; but the continued schism which had rent the Roman church from 1378 to 1409, had hindered them from stirring. It is true there was an interval of some years, during which Alexander V. and John XXIII. might have made some attempt against that law; but Alexander's pontificate was very short, and John was employed in affairs which he thought of more importance. Martin V. however, did not consider this affair with the same indifference; and he no sooner heard of the death of Henry V. than he thought the minority of his successor, Henry VI. a favourable opportunity to compass his ends. Accordingly he wrote a thundering letter to Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, upbraiding him for his remissness, and enjoining him to exert his utmost efforts to get this statute repealed. As this letter is a very extraordinary one of its kind, and shews the pope's sentiments of the pretended privileges of his see, it may not be unacceptable to give an extract from it; such of our readers who may be desirous of perusing it entire, will find it in bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. i.

He begins with accusing the archbishop in the warmest terms with "having neglected his pastoral care, and minding nothing but the means of amassing wealth." He tells him, "that he suffered his flock to brouze on poisonous herbs, and that when wolves came to devour them, he stood like a dumb dog, without so much as barking." Then he inveighs against the statute of Præmunire as an act "that repealed the laws of God and the church, and subverted the ancient usages of the good kingdom of England." He complains that "such a rigour is the more unjustifiable, as the English government does not treat Jews, Turks, and Infidels with so great severity: people of all countries and persuasions (says he) have the liberty of coming into England, only those who have cures bestowed on them by Christ's vicar are excluded; those only are banished, seized, imprisoned, stripped of their fortunes, and thrown out of the king's protection. Was ever such iniquity (exclaims this mild and modest pontiff) passed into a law?" He concludes with an order to the archbishop to repair immediately on the receipt of his letter to the council, and use all his interest there, and in the parliament, for the abrogating this statute; and threatening him, in case of remissness or non-compliance with this his apostolic injunction, that he should incur the sentence of excommunication."

If it should be enquired, why pope Martin poured forth all his indignation upon Chicheley in particular, who was not concerned in the statute of Præmunire, passed long before he was archbishop? the reason is this, Chicheley had opposed to his utmost the papal exemptions; he had dissuaded Henry V. from consenting that Henry Beaufort, his uncle, bishop of Winchester, should be made cardinal and legate a latere for life; moreover, he had publicly declared that the views of the see of Rome were perpetually to drain the country of its treasures for the aggrandizing of her own sons.

Chicheley, on receiving the above letter, sent an apology for his conduct to Rome; notwithstanding which he was again severely reprimanded; and, notwithstanding the archbishop of York, and the bishops of London, Durham, and Lincoln wrote to his holiness in favour of their brother, and that their instances were backed by the university of Oxford, which gave testimony greatly in honour of the archbishop's character, whom they termed "the golden candlestick of the church of England," yet Martin remained implacable, and summoned Chicheley to Rome, as an enemy to the pope in England.

At last the archbishop, seeing the pope thus obstinate, and not daring longer to disobey him, went, with with several other bishops, to the house of commons, where he made a long speech, tending to persuade the house to repeal the statute, and put them in mind of the danger of an interdict upon the whole kingdom. But the members, supposing this harangue was the effect of compulsion, paid no regard to the metropolitan's threats or remonstrances, but presented an address to the king, praying that he would take the archbishop into his protection, and to write to the pope in his behalf.

When the crusade against the Bohemians was preached up, and the cardinal of Winchester declared general of the enterprize, the pope ordered that prelate to collect a tenth from the English clergy, for the expence of the expedition; but all the convocation would grant was eight pence in the mark, on condition it should be found consistent with the king's prerogative, and the laws of the kingdom. The pope's nuncio thinking this supply insufficient, had the insolence to venture to collect money without being properly authorised, and was imprisoned for his presumption: in short, Martin perceiving he was supported neither by the king's council, the clergy, nor the people, dropped the affair, not thinking proper to expose his authority any farther.

Pope Martin V. in the year 1430, issued his summons for a general council to meet at Basil, the capital of a canton of that name in Switzerland; upon which the archbishop of Canterbury held a convocation at London, when the following delegates were chosen to represent the English church in that assembly, and two pence in the pound voted to defray their expences: Thomas, bishop of Worcester; William, prior of Norwich; Thomas Brown, dean of Salisbury; Peter Patrick, chancellor of Lincoln; Robert Baston, precentor of Lincoln; John Salisbury, doctor of divinity; and John Simon Desborough, bachelor in common law. These received instructions to act against all papal dispensations and other abuses which had crept into the church of Rome, especially that of providing livings for unqualified persons. Pope Martin would have avoided convening this council if it had been in his power, but finding himself strongly pressed by the emperor and other princes in Christendom, he ordered cardinal Julian Cesarini to preside as legate, and open the assembly; but dying before its meeting, which was in the year 1431, Eugenius IV. was chosen in his room.

Neither the emperor Sigismund nor the fathers of the council of Constance had foreseen the consequences of the execution of John Hus and Jerom of Prague. Out of their ashes rose a civil war; for the Bohemians looked upon this action as a cruel affront offered to their whole country, and imputed the death of their fellow-citizens to the revenge of the Germans, who had withdrawn from the university of Prague: they openly reproached the emperor with having violated the law of nations; and, not long afterwards, when Sigismund attempted to succeed his brother Wenceslaus in the kingdom of Bohemia, he found that, though he was emperor and king of Hungary, the death of two private citizens barred his way to the throne of Bohemia. The avengers of John Hus amounted to no less than forty thousand. Martin V. espousing the cause of Sigismund, and publishing crusades against the Hussites, they found themselves obliged to stand in their own defence, and chose for their general a person called Ziska (or the One-eyed), chief in barbarity and rank among these barbarians who defeated Sigismund in several battles. This same Ziska having lost his only remaining eye in an engagement, still continued to march at the head of his troops, giving his orders to his generals, and assisting at their victories: he commanded his soldiers, that, after his death, they should make a drum of his skin*, which they obeyed, and these his remains proved for a long time fatal to his enemies.

This war continued till the meeting of the council of Basil, which, considering the bad success of Sigismund, resolved to make peace with the Hussites. With this view the fathers invited them to send deputies to the council; who, being sent accordingly, presented the four following articles containing their chief tenets and sentiments, in which they differed from the church of Rome, to whom they offered to reunite themselves should it agree to these articles:

"I. That communion in both kinds should be administered to the Bohemian laity.

"II. That offenders should be punished according to the law of God, and by those to whom such correction belonged.

"III. That the word of God should be preached by pastors properly qualified. And,

"IV. That the clergy should have no jurisdiction over temporalities."

Eugenius IV. who had by this time succeeded pope Martin, highly resented the proceedings of the council: he said, that admitting the Bohemians to a conference was an indignity, not only to the holy see, but to the authority of the council of Constance, wherein those heretics had been so solemnly condemned; he therefore published a bull in the beginning of the year 1432, dissolving the council, and summoning another to Bologna in a year. The members, however refused to separate, and passed several decrees, which placed the authority of a general council above that of the pope, and vacating the bull for their dissolution. On this occasion a convocation was held at London, in which it was resolved to send more delegates to the council, and that some of them should repair to the pope, in order to attempt an accommodation between him and the council. In this same convocation a dispute happened between the archbishops of Canterbury and York, about precedence; for Kemp, archbishop of York, having obtained a cardinal's hat, claimed the upperhand of the archbishop of Canterbury in the parliament house at Westminster; Chicheley opposed this with great firmness: pope Eugenius, before whom the matter was laid, espoused the cause of the cardinalate, though without any effect.

The dispute between the pope and the council now flamed forth more violent than ever; but the emperor, the king of France, and most of the other princes of Europe, declaring for the council, and this latter threatening to suspend the pope, Eugenius saw himself under the necessity of confirming the council and approving its decrees.

This forced compliance of the pope appeased the quarrel for some time, and, in the year 1433, the affair of the Hussite heresy was taken into serious consideration. The fathers of the council exhausted all their art and eloquence in persuading the Bohemians to submit to the church at discretion; but finding them inflexible, resolved to grant their demands, on condition that they should be previously explained, in order to avoid new disputes. This they accordingly did by the mouth of their orator, Peter Payne, an Englishman, and a concordat was settled, to the satisfaction of all parties. This affair being accommodated, Sigismund was acknowledged king of Bohemia, after having approved of the concordat, and subscribed some other conditions; but he had no sooner mounted the throne, than he broke his promise, and the pope refused to sign the concordat: the troubles of Bohemia were renewed; and, being fomented by the pope of Rome, continued till the Hussites were entirely ruined*.

In the year 1438, the university of Oxford complained that church-preferments were bestowed without any regard to learning or merit: that the colleges were thereby become empty, because there was no need of study or learning to be qualified for a benefice. Whereupon the convocation, then sitting, formed a canon, declaring "that none but graduates in either of the universities should be capable of enjoying benefices†."

During these transactions, Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, died, after having filled that see twenty-nine years, during all which time he had been a strenuous assertor of his own independency, and that of the church of England, though sometimes obliged to give way to the necessity of a conjunction with the Roman pontiff. He was also a remarkable benefactor to learning and learned foundations. He was succeeded by John Strafford, son to the earl of Strafford, one of the greatest families in England. This prelate, at the time of his accession to the see of Canterbury, was lord high-treasurer and bishop of Bath and Wells. Under this prelate the clergy complained grievously that the act of Præmunire, which was meant to guard the church of England, was, by the construction of the common lawyers, turned into an engine of oppression, and that, by the arts of perverse men, they were subjected to all manner of persecution, by vexatious suits in the courts, and this by the misapplication of a single word; for it was enacted in that statute, "That if any purchase or pursue, or cause to be purchased or pursued, in the court of Rome, or elsewhere, any translations, processes, &c. &c. affecting the king's rights ‡," &c. Now they observed, that when common lawyers were disposed to harass the clergy, they put such a construction upon the word elsewhere, as to bring them within the statute, if ever they should prosecute any matter of ecclesiastical right before any of the ecclesiastical courts without the kingdom; whereas the word elsewhere can only refer to the place in which the pope might chance to preside; and therefore they prayed that some remedy might be applied to this evil, by expunging elsewhere in the statute of Præmunire: but the times were too unsettled for them to obtain immediate satisfaction.

The dispute between the council of Basil and pope Eugenius IV. being again revived, on account of his perfidy in refusing to sign the concor-dat, the assembly proceeded to depose him, and, in the year 1440 or 1441, chose another pope in his room. This was Amadeus, duke of Savoy, who was the first of his family who had borne the title of duke, and afterwards turned hermit from a motive of devotion, which Poggio says he thinks to have been far from real: be that as it may, his piety could not hold out against the temptation of a tripple crown; accordingly he was declared supreme pontiff, though a layman, and took the name of Felix V. But that which had occasioned so violent a schism, and the most bloody war in the time of Urban VI. now only produced a few ecclesiastical disputes, bulls, censures, counter-excommunications, and splenetic invectives: the council of Basil had bestowed the epithets of simonist, schismatic, heretical, and perjured, on Eugenius IV. and his secretary returned the abuse by styling the fathers fools, madmen, and barbarians, and their new pontiff Cerberus and Antichrist. In fine, in the year 1449, this council dispersed gradually of itself, and this hermit-pope duke of Savoy contented himself with a cardinal's hat, and left the church in its usual tranquility. Eugenius dying in 1447, was succeeded by Nicholas V. who, upon the resignation of Felix, was acknowledged as lawful pope. Thus ended at length this schism, in which there was a complication of three schisms, first between Eugenius IV. and the council of Basil; then between two general councils, and lastly between two popes. My reason for having introduced what passed between the two famous councils of Constance and Basil, was to shew the reader, in its true light, the wretched state of the church in those days.

Nothing remarkable happened for a year or two in ecclesiastical affairs in England. On the first of June, 1452, Strafford, archbishop of Canterbury, died, and was succeeded by John Kemp, archbishop of York and cardinal, who held his see not quite two years, and was succeeded by Thomas Bourchier, brother to the earl of Essex and cardinal-bishop of Ely. He owed his election to the monks alone, which was confirmed by the pope. He composed a set of articles of reformation for his province, amongst which were the following:

"I. That all religious who, abandoning their habit, entered upon parochial cures, should lose their freedom, and be punished as deserters from their order.

"II. That no church-living should be farmed, without leave from the bishop. And,

"III. Lastly, That all marriages and last testaments should have two witnesses."

But the most remarkable churchman that lived at this period was Reginald Peacock, bishop of Chichester, a person of great learning and reputation, who appears to have been a kind of free-thinker in matters of religion. If we believe Collier and other ecclesiastical historians, he maintained, "that the meaning of the holy Scriptures was to be collected by the force of natural reason; and as for the generality of preaching, it was little better than bawling in the pulpit. He denied the apostles were the authors of the creed which goes under their name; questioned the received doctrine of several articles; and made human reason the ultimate judge of the controversy. He denied the descent of our Saviour into hell; and though he granted the article of the Catholic Church might pass, he added, that Christians were not bound to the observance of the canons any farther than they could be found agreeable to reason and good sense." For these tenets, and others that were deemed equally erroneous, published by him in a long creed, drawn up in English, he was condemned, in a convocation, held at London, by Strafford, then archbishop of Canterbury; and, upon the death of the earl of Suffolk, his great patron, in the year 1450, his books were ordered to be burnt, and himself forced to recant part of his writings. He was afterwards deprived of his see, and sent to live at Maidstone, in Kent, where he died in obscurity.

During the remainder of the period under consideration, the civil and ecclesiastical affairs of England are so interwoven, that the latter have generally been accounted for in the relation given of the former; we shall therefore be very brief on this head, touching only on such matters which could not be introduced in the civil history.

Edward IV. found the friendship of the clergy so necessary for supporting his disputed title to the crown, that he rather enlarged than abridged their privileges. He granted them a charter, exempting them from the jurisdiction of the civil power, in criminal causes, and remitting all such to the judgment of their ordinaries.

In this reign, pope Sixtus IV. at the solicitation of Graham, archbishop elect of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, erected that see and Glasgow into archbishoprics, independent of the diocese of York, which claimed a jurisdiction over the church of Scotland: but the same pope, to make this encroachment go down with the English clergy more smoothly, granted them several advantageous bulls, by which they were rendered more independent of the secular power; and also confirmed, renewed, and greatly augmented the privileges of the university of Oxford.

Upon the death of the usurper Richard III. whose short and troubled reign left little room for any ecclesiastical transactions of note, archbishop Bourchier placed the crown of England on the head of the fortunate earl of Richmond, Henry VII. and dying in the year 1486, was succeeded by Morton, bishop of Ely, who had been greatly instrumental in raising Henry to the throne. The civil history of this king's reign has shewn us, that his situation, like that of Edward IV. laid him under a kind of necessity of keeping fair with the clergy; and they, in return, took care to gratify so obliging a patron. The secure retreat that sanctuaries afforded to all those who took refuge in them, had given Henry no little uneasiness in the cases of Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbeck; he therefore applied to his friends the churchmen, to give up some part of this their privilege in his favour; and, by their concurrence, a bull was procured from Rome for regulating these sanctuaries, which, according to lord Bacon, contained, among others, the following articles:

"I. That if any sanctuary-man did, by night or otherwise, privately get out of a sanctuary, and commit mischief or trespass, and then come in again, he should lose the benefit of sanctuary for ever after.

"II. That how soever the person of the sanctuary-man was protected from his creditors, yet his goods out of sanctuary should not.

"III. That if any took sanctuary for cases of treason, the king might appoint keepers to watch and guard him in sanctuary."

Such in general was the state of the English church during the period from the year 1413 to the year 1509, in which we meet with no national councils, but only convocations of the clergy in the two metropolitan provinces of Canterbury and York. National synods were, indeed, become useless, since the popes had engrossed the cognizance of all ecclesiastical affairs; besides, the least appeal to the pope was sufficient to annul all the canons of a council. On the other hand, the popes had so managed, that no national synods could be held without their licence; now as in those synods there was but too frequent occasion to enquire into the extent of the papal authority, they were grown so odious to the court of Rome, that the use of them was insensibly laid aside, and the pope was become the centre of religion, to which every thing was to tend: while the legates sent hither by the see of Rome were so many incendiaries, who sought every means to sow discord and division among kings and their nobles, or excite the former to acts of violence and oppression. In a word, they regarded only the interest of their master, and the papal chair, making no scruple to violate all the ties of religion and equity to accomplish their ends.

The indolence and devotion of Henry VI. was extremely detrimental to the English church. He was the first king of England who gave the bishops a taste for a court-life, which brought them into all the intrigues of ambition and avarice. The heads of the universities, and some of the more virtuous prelates, were sensible of this degeneracy, and endeavoured, but in vain, to put a stop to the papal provisions, which were the roots of all abuses, since few could hope to attain any degree of preferment in the church, who did not render themselves commendable by their attachment to the interests of the court of Rome, or for their services to the prince in his temporal concerns.

The great favour shewn the clergy by his successors, Edward IV. Richard III. and Henry VII. who all stood in need of their assistance, at length raised this body to such an envied pitch of greatness as prepared the way to that reformation, which, some years after, ushered in their fall: a glorious event! which must make the subject of the ensuing period.

LEARNED

LEARNED MEN in the XVth CENTURY.

LEARNING was at a very low ebb in this century, till the accession of Henry V. but through the whole course of his glorious reign, there was always a particular bias on the part of the crown towards the advancement of literature. This great design was carried into much more extensive execution than could be imagined from the multiplicity of martial concerns with which the life of that prince was filled: in short, perhaps several princes, to the time of Charles I. in England, have been patrons of learning, but we know none who was at the same time the patron of liberty and the arts besides Henry V. The fine taste for polite learning he inherited from his family always appeared uppermost, amidst the toils of the field or the intricacies of the cabinet: in a word, we may say, that from his time learning in England began to gain every day new strength, and to improve in numberless useful discoveries. The most eminent men for learning which this period produced, were the following.

John Seguard was a very fine Latin poet, and possessed a variety of polite learning. He flourished about the year 1414, and was so unblameable in his life and morals, that the freedom he took in lashing the lives of the monks and priests never brought him into trouble. His great patron was the martial bishop of Norwich, Richard Courtney.

Richard Snettisham acquired so great reputation at Oxford, that, though very young, he was elected chancellor of that university in the year 1412. He was reckoned one of the best disputants of the age, and was indefatigable in his labours in expounding the holy Scriptures in the public schools. He was appointed, by the archbishop of Canterbury, one of the censors of Wickliff's doctrine.

John Beston, prior of a convent of Carmelites, in Lynn, was held to be one of the greatest orators of the age. He was illustrious for philosophy and divinity, in the university of Cambridge, as likewise in that of Paris. He was sent as one of the delegates to the council of Sienna, called by pope Martin V. but that council never meeting, he died at Lynn about the year 1428.

The elder Leland was one of the best grammarians of that age. He taught in the university of Oxford with so much success, that the following barbarous verse grew into part of his character with the public:

Ut rosa flos florum,
Sic Leland grammaticorum.

He was buried at Oxford, in the year 1428.

Richard Ullerstone, a Lancashire man, was fellow of Queen's college in Oxford, doctor of divinity, and canon of York, but a zealous Anti-Wickliffite. He published a book in 1409, concerning the articles of faith, or the creed of the church, which shews him to have been a great master of controversial learning. He likewise, at the request of the cardinal-bishop of Salisbury, wrote a book in Latin, concerning the reformation of the church, in which he proved himself as zealous a reformer as the warmest Wickliffite. He was likewise author of several other tracts, relating to the divinity common in those days.

Peter Clerk was himself a professed Wickliffite, though master of arts in the university of Oxford. He disputed about the points in debate, in the year 1420, with Thomas Walden; but his great zeal had almost cost him his life, for he was obliged to fly to Bohemia: but even there he was apprehended by order of the emperor, nor did he ever after return to England.

Thomas Walden is represented by Leland, and other authors of that stamp and time, as one of the most formidable enemies that the Wickliffites ever had: he is cried up by Leland and other writers as a man of prodigious acuteness in disputation. This much is certain, that Henry IV. who was a great judge of learned men, sent him from England to the council of Pisa, where he distinguished his zeal against the schism of the two antipopes. In the year 1414, he was made provincial prior of his order of the Carmelites, being the twenty-third of that succession; and he had the courage to reproach Henry V. to his face from the pulpit, for his indolence against the Wickliffites: this freedom was not, perhaps, disagreeable to the king, as Leland tells us that Walden's zeal was principally levelled against the Oldcastellans, of whom, no doubt, the king, in the beginning of his reign, was extremely jealous. About the year 1415, the king made Walden his father-confessor, and sent him to the council of Constance, as being the best qualified of any man in England to make a figure against the Hussites. About the year 1419, he was employed in a kind of mediation between the king of Poland and the great-master of the Teutonic order: his intercession had great weight, and he had the address to introduce his order of Carmelites into those countries. But this was not all, for he converted to the Christian religion Wittold, duke of Lithuania, one of its most dreadful enemies. He had the honour to be in the bed chamber when Henry V. expired; and he afterwards died at Rouen, on the third of November, 1430.

Richard Flemming, a Yorkshireman, educated at Oxford, was a professed favourite of Wickliff's doctrine, and very eminent in the learning of those days. One Nicholas Pout particularly affected to oppose him in all public disputations: but Flemming, either receiving new conviction, or altering his sentiments, through the flow of ecclesiastical promotions which came upon him, became a violent persecutor of the sect he had befriended, and was appointed one of the twelve censors of Wickliff's doctrine. He was the founder of Lincoln college, which he had designed as a seminary for Anti-Wickliffites. On the twenty-fourth of May, 1420, he was appointed bishop of Lincoln by the pope; and afterwards, as we have already seen, was nominated to the see of York, but the pope was obliged to drop his nomination. In the council of Sienna, to which he was sent, he made a great figure in defending the honour of the English nation above all others. He died in the year 1430.

William Lyndwood was first of Gonvil hall, in Cambridge, and then took his degree as doctor in Oxford. He was undoubtedly one of the greatest canonists this nation has produced, and a most consummate statesman. He was keeper of the privy-feal to Henry V. and employed by him in many important negociations, particularly to the courts of Spain and Portugal. By Henry VI. he was sent to the council of Basil; and in the year 1434 he was made bishop of St. David's, but died in 1446. His great work, and indeed the only work of the kind we have, composed by an Englishman, is his Provinciale seu Constitutiones Angliæ. Therein we have the provincial decrees of forty archbishops, digested into order, with large and learned commentaries upon them.

There were but few good historians graced this period: those whose writings in this kind were the most esteemed, were,

Sir John Froissart, who wrote a general history of France, Spain, &c. but chiefly of England. He was a Frenchman born, but was brought up in his youth in the court of Edward III. and familiarly conversant in that of Richard II. He wrote in his own tongue, which was then the court-language of England. In the English edition, published by sir John Bouchier at the command of Henry VIII. the mistakes that had crept into the French copies are corrected. His account of matters seems to be plain and honest; and perhaps none gives a better of the affairs of Edward III. and Richard II.

Enguerrand de Monstrelet, and Philip de Commines, may not improperly be called Froissart's continuators. They give a faithful and complete account of the affairs of England, as far as they are intermixed with, or have any relation to those of France, Burgundy, &c.

L A W S.

THE common law of England (saith the author from whom we borrowed our last observations on this head*), during the reigns of Henry IV. and Henry V. fell short of the excellency it had in the first part of the reign of Edward III. but the times of Henry VI. as also of Edward IV. Edward V. and Henry VII. were times that abounded with excellent lawyers.

The first part of Henry VI. indeed is more barren, spending itself in much learning, of little moment, and now out of use: but the second part is full of excellent learning. In the time of these three kings, Henry VI. Edward IV. and Henry VII. the learning seems to be much alike: but these two things is observable in them, and indeed generally in all reports after the time of Edward III. viz.

First, that real action and assize were not so frequent as formerly; but many titles of land were determined in personal actions: and the reasons thereof seem to be, first, because the learning of them began by little and little to be less known or understood: secondly, the ancient strictness of preserving possessions to possessors till eviction by action, began not to be so much in use, unless in cases of descents and discontinuances, the latter necessarily drove the demandant to his Formedon, or his Cui in vita, &c. But the descents that shewed entry, were rare, because men preserved their rights to enter, &c. by continual claims: thirdly, because the statute of 8 Henry VI. had helped men to an action to recover their possessions by a writ of Thomas Walsingham, a Benedictine monk of St. Alban's. His Historia Brevis (or Short History) begins at the conclusion of Henry III's reign, where Matthew Paris ended his. The account he gives is well enough; and we are indebted to him for many things not taken notice of by any other writer of those times. His Ypodigma Neustriæ (as he calls it) gives an account of Normandy, from the time it came first into the hands of Rollo and his Danes, down to the sixth year of Henry V. wherein the reader will find many occurrences not elsewhere to be met with. Both these works were published by archbishop Parker, in 1547, and reprinted at Francfort in 1603.

John Harding comes next, a northern Englishman, and an inveterate enemy to the Scots. He collected whatever might tend to the proof of the antient vassalage of Scotland to the crown of England; and hearing of an old record in that kingdom which put the matter past dispute, he went in disguise, with much ado brought it away, and shewed it to Henry V. Henry VI. and Edward IV. To the last of these he dedicated his two books of Chronicles in English rhyme. Printed at London, 1543.

John Rose, or Rous, travelled over the greatest part of England, and having made large collections out of the libraries where he came, he wrote the history of our kings, which was published in 1716, by T. Hearne, from a MS. in the Cottonian Library. He died 1491.

Forcible Entry, even while the methods of recovery of possessions by ejectments was not known or used. The second thing observable, is that though pleadings in the time of those kings were far shorter than afterwards, especially after the death of Henry VIII. yet they were much longer than in the time of Edward III. and the pleaders, and even the judges, became somewhat too curious therein. So that art or dexterity of pleading, which in its use, nature, and design was only to render the fact plain and intelligible, and to bring the matter to judgment with a convenient certainty, began to degenerate from its primitive simplicity, and the true use and end thereof, and became a piece of nicety and curiosity; which, how these latter times have improved the length of the pleading, the many and unnecessary repetitions, the miscarriages of causes upon trivial niceties, have too much witnessed. Our author next gives some general observations touching the proceedings of law in these latter times, more especially touching the length and nicety of pleadings, which at this day far exceeds not only that short yet perspicuous course of pleading which was in the time of Henry VI. Edward IV. and Henry VII. but those of all times whatsoever, as the vast presses of parchment for any one plea do abundantly witness; and the reasons thereof seem to be these, viz. first, because in ancient times, the pleadings were drawn at the bar, and the exceptions all taken at the bar, which were rarely taken for the pleasure or curiosity of the pleader, but only as it was apparent that the omissions, or matter excepted to, was for the very merit or life of the cause, and purposely omitted or mispleaded, because the matter or cause would bear no better; but now the pleadings being first drawn in writing, are drawn to an excessive length, and with much laboriousness and care enlarged, lest it might afford an exception, not intended by the pleader, and which could be easily supplied from the truth of the case; lest the other party should catch that advantage, which commonly the adverse party studies, not in contemplation of the merit or justice of the cause, but to find a slip to fasten upon, though in truth not material to the merits of the plea, wherein all things conform to it. Secondly, because those parts of pleading (which in antient times were material, but at this time are become mere styles and forms), are still continued with much strictness; and so all those ancient forms (at first introduced for conveniency, but now not necessary, or it may be antiquated to their use) are yet continued, as things wonderfully material, though they only swell the bulk, and contribute nothing to the weight of the plea. Thirdly, these pleas being mostly drawn by clerks, who are paid for entries and copies thereof, the larger the pleadings are the more profit comes to them; and the dearer the clerk's place is, the dearer he makes the client pay. Fourthly, an over-forwardness in courts to give countenance to frivolous exceptions, though they make nothing to the true merits of the cause, whereby it often happens, that causes are not determined according to their merits, but do often miscarry for inconsiderable omissions in pleading.

Next our author gives reasons why, in the time of Edward I. one term contained not above two or three hundred rolls; but in latter times one term contained two thousand rolls, or more: his reasons are, first, many petty businesses, as trespasses or debts under forty shillings, are now brought to Westminster, which used to be dispatched in county or hundred courts; and yet the plaintiff is not to be blamed, because at this day those inferior courts are so ill served, and justice there so ill administered, that they had better seek it (where it may be had) at Westminster, though with some more expence: secondly, multitudes of attorneys practising in the great courts of Westminster, who are ready at every market to gratify the spleen, spite, and strife of every plaintiff: thirdly, a great increase of people in this kingdom above what they were anciently, which must needs multiply suits: fourthly, a great increase of trade, and trading persons, above what there were in ancient times, which must have the like effect: fifthly multitudes of new laws, both penal and other; all which breed new questions, and new suits at law: and particularly the statutes touching the devising of lands, cum multis aliis: sixthly, the multiplication of actions upon the case, which were rare formerly, and thereby a wager at law outsted; which discouraged many suits; for when men were sure that they rested upon a bare contract, without specialty, the other party might wage his law, they would not treat upon such contracts without reducing the debt into a speciality, if it were of any value, which created much certainty and accorded many suits*.

We shall now proceed to shew the great improvements made in the statute law, by the several monarchs who reigned during this period. And first of HENRY V.

THIS great king, on his accession to the throne, gave his assent to several statutes tending to the preservation of the public peace, and of the people's rights and privileges, and in particular one relating to the elections for members of parliament. Henry IV. as well as Richard II. had endeavoured to corrupt the house of commons; and the court had of late years fallen upon the method of getting its own dependents chosen for counties and boroughs, to whose interests they were absolute strangers, and where they had resided. This practice, if not discouraged, bid fair to extinguish all the spirit of an English parliament, a seasonable check therefore was given to it in this king's first parliament, which met on the fifteenth of May, 1413, and which enacted,

"That none should be chosen knights of the shire who were not resident in the county on the day when the writs were dated; nor any be chosen burgesses but such as were citizens, or townsmen and freemen, dwelling in the towns and cities where they were elected."

It was also enacted in this session, that no under-sheriff, sheriff's clerk, receiver, or bailiff, should be attorney in the king's courts during the time he is in office with such sheriffs†.

In the next parliament under this king, holden at Leicester, on the thirtieth of April, 1414, the commons, desirous to have a clear and full explanation of their rights, drew up a petition for that purpose; and that the matter might be clearly understood, their petition was drawn up in English. In this remarkable address, they lay it down as an incontestible fact, "That it has ever been the privilege of their house, that no statute or law should pass without their assent; and upon this principle the house of commons has been ever a constituent part of the legislature, and assented as well as the petitioners; they therefore insist, that no act or statute should be made without their consent; and that nothing should be entered upon the rolls as their petitions, but in the direct terms in which they were presented by their speaker and granted by the king."

Had this petition, which Henry agreed to, been ever examined, it would have given an irrevocable blow to the arguments advanced by the enemies of the power of the commons in parliament.

In the eighth year of this king's reign, a parliament, which met on the sixteenth of October, among other regulations, passed an act for the consumption of home manufactures, by providing that all the English troops in France should be clothed and furnished with English commodities manufactured in England.

TAXES in the Reign of HENRY V.

His first parliament, which met on Monday the fifteenth of May, 1413, at Westminster, continued the subsidy of wool and leather for four years, and the tonnage and poundage for one: and, granting him an entire fifteenth and an half, expressed their hopes of being soon eased of such taxes and talliages by his good government.

† See Statutes, 1 Hen. V.

On occasion of his parliament addressing him to make war with France, in the second year of his reign, they granted him a subsidy of two whole tenths and two fifteenths, to be levied upon the laity; an immense sum for those days!

In his fourth year, he had again two whole tenths and two fifteenths, to be levied on the laity; and the clergy gave two tenths to be raised from their own body.

In his sixth, he had one tenth and one fifteenth, and two tenths from the clergy.

In his seventh, the parliament gave him one fifteenth and an half, and one tenth and an half.

In his ninth, he received a fifteenth from the laity, and a tenth from the clergy; and the bishop of Winchester (afterwards cardinal of England) lent him twenty thousand pounds by way of advance.

HENRY VI.

THE first remarkable parliamentary transaction we meet with under this reign, was during the king's minority, when, in a parliament held by the duke of Bedford, as regent of the kingdom, in April, 1425, the fourth after Henry's accession, amongst other salutary acts, one passed against the exportation of sheep beyond sea, without the king's licence; because, by carrying sheep into Flanders and other parts, the wool of England would at last become of little value, and the woollen manufacture be diminished, to the damage of the realm: to prevent which, they laid an heavy tax upon exported wool, of forty-three shillings by the sack, ten shillings more than ever was paid in England for the like quantity. From this reasonable provision we learn how jealous even in those days the legislature was of the English golden fleece; a jealousy which hath hitherto been transmitted down to their posterity, and which never can be lost without losing sight of the true interest of England. We have from this provision another hint, that the woollen manufactures of England were then much advanced beyond what is generally imagined; a retribution more than sufficient for all their expence of blood and treasure incurred in the reduction of France. The happy division of England from the continent had rendered her the asylum of banished arts and industry; and however loudly then the people complained of the public taxes, which were immediately and sensibly felt, as they must be under all governments, it is evident that the increase of trade and riches had now enabled them, especially the lower sort, to support them with ease, while the government applied them to bad purposes.

But, besides manufactures, it is certain that agriculture, that necessary attendant, was by this time highly advanced in England. Honest industry had for some time enjoyed under her own vine the fruits of her labour; and trade in some measure connected with the continent of the country, which nature had disjoined from it; for we find that there was another act of this parliament for the exportation of butter and cheese, to encourage husbandry, giving the chancellor of England power to grant licences, at his discretion, to such persons who should apply for them, to sell and vend the same in all foreign parts as well as at the staple of Calais. "That all merchant-strangers, within fifteen days after they are landed in any port of this kingdom, shall take up for themselves lodgings, or some other habitations, in the town or place where the port is, under some Englishman; and shall not make sale of any goods or merchandizes till they are so settled; and then shall sell all their merchandizes within forty days next ensuing; and if any goods after this time shall remain unsold, they shall be forfeited for the king's use." This act, says a judicious, but inaccurate author, was intended that the king might not be defrauded by strangers of his customs; and next, that strangers might not, by keeping their goods and merchandizes, understand the wants of the nation, and so raise the prices. After these acts the parliament gave the king a tax of twelve pence per pound upon all merchandizes, whether brought into or carried out of the realm, except wool, which they had otherwise taxed; and wine, upon which they laid three shillings per tun for three years ensuing.

But we cannot dismiss this parliament without taking notice of some other laudable provisions which the commons insisted upon, for the public good; as if they had thought that their glory and grandeur abroad was but a secondary enjoyment to that of liberty and property at home.

For, among other petitions of the commons, one was from the inhabitants of Northumberland, praying that the extortions of the sheriffs, by yearly levying certain sums of money, called head-pence, amounting to fifty-one pounds, may be utterly abolished.

That such merchants as be grieved by the Bretons in time of truce, may have letters of marque.

That remedy may be provided for such victuals as are taken by the soldiers lying at sundry towns.

The grieved, upon complaint, shall be heard.

That all men imprisoned for treason, felony, or Lollardy, may come to their answers speedily.

The statutes afore-made shall be observed.

Another, That the treasurers of the chamber of Henry IV. and Henry V. who only are accountable to the king, and not in the Exchequer, may pay all due upon tallies.

The king will be advised.

Another, That the justices of peace in every county may redress all matters of sewers, and touching the waters.

The statutes therefore made shall be observed.

Another, That the feoffees that buy lands of the king's tenants in tail, may enjoy the same against the king.

The king will be advised*.

In this same fourth year of Henry VI. an act passed, "granting a discretionary power to the king and council to restrain the exportation of corn, whenever they shall judge it to be for the benefit of the realm:" Which restraint may be necessary, first, in the case of a bad harvest at home, whereby our own corn may prove too scanty for ourselves: secondly, in case of a very great dearth of it beyond sea, so that our dealers in corn may be allured by its high price in foreign parts, to export more of it than we can spare from our home consumption: and lastly, it may be frequently prudent and beneficial to restrain our exportation of corn for the distressing of our enemies, who may at such times be in great want of it, and who might obtain a supply of it from those neutral nations to whom we export it."

* See Stat. Hen. VI. Guthrie, vol. ii. p. 517, 518,

This prudent law has in the main been continued ever since in force, though with some temporary regulations, as the public utility from time to time required.

In the year 1429, the eighth of Henry VI. it was enjoined by act of parliament,

"That every city and town of England should at their own expence keep a common ballance with sealed weights, corresponding to the standards in the Exchequer; and all the inhabitants might weigh thereby, without paying any thing for the same; but strangers were obliged to pay." By this same statute it was enacted "that no man should buy woollen yarn, unless he will make cloth thereof."

In the parliament holden at Westminster, the tenth year of his reign, the following acts passed.

"I. That whereas, under the colour of outlawries sued out against certain persons, occasion was taken to molest others of the same name, and to seize goods and chattels, especially when they were dead, because there was no remedy at common law for executors to recover such seizures; wherefore it was enacted by the parliament in favour of executors, that, in defence of the testator's goods, a writ called "Identitate nominis," should be granted to them, and should be maintainable by them as by any other person living.

"II. That whereas the Welshmen assembled in great numbers, and did, in a riotous and rebellious manner, intercept and stop the boats, trowers, and boats called drags, carrying wares and merchandizes to Bristol, Gloucester, Worcester, and other places upon the river Severn, and broke the said vessels, to the end that the traders might have their boats and vessels of them only; therefore it was enacted, that all the king's liege people should have free passage upon the said river, to carry their goods and chattels as they please, without any molestation from the Welsh; and if, for the future, they any ways molested them in their traffick, the party or parties aggrieved, should have their action according to the course of common law.

"III. That in all pleas wherein bastardy is alleged against any person, party to the said plea, the judge or judges in the court wherein the said plea is depending shall certify it to the chancellor of England, for the time being, to the intent that proclamation be made in the same chancery by three months, once every month, that all persons that have any thing to object against the said mulier, or person pretending a legitimate issue, may put in their allegation and objections before any certificate be given in by the bishop."

In the twelfth year of his reign, in a parliament holden at Westminster, on the eighth of July, the following acts were passed.

"I. That such persons as were keepers of the stews, or whore-houses, in Southwark, should not be impannelled upon any jury, nor keep any inn or tavern in any other places; lest men of such vile consciences and practices should corrupt justice, and propagate their villanies over the nation.

"II. It was enacted, that even disseisors should not be put out of possession by any collusive tricks of law, as was then usual, by making the sheriff the disseisor, and then entering upon the lands for the default of the tenants not answering; wherefore it was ordained, that all such writs should be abated and quashed. And,

"III. In the behalf of the person disseised wrongfully of his lands, whereas before the law was, that the disseisee might sue the disseisor in his life-time, if he took the profits at the time the suit commenced, which, to avoid, the disseisors made over the land by feoffments to others, and so avoided the suit; whereas it was enacted, that the disseisees should have their action as well against the feoffee, as disseisees or himself, if either of them take the profits of the lands.

"IV. And because divers tenants of lands for term of life and years, made over the said lands to other under-tenants, to the end that they might not be liable to writs of waste, for the damages done upon the said lands by their order and connivance before the grant of the said leases; it was hereupon enacted, that the tenant in reversion might have his action against the tenant for life or years, for the damages done as well before as after the lease made to any under-tenants, and recover treble damages for the said waste, provided that it were proved that the said first tenants took the profits of the land to their own proper use at the time of waste done.

"V. Whereas divers suits and indictments, as well for the king as his subjects, were discontinued by making of new commissioners for the peace, to the great delay of justice, and wrong of the subject; it was enacted, that no pleas or processes should be discontinued by any new commissions; but the justices so made, should have power and authority to continue all pleas depending, and determine the same.

"VI. An abuse also being crept into the nation about measures contrary to the statutes, and purveyors, bakers, merchants, and buyers of corn, taking nine bushels for the quarter; it was enacted, that the statutes for weights and measures should be retained in every market-town, and that there should be a bushel, common balance, and weights in every market-town, city, or borough, kept by the mayor and justices thereof, according to the standard in the Exchequer; and if any person shall presume to sell or buy by any other weights or measures, they shall forfeit five pounds to the person that shall sue for it, and five pounds to the king.

"VII. Recognizors having found out the way to defeat the exactions of such persons as they were indebted to for recognizances, by bringing their writ "De corpus cum causa" out of chancery, and giving sureties to the king only, are delivered out of prison, and their creditors are defeated of their debts; it was therefore ordained, that sureties should be given as well to the party as to the king, that their debts may be surely paid."

In the parliament which sat early in the year 1437, the sixteenth of this reign, the following acts were passed.

"I. A remedy was provided against vexatious and troublesome suits of such persons as were not of the king's household, in the courts of stewards and marshals in the king's house; and it was allowed as an exemption from their jurisdiction, to plead and aver that they are not of the king's house.

"II. An allowance was given to all the subjects of England to transport corn of low price out of the realm, realm, viz. wheat at six shillings and eight pence, and barley at three shillings and four pence the quarter.

"III. An injunction to all sheriffs, bailiffs of franchises, and coroners, that in actions or writs of attainder of plea for land, of the yearly value of forty pounds, they do not return nor impanel any persons but such as be inhabitants in his bailiwick, and have an estate to their own use, in lands and tenements, to the yearly value of twenty pounds, or more, upon the penalty of forfeiting ten pounds to the king, and ten pounds to the plaintiffs in the said actions or writs of attainder: and that no person of less sufficiency of freehold than twenty pounds a year, shall be sworn in the king's courts upon any issue in the said actions, if he be for the same by the plaintiffs in due form challenged.

"IV. A permission was given to all persons, as well religious as secular, to appoint themselves general attorneys, to sue or plead for them in every hundred or wapentake. And,

"V. A prohibition was laid upon all merchants to ship, or cause to be shipped, any wool, woollfells, or any other merchandize belonging to the staple, in any place within the realm, excepting the quays and wharfs appointed by statute, where the king's weights and wools be set; excepting the merchants of Genoa, Venice, Tuscany, Florence, and the burghers of Berwick."

In the Fœdera, vol. x. p. 661. we meet with the form of a naturalization granted by Henry VI. this year to Titus Livius of Ferrara, poet to Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, the king's uncle, in substance, viz. "that he be received and taken in all respects as if he were a native of England; and shall be capable of holding any office or employment in England; may take or receive, buy or sell, any lands, revenues, reversions, advowsons, or other benefits, for him and his heirs; to have and plead all manner of actions, in all courts, in all respects like a natural-born subject." Than which a fuller naturalization can scarcely be penned in any words whatever.

In Sir Robert Cotton's Abridgment of the Records, p. 626, there is a second instance or proof that the English people, even so early as the year 1440, understood the expediency of a navigation-act (the former being under the year 1381), as the only means to preserve to themselves the benefit of being the sole carriers of their own merchandize, and as much of those of other nations as they could procure. It is a petition of the house of commons to the king Henry VI. requesting "that no Italian, nor any other merchant beyond the Streight of Morocco (i. e. Gibraltar), shall bring any other merchandize into the realm than such as are growing or produced in the same, their own respective countries;" and that for good reasons in the record.

The answer of king Henry was, "The king will be advised;" (which every one knows to be a flat denial from the crown.) Whether the king's own weak judgment or (which is most likely) the bribes of the Italians to his worthless ministers, produced this answer, is not perhaps easy to determine at this distance of time; but sure the petition was wisely intended, being the very substance of that enacted after the restoration of king Charles II. and still in force, to the very great benefit of the nation.

A remarkable and wholesome law was made in the twenty-third of king Henry VI. chap. vii. for reducing the number of attorneys at law in the two manufacturing counties of Norfolk and Suffolk: it takes notice, "that not long past there were not six or eight attorneys in both those counties and the city of Norwich together, in which times great tranquillity reigned there; whereas there were now more than fourscore attorneys, most part of whom, not being of sufficient knowledge, come to fairs, markets, and other public places, exhorting, procuring, moving, and inciting the people to suits for small trespasses, &c. wherefore there shall be but six attorneys for the county of Suffolk, six for Norfolk, and two for the city of Norwich."

In his thirty-second year, an affair of a very extraordinary nature took up the attention of the parliament, then assembled at Reading. This was no less than the arresting of Thorpe, speaker of the house of commons. The whole of this transaction, and the proceedings consequent thereupon, we have thus related by Mr. Carte, from the records.

Thorpe was a baron of the Exchequer, and, as was represented by the duke of York's counsel, to the house of lords, had, in the last summer, seized, in Durham Place, and carried off the duke's harness and warlike habiliments, with other goods, to the value of two thousand marks, against the said duke's will and licence; who thereupon brought an action against him in Michaelmas term, for the insult, in the court of Exchequer, agreeable to its privilege, Thorpe being a member thereof; and, after several hearings before a Middlesex jury, judgment was given against Thorpe in one thousand pounds damages to the duke for his trespass, and he was moreover committed to the Fleet prison till he should have made payment thereof, as also of his fine to the king for the breach of his peace. When this affair came to be argued, the duke's counsel insisted, "that as the trespass had been committed by Thorpe not in parliament-time, but during the prorogation, and that if he should be released by privilege of parliament before the duke had satisfaction for his costs and damages, the latter would be left without remedy; therefore that Thorpe should be kept, according to law, in custody till he should give full satisfaction for the said damages." The lords, out of tenderness for the privileges of the commons, and yet obliged to do justice to every one according to law, consulted the judges on the subject; who, after a mature deliberation, answered, "that it did not belong to them to determine in any ways the privilege of parliament; but the house of lords was the proper judicature to determine such privileges." The chief-justice, however, added in their name, "that, with regard to proceedings in the lower courts, in such cases as writs of Superfedeas and privilege of parliament, there were many of that kind brought into those courts, but never any general Superfedeas for the surcease of all processes; for if there were, it would look as if the high court of parliament, which ministers all justice and equity, should obstruct the process of common law, and put the party complainant without remedy, since actions at common law are not determined in parliament. But if any member of parliament were arrested in cases as neither for treason, felony, surety of the peace, nor for a condemnation had before the parliament, it was usual in such cases for the member to be released of his arrest, and to constitute an attorney, that he might have his liberty freely to attend on the parliament." The lords hereupon adjudged, that Thorpe should, according to law, remain in prison, notwithstanding his privilege as a member and speaker of the parliament; and the commons were thereupon required to chuse another speaker, which they accordingly did.

In the parliament of 1460, the thirty-ninth of this king's reign, the following statute was made, "that women being of the age of fourteen years at the time of the death of their ancestors, shall, without question or difficulty, have livery of their lands and tenements descended to them; for so the law of this land wills they should have."

TAXES in the Reign of HENRY VI.

In the fourth year of his reign, the duke of Gloucester then acting as regent, the parliament granted the king the subsidy of wool, namely, forty-three shillings and four pence on every sack, from strangers; and from denizens, thirty-three shillings and four pence: as also three shillings on every tun of wine, and twelve pence in the pound for all sorts of merchandize imported or exported.

In his sixth year, the parliament granted tonnage and poundage for two years; and of every parish within the realm, six shillings and eight pence for every twenty nobles in value; and six shillings and eight pence of every person that held immediately by knight's fee, or according to the rate.

A parliament held at Westminster, in January, 1431, the tenth of his reign, by the duke of Gloucester, keeper of England, gave the crown the grant of one tenth and one fifteenth, and of a third of both; a grant of tonnage and poundage for two years, with a subsidy of like value, of all merchant-strangers, over and above the said tonnage and poundage. The commons also granted the king, that every person holding a whole knight's fee, should pay the king twenty shillings; and so according to the value, under or over: and so of the clergy, for lands purchased since the twentieth of Edward I. that all other persons having any hereditaments to the value of twenty pounds, over all reprises not holden as above, shall pay to the king, and so according to the rate.

In his twelfth year he had a grant of one tenth and one fifteenth, to be levied on the laity; as also three shillings on every tun of wine imported or exported; twelve pence in the pound on all merchandize sold for two years, and a subsidy of fifty-three shillings and four pence on every sack of wool for three years.

In his fourteenth, a parliament which met at Westminster, on the tenth of October, granted the king a tenth and a fifteenth, deducting out of it four thousand pounds for the relief of decayed towns and villages; also tonnage and poundage for two years; a subsidy of thirty-three shillings and four pence of merchant-denizens, and of forty-six shillings and eight pence of aliens, for every sack of wool. They also granted, that every person having any freeholds in lands, annuities, fees, offices, or hereditaments, above five pounds yearly, should pay for every pound six pence, upon his oath. There was also a parliament in the beginning of the year 1436, which met at Westminster, on the twenty-first of January, and granted a tenth and fifteenth, and the like subsidy of wool for three years, as was granted in the former parliament.

In his eighteenth, a parliament met at Westminster, on the twelfth of November, which granted the king one tenth and one fifteenth, to be levied on the laity; and the subsidy of thirty-three shillings and four pence from the denizens, and forty-six shillings and eight pence from aliens, for every sack of wool; as also for tonnage and poundage, for which aliens were to pay seven shillings and eight pence. The commons also granted, that all aliens within the realm, who were not denizens, should pay to the king sixteen pence, if they were householders; and if they are not, then but six pence.

The parliament which met in 1446, granted the king a considerable subsidy, for a vigorous prosecution of the war in France, for which purpose they gave a tenth and an half, and a fifteenth and an half, except five thousand pounds allowed to poor wasted towns; they also granted tonnage and poundage on denizens as before, but double on aliens; and a subsidy of thirty-four shillings and four pence on denizens, and fifty-three shillings on aliens, for every sack of wool, for four years.

In his twenty-seventh year, his parliament granted him a tenth and a fifteenth; tonnage and poundage, for five years, of all merchants; with three shillings tonnage more of aliens; and the subsidy of wool for four years, as before. They also granted the king sixteen pence to be taken of every household within the realm not born in the king's dominions, and six pence of every other person not so born; and also six shillings and eight pence of every merchant-stranger, and twenty of all and every of their clerks.

In the year 1449, the twenty-seventh of his reign, the parliament met at Westminster, from whence it was adjourned to Black-friars, London, by reason of the plague being in the fore-named place, and on the fourth of December it was adjourned back again to Westminster, prorogued on the seventeenth to the twenty-second of January, 1450; and on the thirtieth of March prorogued to the twenty-ninth of April, at Leicester. In this parliament the commons granted the king an annual subsidy, viz. "that every person having frank tenement by free deed, copy, grant of annuity, or office, to the clear yearly value of twenty shillings, should pay six pence; and so to twenty pounds; from twenty pounds to two hundred pounds yearly, twelve pence in the pound; from two hundred pounds to pay two shillings for twenty shillings, as well for the laity as the clergy, guardians of wards, men having fees, and all corporations to pay accordingly."

On the seventeenth of March, 1453, a parliament sat at Reading, and on the eighteenth was prorogued to the twentieth of April, at Westminster, where it assembled accordingly; from thence, on the second of July, it was prorogued to the seventh of November, at Reading, and from thence to the eleventh of February, 1454, at Westminster; but notwithstanding it appears that it met at Reading, whence it was adjourned to Westminster; for on the fourteenth of February, in the first session, the commons granted the king one tenth and an half and one fifteenth and an half, tonnage and poundage during life, the subsidy of wool, viz.

twenty-three shillings and four pence for every sack of denizens, and five pounds of aliens; and so of other staple ware in proportion. They also granted the king, of every merchant not born within the realm who was no denizen and kept house, forty shillings per annum; and of every such merchant as shall remain within the realm but six weeks, twenty shillings; and of every merchant alien being no denizen, six pounds thirteen shillings and four pence yearly, during the king's life.

EDWARD IV.

THE most remarkable statutes in this king's reign were the following.

In his third year the importation of woollen cloth, laces, ribbons, all sorts of iron ware, and most other things manufactured in England, was strictly forbidden. This statute was farther enforced, especially in regard to English wool, in the following year.

In his seventh year, a parliament meeting at Westminster, on the third of June, or, according to others, the third of July, the king signed an act of resumption, wherein he recalled into his own hands all the crown-lands granted away during his reign.

TAXES in the Reign of EDWARD IV.

In the third year of his reign his parliament granted him an aid of thirty-seven thousand pounds, to be levied in the counties, cities, and towns. And, in the following year, the same parliament, which had been prorogued several times till the thirty-first of January, gave him tonnage and poundage for life; and of every English merchant for every sack of wool, thirty-three shillings and four pence, of every two hundred and forty wool-fells the same, and of every last of hides three pounds six shillings and eight pence; of every merchant-stranger, denizen or otherwise, for every sack of wool three pounds six shillings and eight pence, of every last of hides three pounds thirteen shillings and four pence, of every two hundred and forty wool-fells, three pounds six shillings and eight pence.

In his seventh year, the parliament at Westminster passed the resumption act, and also granted the king two tenths and two fifteenths.

In his eleventh year the commons granted that fourteen thousand archers should serve the king at their own charge, to be levied out of all men's lands, according to a certain proportion; and the lords spiritual and temporal granted towards the same the tenth part of one whole year's revenues of all and singular their possessions; and at a second session of the same parliament, the commons granted the king one tenth and one fifteenth.

In his thirteenth year they granted him one tenth and one fifteenth, and fifty-one thousand, one hundred and seventy pounds four shillings and seven pence three farthings, in full payment of the wages of the fourteen thousand archers granted before; towards the payment whereof every county, city, and town were severally taxed.

In the beginning of the year 1482, the twenty-second of his reign, a parliament, which met at Westminster, gave the king a tenth and fifteenth, to be levied on the laity, except six thousand pounds to be bestowed on decayed towns. They also granted a yearly subsidy, to be levied on all stranger as well denizens as otherwise. They moreover allowed a yearly rent out of the customs and other revenues, to defray the king's household expences, amounting to eleven thousand pounds.

RICHARD III.

IN January, A. D. 1484, the second of this king's usurped reign, he held his first parliament at Westminster, in which an act of attainder was passed against Henry, earl of Richmond, and all his adherents. The most remarkable statutes enacted in this parliament were these:

"I. An act abolishing a new imposition set on foot by Edward IV. called a benevolence.

"II. An act giving every justice of the peace power to admit a prisoner, arrested for felony, to bail; and that no officer shall seize the goods of a prisoner arrested for felony, till he is attainted.

"III. An act to settle the qualification of persons to be impanelled upon juries; no one to be chose but who hath twenty shillings freehold, or twenty-six shillings and eight pence copyhold, at least.

"IV. An act for settling the standard measures of wine and oil vessels, as follow: that every tun should hold two hundred and fifty-two gallons; a pipe, one hundred and twenty-six gallons; a tertian, eighty four gallons; an hoghead, sixty-three gallons; a barrel, thirty-one gallons and an half; a runlet, eighteen gallons and an half."

We meet with no other statutes worth notice during this reign, nor was the subject loaded with any new impost, notwithstanding the heavy outcries some historians have made on account of the exorbitant taxes this king laid on the nation: in this parliament, indeed, the commons continued to him, for his life, the subsidy of tonnage, poundage, wool, and hides, which they had granted in like manner to his brother Edward IV.

HENRY VII.

THE constitution of England, by the feudal law, was calculated plainly to govern the realm with a standing army, of which the king was commander in chief; the barons, his field-officers; the knights, his subalterns; and all the other subjects, the common soldiers. While the kings of England had great hereditary countries and lands of their own, whilst they were pursuing foreign conquests and subduing great nations, those countries supplied England with manufactures, and many of the necessities of life; and the people were too much abroad to feel their wants at home. The immense estates of the great barons, and their uncontrouled power over their vassals, kept them from feeling the miseries of the inferior sort; whilst the vast prerogative which was lodged in the crown often times squeezed all the riches of those barons into its own coffers. But the almost perpetual wars which the kings of England, upon their own accounts, and to preserve their hereditary dominions on the continent, were obliged to carry on with the kings of France, Scotland, and other potentates, made the barons sometimes of such importance, as to dispute their attendance, and by degrees to emancipate themselves from the rigours of the feudal constitution, as both the king and the nation severely felt till the days of Henry VII. That wise prince made use of the circumstances of the times he reigned in, to encourage encourage commerce and agriculture, and to raise the middling state of the subjects as the only balance against the dangerous power of the barons. In this he was greatly assisted by the situation in which the barons found themselves: they had just begun to breathe from a long and bloody war, which had emptied their veins and exhausted their estates; they wanted to enjoy the sweets of peace, but found themselves without the means to do it on account of the vast debts they had contracted.

But Henry, to smooth the way for removing those difficulties, seemed to part with an useless prerogative of his crown, by passing an act giving leave for all barons and great land holders, who should attend him, to alienate their estates, or sell or otherwise mortgage or dispose of the same, without paying for fines or licences of alienation. This act following a great benevolence very unconstitutionally granted by parliament, and which must have proved very prejudicial for many of the landed interest to have complied with, and the thing itself being popular, we know no opposition made to it by the great barons*.

A legal though dangerous cramp to the liberty of the subject was projected, encouraged, and at last enacted by this prince, almost in the very beginning of his reign: for under pretence that the channels of justice, by unlawful maintenances, giving of liveries, misbehaviour of sheriffs, and a number of other causes, were corrupted, the authority of the court of Star Chamber was now set up. The officers who constituted this court were, the chancellor and treasurer of England, for the time being, and the keeper of the privy-seal, or two of them, calling to them a bishop and a temporal lord of the king's most honourable council, and the two chief-justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas for the time being, or other two justices in their absence. Their powers "were (as appears by the words of the statute, 3 Hen. VII.) to proceed upon bill, or information, that to the said chancellor, for the king, or any other, against any person for misbehaving, to call before them, by writ or by privy-seal, the said misdoers, and they, and others by their discretion, by whom the truth may be known, to examine; and such as they find therein defective, to punish them after their demerits, after the form and effect of the statutes thereof made, in like manner and form as they should, and ought to be punished, if they were thereof convicted after the due order of laws." Thus the reader may perceive that the most valuable privileges of Englishmen, of not being taken or imprisoned but by the law of the land, or the judgment of their peers, was set aside.

But this institution, or, as lord Bacon will have it, re-creation, of the Star Chamber, who makes it of a date much more early than is to be found upon the rolls, or records of parliament, was far from completing the great civil scheme, which Henry had projected, of humbling the great men, so terrible to the crown, and enhancing the consequence of the commoners. He observed, that many salutary laws had been made by parliament, but that the over-grown powers of his great men, by neglecting the observance of those laws, had brought many of them into such disuse, that they were now as if they never had been. It was, for example, the law of the land, "that if any man be slain in the day, and the felon not taken, the township where the death or murder is done, shall be amerced: and if any man be wounded, and in peril of death, the party that so wounded shall be arrested, and put in surety till perfect knowledge be had whether the person so hurt should live or die." But those excellent institutions, with that of the coroner's duty upon such an occasion, had fallen into such disuse, that murder was every day committed with impunity; for whilst the protection that great men gave to their retainers existed, it was dangerous or impossible for the officers of justice to attach the person of any malefactor. Thus the course of civil justice was obstructed, and the hopes of impunity made all who had ambition, revenge, or any other passion to gratify against their neighbours, to enlist them as retainers, or dependents of great men. Henry therefore revived, reinforced, and renewed the old laws against murderers and felons, as the most proper way for bringing them to the punishment of the law, and withdrawing them from the protection of the great.

The parliament also passed an act, by which it was ordered "that the coroner, upon the view of a dead body, should, according to the former acts, enquire of him or them that had done that deed or murder; of their abettors and consentors, and who were present when that death or murder was done, whether man or woman, and the names of them that were present; and so bound to enrol and certify." But this was not enough for rooting out this pernicious practice of murder: it appears by the common law, a felony could not determine at the king's suits within a year and a day after a death or murder, for saving of the party-suit. That the first edge of resentment being taken off in the prosecutor, his eagerness was abated, his prosecution was often times a seeking revenge in cold blood, and few were found who prosecuted with the same earnestness twelve months after the crime had been committed, that they would have done immediately after such commission: we may add to these reasons, which are expressed in the act of parliament, another not there expressed, which is, that such a delay gave the great men, who were perhaps at the bottom of those murders, an opportunity of interposing and making matters up, to the infinite prejudice of the public justice; but it was now enacted, that "if any man be slain or murdered; and therefore the slayers, murderers, or abettors, manslaughterers, and comforters of the same be indicted; that the same slayers and murderers, and all other accessaries to the same, be arraigned and determined of the same felony and murder, at any time, at the king's suit, within the year after the same felony and murder done, and not tarry the year and a day for any appeal to be taken for the same felony or murder. And if it happened that any person named as principal or accessary to be acquitted of any such murder, at the king's suit within the year and a day, that then the same justices aforesaid, by whom he is acquitted, shall not suffer him to go at large, but either remit him again to prison, or else to let him to bail, after their discretion, till that year and a day be passed. And if it fortune that the same felons or murderers, and accessaries, so arraigned, or any of them, to be acquit, or the principal of the said felony, or any of them, to be attained, the wife, or next heir, to him that is slain, as shall require, may take and have their appeal of the same death and murder, within the year and day after the said felony or murder done, against the said person so arraigned, and acquit, and all other their accessaries against the said principals so attained, if they be alive, and the benefit of his clergy thereof before not had: and that the appellant have such aid like advantage as if the said acquittance or attainder had not been the said acquittal or attainder notwithstanding."

A kind of civil rapes upon women of property were none of the least frequent consequences of the power of the great men; and it was a common way of rewarding their followers by assisting or protecting them in such violences: it was therefore to put a stop to so enormous an abuse that this same parliament made an act, "That whatever person or persons from henceforth that taketh any woman against her will unlawfully, that is to say, maid, widow, or wife, that such taking, procuring, and abetting the same, and also receiving willingly the same woman so taken against her will, and knowing the same, shall be felony."

We find another act of the same parliament, according to the act of Richard III. concerning the power which justices had in admitting prisoners, committed for felony to bail. By this act, the justices of peace who took bail, were obliged to certify the same at the next general sessions of peace or next goal-delivery of the county, city, or town; and the sheriff was to certify the names of all the prisoners in his custody, to the justices of goal-delivery. Thus the act of Richard III. giving authority and power in the premisses to any justice by himself, was repealed.

The other remarkable statutes enacted at this time, were the following.

"I. That if any of the king's servants, under the degree of a lord, did conspire the death of the king, or any of the king's council, or lord of the realm, as the lord-steward, treasurer, or comptroller, it should be felony." This law was thought to be procured by the chancellor, Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, who, being unamiable in his private manners and extremely obnoxious to almost all the great men of Henry's court, provided this act for his own safety.

"II. An Act for making void all deeds of gift made to defraud creditors.

"III. An act awarding costs to the plaintiff, where the defendant sueth a writ of error before execution had*."

The parliament which met in the beginning of the year 1490, the sixth of Henry's reign, passed an act which shews the consistency and firmness of Henry's policy at home. It was founded upon a statute made under Edward I. by which it was ordained, "That notes and fines to be levied in the king's court before his justices, should be openly and solemnly read; and that both pleas in the mean time should cease; and this to be done two days in the week, after the discretion of the justices." But the statute now enacted says, "That fines ought to be a final end and conclusion." The contrary practice had some time before prevailed, to the great trouble of the English subjects; it was therefore enacted, "That, after the engrossing of every fine to be levied, after the feast of Easter that shall be in the year of our Lord 1490, in the king's court, before his justices of the Common Pleas, of any lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, the same fine be openly and solemnly read and proclaimed in the said court, the same term, and in three terms the next following the same engrossing in the same court, at four several days in every term; and in the same time that it is so read and proclaimed, all pleas to cease:" some exceptions of minors, married women, and such others, are inserted in the statute. Thus Henry in some respect gave his subjects the same right to their estates that he had to his crown, thereby engrafting upon the English constitution, and even tenor of government, and restoring the peaceable possession of estates. This admirable law prevented and shut the door upon that dreadful litigiousness which civil commotion introduced, and which the success of the one or the other party which the claimant favoured, always revived and encouraged.

During the session of the same parliament we meet with a proclamation, which, by act of parliament, every justice of peace was to take care should be proclaimed four times yearly in four principal sessions within the county where he acted. This proclamation complains bitterly of the remissness of justices of the peace in doing their duty; it takes notice, that by their remissness riots, murder, and other enormities were occasioned, to the great prejudice of agriculture, the great stay and support of the land, the upholder of the English church, and the fund for the payment of the landlords rent: it is therefore decreed, "That if any person shall be baulked in his suit, or aggrieved, that they may have an appeal to the next neighbouring justice, from him to the justices of assize; and if he find no remedy there, to the king himself or his chancellor. In this case the justice is to be struck out of the commission, and further punished according to his demerits."

The other remarkable statutes enacted in this parliament were,

"I. That benefit of clergy shall be allowed but once; and that persons convicted of murder, shall be marked with an M upon the brawn of the left thumb, and other felons with a T.

"II. That no butcher kill any manner of beast within the walls of London, on pain of forfeiting for every ox twelve pence, and for a cow and every other beast eight pence; this to extend to every city, borough, and walled town within the realm of England, Berwick and Carlisle excepted." There were some other laws then made, which are either repealed or of small consequence.

In the eighth year of his reign an act passed, by which the barons and gentlemen of landed interest were at liberty to sell and mortgage their lands, without fines or licences for the alienation; and that likewise they should have their own liveries, and authority to dispose of the wardships of their heirs: but this act was confined only to those who should enter into the army; and nothing could be better calculated than it was, not only for the purposes already mentioned, but for Henry's great and favourite scheme in breaking the tenures and dependencies upon the landed interest. For luxury and vanity were become as it were necessary to the English for the enjoyment of life. Those vices had been begun, continued, and encouraged by Edward IV. the short reign of Richard III. could not, but Henry (though he did not practise them in his own person) did encourage them at his court. The great debts the nobility had contracted, rather encreased than weakened the dependency, as long as it was out of their power, without the king's licence, and without paying exorbitant fines, to dispose of their lands for discharging them. This act in some measure took off this check. The prodigal, the brave, and the adventurous rushed precipitately into extravagance; some through motives of luxury, and others of ambition; whilst the industrious commons made every day fresh acquisitions of the landed interest, and thereby threw an additional weight into the scale, which Henry wanted to support and help to preponderate. Some other military acts passed in the same parliament, particularly a kind of mutiny bill; for every captain whose musters were not complete, or who defrauded his soldiers of their legal pay, was to forfeit all his goods and chattels to the king, and his body to the prison. By another clause of the same act, all deserters were adjudged to be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy: the captain was likewise, if in the land service, to make a return of all soldiers who should die or desert, within ten days after such deaths or desertions, to the paymaster of the forces; or if in the marine service, to the admiral of the navy. By another act of this session, every officer and soldier of the army serving beyond sea, or on the sea, was protected; and he had power by his writing to make his attorney enter upon lands descended unto him.

The parliament which met towards the end of the year 1495, after a long prolongation, enacted a law which is well deserving the attention of every English reader. This act was founded upon a reflection of the dreadful situation in which the people of England must have found themselves had Henry himself not succeeded, and had Richard been victorious. The act itself was built upon a maxim so simple and plain, that it could not be mistaken or misrepresented by the meanest or most ignorant of his subjects: it was, "that the possession of the throne points out the king." This was the principle upon which the parliament made the following law: "That none who shall attend upon the king for the time being, no matter whether he was so in fact or in right, or in both, doing true service, should be attainted or forfeit any thing." And to this act it was added, "That if any act or acts, or other process of law, hereafter made thereupon for the same, happen to be made contrary to this ordinance, that then that act or acts, or other process of the law whatsoever they shall be, stand and be utterly void; provided always, that no person or persons shall take any benefit or advantage, who shall hereafter decline from their said allegiance."

To explain the true meaning and occasion of this act, it is proper to consider the circumstances of things and the situation of the kingdom at the time it passed. The feudal law and customs, agreeable to which all tenures of knight's service were regulated, prevailed in England at that time; and the great lords, who held their lands immediately of the crown, on the condition of serving the king in his wars, and other services, granted out parcels of those lands to under-vassals, holding of themselves under the like obligations and service; these vassals were bound to follow the mesne-lord, or (as he is termed in statute 12 Henry VII. cap. 7.) their immediate sovereign, in his hostings (or arrays); and if they neglected to attend him in the field, even when he fought against the crown, they forfeited their tenures, and their lands were confiscated to the use of their immediate lord. Hence arose the great power of the ancient barons, who, in the days of Henry III. and in latter reigns, were able to make head against the crown in the field, having, in proportion to their estates, a powerful body of vassals, obliged, by their tenures on pain of forfeiture, to follow them in their risings, and farther engaged so to do by the sacred tie of their oaths of fealty taken in their lords courts. It had always been Henry's view, from the beginning of his reign, to depress the power of the great lords; but as there was danger in attempting it too openly, he chose to do it in the way of sap, by means the true design whereof was scarce perceivable; as by allowing them freely to alienate their estates; and by this act justifying all persons (and their vassals among the rest) that should serve him in his wars, and securing them absolutely from all forfeitures on that account, whatever conduct their immediate lords observed. This lessening the dependence of vassals upon those lords, seems to have been calculated for the same purposes, as some late acts for diminishing or taking away the vassalage of the Highland clans in Scotland to their superiors; but if it was one part of Henry's view in this, it was not the only end he proposed to answer.

For though Henry thought that the above act was a sufficient security for his subjects to stand by him, yet he wanted a farther security for himself: for though it is declared in general terms, that the possession of the crown implies allegiance, yet there is no specification of the cases that require this allegiance to call the subjects into the field, neither is there any penalty upon a man who does not attend. But Henry made a distinction among his subjects, between those who owed him allegiance, and those who with allegiance owed him service, which last rank included all place-men, that is, such persons who had from the crown promotions or advancement, as grants and gifts of office, fees, and annuities. It was therefore enacted, "That if such do not attend the king, when he shall fortune to go in the wars in his person, in their said persons, as their duty bindeth them, that then they, and every of them, making thereof default (the king's special licence not had, or else he have such unfeigned sickness, letting, or disease that he may not in person come to do his personal attendance and service, after the form aforesaid, and that duly proved), that then every such person or persons forfeit and lose their said offices and annuities, and to stand void at the king's pleasure, any act, statute, or ordinance to the contrary, before this time had or made, in anywise notwithstanding. Provided that this act extend not to any spiritual peers, or master of the Rolls, nor to any other officer and clerks of the Chancery, justices of either bench, barons of the king's Exchequer, and other officers and clerks of the said places, the king's attorney and solicitor, and the serjeants of the law." But notwithstanding both those acts, it is certain that Henry thereby took from his subjects that determined zeal with which they had hitherto fought, since their safety no longer depended upon their swords, but was insured by an act of parliament.

In this parliament it was ordained, "That a weight and a measure of each kind in use, according to the standard of the Exchequer, should be sent unto every city and borough, and that no commodity should be bought or sold but with such weights as were stamped or sealed."

There was likewise a standard weight and measure consigned into the hands of the representatives of eight-and-twenty cities, towns, and corporations, there to remain, and to be appealed unto upon occasion. This parliament was likewise distinguished by a strain of public spirit which has since been of vast use to England; for it prohibited the exportation of any horse, without a licence from the king, and of any mare which was not three years old, and above the value of six shillings and eight pence, which the government was obliged to pay to the owner in case of being seized. The parliament afterwards, in this session, passed an act "That no alienation by the wife of the inheritance of her deceased husband, should be valid; but that a woman may alienate her lands for the term of her life." This parliament likewise enacted, "That an attaint should be attainable against a petty jury upon a false verdict between party and party; but with this exception, that the act should not extend to capital causes; for there the verdict of the jury was to be final and irremediable, except by the king's prerogative, if the party was cast." Lord Bacon upon this observes, that such cases were, for the most part, at the king's suit; and that if they are followed in course of indictment, there are properly two juries, one to find the bill and the other to try the prisoner: add to this, that matters of life and death where a jury is liable to any penalty for acquitting a prisoner, it might occasion a perpetual warping towards severity, and would discourage the subjects from the office. Another case, wherein this law did not take place, is where the sum tried did not exceed forty pounds; because such sums could not bear the charges of farther trial. To this parliament was likewise owing the act of admitting poor suitors, in forma pauperis, to sue in courts without paying fees for any writs they should have out of Chancery, and having counsel and attorneys assigned to them without paying for the same.

On the sixteenth of January, 1504, a parliament was held at Westminster, in which Dudley, one of the detested instruments of Henry's mercenary oppressions, was chosen speaker of the house of commons. The principal business of this session was to give a farther blow to the power of liveries and retainers. A greater penalty was now enacted for giving or taking any livery, or for retaining or being retained with another, during the king's life. "Hereupon (says an excellent author), is a strange power given to summon upon a mere suspicion; to proceed, without information, to examine the defendant upon oath, and to make him his own accuser; to punish according to discretion, by fine and imprisonment: and thus the king and his council have gotten a power, under colour of liveries and retainers, to bring the whole kingdom to be of their livery; or else they can suspect whom they please, apprehend whom they suspect, put him presently to the rack of confession, and so into prison till he hath satisfied both displeasure and jealousy, and even covetousness itself. Never was England before now in so low a degree of thralldom, bound under a double knot of self-accusing and arbitrary censure."

In the same parliament it was enacted, "That all persons having gifts or patents, should forfeit the same if they did not attend the king, upon lawful summons, whenever he took the field in person, either at home or abroad, for the safety of his crown and defence of his kingdom." This act was supplemental to the act formerly made, by which the like penalty was imposed upon those who held places, and did not give the like attendance; but neither of those acts have any retrospect.

By the same act it is provided, "That all persons repairing to the king's standard, upon summons, shall receive pay according to their degree; nor does that act extend to clergymen or lawyers, nor to any who held mortgages from the crown.

Great abuses had been committed with regard to the coinage; and among others complained of, was the practice of bringing Irish coin into England, and of clipping and counterfeiting the English coin, especially silver. It was therefore enacted, "That no clipped or diminished money should be current in payment, but that the same might be brought to the king's mint, there to be changed for new coined groats and two-pences." Our historians say, that this act brought vast sums into Henry's coffers.

A statute was likewise made against importing certain manufactures of silk, such as ribbons, laces, girdles, and points, the same being now manufactured in England; but encouraging the importation of raw silk, as the materials for the said manufactures. This act does not extend to large pieces of silks, there being no such manufacture then in England. Lord Bacon observes, that it was founded upon a right principle in commerce, that where foreign materials are but superfluities, foreign manufactures should be prohibited; for that will either gain the manufacture, or banish the superfluity. The next act of importance in this session, was that concerning gaols: it had been a common practice, during the civil wars, for the great men to have places within their castles which they used in the nature of gaols, in which they imprisoned and ransomed at their own pleasure. But this practice was now abolished. It was enacted, "That the sheriff of each county should have the keeping of all gaols, except all gaols whereof any person or persons, spiritual or temporal, or body corporate, have the keeping, of estate or inheritance, or by succession; and all letters patent for the keeping of any gaols were resumed and void."

During this session, an act was made to regulate the making of statutes by incorporate bodies. It had, it seems, been a practice for masters and wardens of fellowships and corporations to make acts, which were not only inconsistent with the laws of the land, but held by them to be compulsive upon the subject, and thereby they very often restrained suits in the king's courts. It was therefore enacted, "That no master and wardens of fellowships should make any new ordinances without the consent of the chancellor, or the treasurer, or the chief-justices,

This was not the only act that bore hard upon small corporations in this parliament. An abuse had prevailed all over England, of extorting a tax called seawage, or schewage, upon all goods vended within a borough or other corporation. This tax had originally been imposed upon merchants aliens, but was now extended to natural born subjects. An act was therefore now made, abolishing this tax upon the natives throughout all England, excepting within the city of London.

The last act which we have occasion to take notice of, in this parliament, concerns vagabonds and unlawful games, and the suppressing common tippling ale-houses; abuses which are all linked together. Proper officers and persons were appointed for punishing, but not by imprisoning, all vagabonds in proportion as they repeated their offences. The playing at games was restricted to persons of certain quality and standing; and two justices of the peace had it in their power to suppress any notorious common tippling ale-house.

We shall close this sketch of the laws of Henry VII. with a few observations taken from the lord Bacon's character of that prince. "In that part both of justice and policy which is the durable part, and cut as it were in brass and marble, which is the making of good laws, he did excel. His laws he did much maintain and countenance, which nevertheless was no impediment to him in working his will; for it was so handled, that neither prerogative nor profit went to diminution, and yet, as he would sometimes strain up his laws to his prerogative, so would he also let down his prerogative to his parliament."

TAXES in the Reign HENRY VII.

In the first parliament of this king the taxes granted were as follow: 1. Tonnage, which was three shillings on every tun of wine of denizens, and six shillings of aliens. 2. Poundage, that is, one shilling in the pound for all merchandizes imported or exported, except tin, for which aliens were to pay two shillings. 3. The subsidy of wool and wool-fells, which was thirty-three shillings and four pence of denizens, and of aliens three pounds six shillings and eight pence for every sack of wool, and for every two hundred and forty wool-fells; and for every last of hides denizens were to pay three pounds six shillings and eight pence, and aliens three pounds thirteen shillings and four pence. The clergy at the same time granted the king a tenth.

In the fifth year of his reign, the commons voted him seventy-five thousand pounds, to make good his engagements with the dukes of Brittany; and for raising this sum they granted a tenth of the yearly value and profits of all honours, castles, manors, rents, lands, fees, annuities, offices, and pensions, to whomsoever belonging (except lords of parliament, who likewise granted a tenth of all their lands, fees, offices, and pensions); and laid a tax upon personal estates, at the rate of twenty pence for every ten marks of goods, and upwards in proportion: but this producing only twenty-seven thousand pounds, the commons, to make up the deficiency, gave the king a fifteenth, with a request that he would accept thereof, and remit the residue of the seventy-five thousand pounds voted for the supply. This Henry consented to; and the commons were so pleased with his compliance, that the next year they granted him another fifteenth of their goods and chattels.

In the year 1492, the eighth of his reign, having publicly declared his intention of heading his army in person against France, under pretence that the supplies were not sufficient for the service, he sent, of his own authority, commissioners into every county, to extort money from the subject by way of Benevolence, a practice first set on foot by king Edward IV. but which Richard III. had got abolished by act of parliament. Archbishop Morton, the chancellor, is said to have been the adviser of this illegal taxation; and the lord Bacon relates, that he at the same time made use of this dilemma in his instructions to the commissioners (which was commonly called Morton's Fork or Crutch), "That if they met with any who were sparing, they should tell them they must needs have, because they laid up; and if they were spenders, they must needs have, because it was visible in their manner of living; declaring that the largeness or smallness of the sums they gave, would serve the king for an infallible rule to distinguish who were his friends, and who were disaffected to his government*." By these arts immense sums were raised all over the kingdom; and near ten thousand pounds from the city of London alone. Henry's avarice being not yet satisfied, he obtained from the parliament, that met towards the latter end of this year, a grant of two fifteenths of personal estates.

The next extraordinary tax we meet with under this reign (for there were many petty ones intervening) was in his twelfth year, when the two houses, upon a heavy complaint of the Scots breach of the seven years truce, and late invasion of the realm, voted a supply of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds (a greater sum than had ever been granted on such an occasion) for the war with Scotland. The way of raising it, was by a grant of two fifteenths, and by a subsidy, as well on all cities, boroughs, and towns not chargeable to those fifteenths, who were to be assessed to the amount of both, as on all freeholders and copyholders having twenty shillings a year, and others that were worth ten marks in goods. The colleges of Oxford, Cambridge, and Eton were exempted from this taxation; which was not to be levied if the king, or his lieutenant, did not march with an army, or if a peace or truce was made, in which cases the levies were to be suspended. This enormous imposition, and the unmerciful manner of collecting it, raised a dangerous insurrection among the inhabitants of the West, as we have already shewn in the history of this king's reign.

In January, 1504, the nineteenth of his reign, he called a parliament, in order to procure an equivalent for two ancient aids due to the crown, on account of the knighting the king's eldest son, and the marriage of his eldest daughter; (the dignity of knighthood he had conferred on his elder son Arthur, lately deceased; and had bestowed his daughter Margaret on James IV. of Scotland.) The commons, meanly obsequious to his will, desired him to accept forty thousand pounds in lieu of those aids; but Henry, amazed at the largeness of the sum, out of his abundant grace, and to gain the love of his subjects, remitted ten thousand pounds of the money, that the poor might not be charged with it; and the rest was levied upon all cities, boroughs, and towns (those not used to pay it, included) and on all persons who had either a real estate of twenty shillings a year, or a personal one of ten marks, throughout the kingdom. The lands and tenements of the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge were exempted from this tax, which was levied by an assessment of specific sums upon each county, the whole amounting to thirty-one thousand two hundred and forty-eight pounds and nine pence; out of which, two hundred and forty-one pounds six shillings was to be deducted for the fees and wages of the collectors.

Thus did this prince, through the most insatiable thirst for money that ever disgraced a royal breast, oppress his subjects to fill his coffers. Henry had no view but to get money; and it was indifferent to him by what means: this made him unfeelingly traffick with the blood and treasure of his people, loading them with taxes, and seizing all opportunities of ruining them by excessive fines: all which were, towards the latter end of his reign collected by those execrable tools Empson and Dudley, who left no nerve of villany unstrained to drain the helpless victims of their master's avarice to the last drop. These two instruments of Henry's being lawyers in science, and privy counsellors in authority, "turned (to use lord Bacon's words, and better I cannot use) law and justice into wormwood and rapine." They, who introduced arbitrary and unusual methods of informations and proceedings, and revived every penal law, wherein they spared none, great or small, nor considered whether the law was possible or impossible, in use or obsolete; and, after suffering the accused parties to languish long in prison, without admitting them to traverse the charges according to law, they, by various artificial terrors and devices, extorted from them great fines and ransoms, which they termed compositions and mitigations." Nothing can be more melancholy than the representation which this noble author gives of the miseries of the people for fourteen years together, that these prosecutions were carried on; but neither their cries nor their sufferings caused any relenting in Henry's heart; avarice, at once the meanest and the worst of crimes, stifled in him every other sentiment: he basked in the spoils of the ruined, and stuck at nothing to amass an immense treasure, which he was at length obliged to leave behind him, to be squandered away by his son and successor.

State of ARTS, SCIENCES, and COMMERCE, in the XVth Century.

IF we are to believe many writers, and particularly archbishop Nicholson, in his English Historical Library, and baron Holberg, in his Introduction to Universal History, this century was one of the most rude and illiterate: "Learning (says the latter author) was looked upon as a sort of heresy." There were even bishops who did not so much as know their letters; and in some of their subscriptions to synodical acts the following words are to be found, viz. "As I cannot read myself, N. N. hath subscribed for me:" or, "As my lord bishop cannot write himself, at his request I have subscribed."

All which, with respect to the ignorance of many, or even of most, of the clergy, may very probably be true; nevertheless, there are many visible traces to be discovered of the increase of real knowledge within the compass of this century; and in particular the noble art of Printing, which was not only invented, but brought to perfection, much about the same time with the most useful invention of rag-paper. William Caxton, citizen and mercer of London, an ingenious man, being sent, in the year 1464, ambassador from Edward IV. to the duke of Burgundy, at great labour and expence learned the art of Printing, and introduced it into this kingdom about 1474: he set up a press at Westminster, and was greatly encouraged in the art by Margaret, duchess of Burgundy, king Edward's sister. The monasteries soon purchased the invention, and it was exercised at Oxford, Cambridge, St. Alban's, and other places. This noble art disseminated fresh seeds of knowledge, which were continually labouring for birth. The incomparable science of Algebra also began to be known in this country; a science which has proved extremely useful in some calculations relating to certain branches of commerce, and probably the foundation of the excellent method of merchants accounts by double-entry, commonly called Italian Book-keeping.

This century can moreover boast of sundry other improvements for regulating and rectifying coin, and of the interest of money, all which, though not so perfectly well understood as in more modern times, were however more so than in any former century.

Engraving on wood and metal was introduced into England in this century by the famous Albert Durer: Etching was also discovered very near as early. We need not add, that both of these necessarily produced rolling-press printing.

Geographical maps were first brought into England by Bartholomew Columbus, in the year 1489: and the study of this science began daily to gain ground, through the great encouragement given by Henry VII. to persons of an adventuring spirit.

Painting was in this century greatly improved, and the art of perspective and clair obscure began now to animate the canvas, and diffuse justness and propriety through all the works of the pencil.

Sculpture, which is a more limited art, and easier to be attained, was in this century likewise carried to some degree of perfection.

Music was as yet rude, nor was it thoroughly cultivated till after the sixteenth century; but even in the state it was at the period we now treat of, we have the strongest reason to imagine that it was very far superior to that of the Greeks, as they have left no monument of this art, by which we can gather that they sung in parts.

We find, in the Collection of Public Acts, an annuity or salary granted by Henry VII. to his poet laureat, Bernard Andreas (or Andrews) of ten marks yearly (or about six pounds modern money); a sad instance of the low esteem in which poetry was held in those times.

As to architecture, it was still in a very low state; the hand of industry had not yet changed our sorry wooden dwellings into sumptuous palaces; the thatched roofs and mud walls still remained in the streets of London; and the manner of living among the people in general, was coarse, hard, and indelicate. The greatest noblemen, when they went into the country, carried their ladies behind them on horseback; princesses themselves seldom travelled in any other manner, being covered only with a riding-cloak of waxed cloth in rainy weather. Indeed, on certain occasions, they made a momentary display or stretch of luxury; but this did in no wise imply that general magnificence, nor those useful conveniencies, which so far exceed the pomp of a single day. The magnificence of those times were only for days of public solemnity; whereas at present, the shews and entertainments which we see common every day, the number of gilt coaches, and the multitude of lamps which are lighted up during the night-time in the streets of all our great cities, exhibit far greater riches, plenty, and convenience, than the most brilliant ceremonies of the most mighty monarchs of the fifteenth or sixteenth centuries.

COMMERCE.

The general mercantile characteristic of this fifteenth century is, that almost every important incident in it contributes more or less to its being an introduction to the succeeding commerce and opulence of Europe, and very eminently so to those of the British empire, which, towards the conclusion of this century, by marriages and other concurring circumstances, visibly tended to a consolidation of all its formerly disjointed parts and interests into one united dominion, by the blessings of the Almighty, in succeeding times brought to maturity.

With particular regard to the improvement and increase of commerce, navigation, and manufactures, as well as of agriculture and fisheries, and even of some mercantile and mechanic arts, this century undoubtedly excels any preceding one; witness the building of larger ships, and the undertaking of remoter voyages, even prior to the actual discovery of either of the Indies; remote isles and strange coasts discovered and partly planted, till at length new worlds being discovered, before the final conclusion of this century, sundry new and unheard-of materials for commerce and manufactures were hereby brought among us.

It may, perhaps, be deemed no unacceptable piece of curiosity to see the under-named list of English manufactures and merchandize so early exported as the year 1428. It is a licence granted by Henry VI. to the king of Portugal's agent to export them custom-free, as being for the proper use of his Portuguese majesty and of the prince his son*, viz.

1. Six silver cups gilt.

2. The following woollen goods, viz. two pieces of scarlet; one piece of sanguine, dyed in grain; two pieces deblodis (we know not what); two pieces of Mustrevillers; two pieces of marble colour; two pieces of russet of Mustrevillers; two pieces of blanch cloth of Lynn; one piece of white cloth; three hundred pieces of Essex straits; two thousand vessels of amber, being dishes, plates, saucers, &c. (this is called "electrum" in the record, but could never be pure amber, as it must have been of an immense value, but was probably a mixture of brass, or tin, or pewter, a practice formerly used to give an amber-colour to vessels and other matters made of it); two beds with curtains, of the largest size; four beds, of a middling size, with red and green colours; four red and green pallet-beds; two green beds, with curtains; eight pieces of red cloth; four pieces of green; sixty rolls or bales of worsted, red, white, and green; twelve dozen of lances, and twenty-six saddle-horses.

And the same year king Henry VI. grants the like licence to the agent of the duchess of Gloucester and Hainault, of exporting the following merchandize duty free:

Thirty-four yards of grey Mustrevillers; thirteen yards of grey cloth; seven yards and half of moray, dyed in grain; ten yards and half of red, twenty-two yards of green, six yards of white, and twenty-four yards of grey cloth; two yards and half of Brunette; twelve yards of red flowered sattin (fatyn figerato); two entire white kerseys; three mantles of coney-fur; one and half timber of martin fur; certain casks of grain and meal; and twelve yards of white cloth.

To this account of some of our exported commodities, we shall add, as matter of equal entertainment to the curious reader, the following account of the materials of commerce brought from almost every part of Europe into this country, France only excepted, with which nation England was at this time (viz. about the year 1430) engaged in an unfortunate war. It is taken from a poem in Hackluyt's first vol. p. 187, 188, &c. entitled the Process of English Policy, and is not only curious on account of its exhibiting a brief state of the then productions and manufactures of the different countries of Europe, whereby we may behold the wonderful alterations that have taken place almost every where in those respects within the space of about three hundred years, but it affords us also the satisfaction to know, that even so early as this time, the great political maxim, never too often to be inculcated, "That without our being always superior to any nation on the seas, not only our trade, but even our very existence as a free and independent nation, must be lost," was well understood; though in some other points the government seemed not sufficiently to have known their true commercial interests†.

This account is in substance as follows:

"I. From Spain came wines, figs, raisins, dates, liquorice, oil, grain (probably for dyers), soap, wax, iron, wool, wadmot, kid-skins, saffron, and quicksilver; all which (says our author) are transported to Bruges, (the then great emporium of Flanders,) by her haven of Sluys, where are so many fair and large ships: but then (says our poet) they must all pass between Dover and Calais.

"II. From Flanders the Spanish ships lade homewards fine cloth of Ypres and of Courtray, of all colours, much fustian, and also linen cloth. Thus (says he), if we be master at sea, both Spain and Flanders, who depend so much mutually on each other, must necessarily keep measures with us. And if England should think fit to deny to Flanders her wool and tin, and should also prevent the Spanish wool (which they work up with English wool) from getting to Flanders, the last named small country would be soon starved.

"III. Portugal is our friend, it sends much merchandize into England, and our people resort thither for trade. They have wines, oils, wax, grain, figs, raisins, dates, honey, Cordovan leather, hides, &c. all which are carried in great quantity to Flanders (which our author here justly terms the then staple of all Christendom); and as Portugal is counted changeable, they are in our power whilst we are masters of the Narrow Seas.

"IV. Brittany supplies Flanders with salt, wines, linen, and canvas. The Bretons, especially those of St. Maloe's (whom their dukes, who were generally friends to England, could seldom keep under due subjection), having been great sea-robbers, and often done much hurt on our coasts, landing, killing, and burning, &c. to our shame: whereas, would we keep well the Narrow Seas, they durst not be our foes.

"V. Scotland's commodities are wool, wooll-fells, and hides; their wool is sent to Flanders to be draped, though not so good as the English wool with which it is there worked up. The Scots must pass by the English coast in their way to Flanders; and therefore may be easily intercepted. Scotland brings from Flanders small mercery, (which in those times meant many kinds of small wares, &c.) and haberdashery wares in great quantities. Moreover, one half of the Scottish ships are generally laden home from Flanders with cart-wheels and wheel-barrows.

"VI. The Easterlings, Prussia, and Germany, send beer and bacon into Flanders, osmond, copper, bow-staves, steel, wax, peltry, pitch and tar, oak-boards, Cologne-thread, wool-cards, fustians, canvas and buckram. And they bring back from Flanders, silver plate and wedges of silver (which come to Flanders in great plenty from Bohemia and Hungary); also woollen cloth of all colours. They also (says our author) venture greatly unto the bay (of Biscay) for salt, so necessary for them. All which, &c. they could not do, without our permission, if we kept the Narrow Seas."

"VII. Genoa resorts to England in her huge ships named carracks, bringing many commodities, as cloth of gold, silk, paper, much woad, wool (of Spain probably), oil, cotton, roch-alum, and gold coin; and they bring back from us wool, and woollen cloth made with our own wool. They also often go from England to Flanders, where their chief staple is: so that the Genoese we have likewise in our power."

"VIII. The Venetians and Florentines, in their great gallies, bring all sort of spices and grocery wares, sweet wines, and a great variety of small wares and trifles, drugs, sugar, &c. and from us they carry home wool, cloth, tin, and our gold coins. They also deal much in usury both in England and Flanders. — (This shews the ballance in those times was against us with the Italian republics.)

"IX. To the Brabant marts (which we call fairs), we send English cloth, and bring back mercery, haberdashery, and grocery.

"To those marts repair the English, French, Catalans, Lombards, Genoese, Scots, Spaniards, and the Irish who live there, and deal in great quantities of hides, &c." But he adds (as he says on good authority) "The English buy more goods at those marts than all other nations do all together: wherefore (says he) let us keep the sea well, and they must be our friends." And here he laments the neglect of our shipping for the guard of the sea.

"X. Brabant, Holland, and Zealand, afforded little merchandize properly of their own, but madder and woad for dyers, garlic, onions, and salt-fish; for the other rich merchandize which the English buy at the said marts come in carts over-land from Burgundy, Cologne, &c.

"XI. Ireland's commodities are hides and fish, (as salmon, herrings, and hake), wool, linen cloth and skins of wild beasts." (Here we may remark the antiquity of a linen manufacture in Ireland.)

"To keep Ireland in obedience to us is of great importance, and cannot be done without our being masters at sea. And the like may be said, as to Calais."

By an act of parliament passed anno 1463, in the third year of Edward IV. cap. iv. we find the following list of foreign manufactures prohibited to be imported into England: woollen caps, woollen cloths, laces, corsets, ribbons, fringes of silk and of thread, laces of thread, silk, twined silk in any wise, embroidered laces of gold and of silk, gold saddles, stirrups, or any harness pertaining to saddles, spurs, bosses for bridles, hand-irons, grid-irons, locks, hammers, pincers, fire-tongs, dripping-pans, dice, tennis balls, points, purses, globes, girdles, harness for girdles of iron, latten, steel, tin, or alkemine, any thing wrought of any tawed leather, furs, buskins, shoes, galoches, or corks, knives, daggers, wood-knives, bodkins, sheers for taylors, scissars, razors, chessmen, playing-cards, combs, pattens, pack-needles, painted ware, forcers, caskets, rings of copper or of latten gilt, chafing-dishes, hanging-candlesticks, chafing-balls, sacring-bells, rings for curtains, ladles, scummers, counterfeit basons, ewers, hats, brushes, wool-cards, black iron-thread commonly called and named white wire, upon forfeiture of the same; one moiety to the king, the other to the informer. Irish manufactures are, however, excepted; as also such as should be taken by sea or by wreck. Magistrates of cities and towns are hereby authorized to search for defective and unlawful wares, which shall be forfeited; excepting, however, the liberty of the dean of the free chapel of St. Martin's le Grand, in London, and its precincts. The above catalogue of merchandize may shew what manufactures were at that time brought to any perfection in England."

The fishing trade of England, for exportation, must have been considerable at this period, for in the twenty-second year of king Edward IV. anno 1482, we find no fewer than four statutes for the well packing, in casks, salmon, herrings, eels, &c. and other barrelled fish. These are some of the earliest statutes for packing fish; yet there are sundry dry older laws for the preservation of the fry of salmon and lampreys in the rivers Thames and Medway; but these are only for home consumption.

By an act of parliament of the first year of Richard III. we find the quality and dimensions of all kinds of English woollen cloths regulated in the following manner.

"1. That no broad-cloth be put to sale, or exported, till it be fully watered.

"2. The dimensions of all kinds of cloths were directed to be as follow, viz.

"3. Broad-cloths shall be at length twenty-four yards (and to every yard an inch); breadth, eight quarters within the lifts.

"4. Half-cloths, twelve yards long, and not to exceed sixteen yards; and breadth as above.

"5. Straits, two yards long; and breadth, one yard within the lifts.

"6. Kerseys eighteen yards long; and breadth, one yard and a nail within the lifts.

"7. No setting, drawing, or tentering, of those cloths, after watering.

"8. None shall set, cast, or put on said cloths, flocks or other deceitful thing.

"9. Nor any chalk on white cloths.

"10. Nor sheerman sheer or cancel any cloths till fully watered.

"11. Tenters shall not be kept within doors, but alone in open places.

"12. No cloth shall be dyed with cork or orchel.

"13. The cloth and lifts shall be dyed of one colour.

"Excepting out of this act cloth of bay, and also cloths made in Winton and Sarum, usually joined with bay; and also plonkets, jackens, celestines, packery-whites, vesses, cogware, worsteds, florences, bastards, kendals, sayling ware, with cremil lifts and frise ware, so as in other respects they be fair and legally made*."

In the last year of the said king Richard III. we have a commission of his, appointing the first consul for English merchants in foreign parts, together with the salary allotted him, in the following words:

"We, understanding that the city of Pisa is a very proper place for the residence of our merchants, and being assured of the fidelity and probity of Laurentio Strozzi, a merchant of Florence, have and do, at the request of our merchants already frequenting Pisa, and of such as are to resort thither, appoint him to be Consul and President of all our merchants at Pisa and parts adjacent; allowing him for his trouble herein the fourth part of one per cent. on all goods of Englishmen imported to, or exported from thence†."

Henry VII. made it the chief glory of his reign to raise, cherish, and support the industrious commons, who, ceasing to live in an abject, despicable dependence on the great, sought to avail themselves of the rising arts and flowing commerce which England began at this time to enjoy. The support of agriculture was one of the measures which this great prince had chiefly at heart, because it encouraged the yeomanry, the strength and nerves of the English state, and its great barrier against the encroachments of the barons. He perceived evidently, that the power of the latter, troublesome to the peace of the land, grew weak in proportion as the villains, who by their industry could make themselves free men, grew strong, which always happened according as commerce and agriculture prevailed: but the late civil wars had in some respects ruined agriculture almost to the depopulation of the state, and an infinite quantity of arable lands were now turned into pasture.

But this vast use of pasturage had one great advantage in it, which was the encouragement of inclosures; for it does not appear that it was then much the practice to inclose arable ground. The great art therefore was to encourage those inclosures without discouraging the practice to inclose arable land, and thus to prevent depopulating pasturages. This was done by an ordinance passed in the parliament of 1490, enacting "That all houses of husbandry that were used and occupied with twenty acres of ground, and upwards, should be manured and kept up for ever, together with a competent proportion of land to be used and occupied with it." This act, as lord Bacon justly observes, in a manner forced the occupiers of such houses as are described in the same, to raise themselves above the degree of cottagers or villains, and to become men of property and substance: it had, likewise, a farther tendency, that it raised a seminary for infantry, or foot-soldiers, and therefore prevented England from being obliged, like France and Italy, to hire infantry from other nations.

But perhaps Henry did not in any respect shew a more masterly stroke of policy, than he did in an act passed in this parliament, for the encouraging national power at the expence of national luxury. The Venetians, the Genoese, the Spaniards, and the Portuguese, not forgetting the Bretons, had, for some ages, been the carriers of all Europe by sea; the English had, indeed, cultivated navigation and commerce, but upon principles more convenient than stable; for they had in a manner naturalized all England to foreigners who should resort thereunto; and when foreigners settled here, bringing with them the spirit of commerce and industry, and their sons becoming Englishmen, it was perhaps, right policy; but the vast alteration now introduced in the system of power and property, all over Europe, joined to the dreadful effects which the civil wars in England had been attended with, prevented foreigners from settling in the kingdom, though not from resorting to it: the money therefore given as freight for imported commodities, was so much loss to the nation without any retribution, but the increase of luxury. But Henry formed a noble plan of making a public emolument from private luxury; an act therefore passed, "That no Gascoign or Guyon wine, or Thoulouse wood, should be brought into this realm but by English ships, and English masters and mariners; nor any person shall freight in a stranger's ship, to be brought into this realm, or carried forth, if he may have sufficient freight in the same port in a denizen's ship."

The benefit of commerce thus provided for, manufactures came next under consideration. In this Henry's chief care was to encourage the woollen, that staple commodity of this kingdom. The first step towards this was to repress the extravagant prices into which the great persons, and, by their example, the lower sort, had run for cloaths, in which curiosity supplied the place of use, and which tended more to the encouragement of luxury, than the consumption of manufacture; an act therefore was passed, imposing a penalty of forty shillings upon any person who shall sell by retale a broad yard of the finest scarlet in grain for above sixteen shillings; or other grained cloth of the finest makings for above eleven shillings. A like act passed with regard to hatters and cappers, by which, under the same forfeiture, the price of the best hat was fixed at twenty pence; and that of the best cap at two shillings and eight pence.

Henry VII. also made it his business to take advantage of the jarring interests which prevailed on the continent, for improving the trade and commerce of his own kingdom: with this view he granted safe-conducts to all merchants, in particular those of France, to come and trade with England, and to buy up her woollen goods, tin, lead, and her other native commodities, by paying the accustomed duties to the crown.

In a treaty he made with Philip archduke of Austria, governor of the Low Countries, towards the latter end of his reign, we meet with the following remarkable articles.

"It is agreed, that the fishers belonging to either prince may securely any where sail the sea, and fish without any impediment, licence, or safe-conduct." It is likewise provided, "That the trading subjects of neither prince shall import into the harbours or dominions of either, any commodities or merchandize belonging to the enemy of that prince." And in the following article it is provided "That, in case of a shipwreck, if any person or any animal, a cat, or a dog, or a cock, should remain alive on board a shipwrecked vessel upon the coasts of either party, in that case the cargo belonging to the subjects of either shall not be deemed confiscated, but remain safe for a year and a day, till a proper claimant shall appear."

But that which distinguished this century above all other transactions in the commercial way, was the attempt made by Christopher Columbus to discover a new world. This fortunate adventurer was the son of a mechanic of Genoa, a wool-comber as is said; he had observed the improvements which the Portuguese had made in their discoveries towards the East Indies, and he had been projecting some discoveries towards the West. Having digested his conjectures and reasons why this was feasible, he laid them before his natural sovereign, the state of Genoa. Being rejected there, he applied to the king of Portugal, whose ministers, as he discovered, wanted to cheat him. He then went into Spain, from whence he dispatched his brother Bartholomew, a man of the same turn of genius with himself, into England, with a commission to lay his schemes before Henry. Bartholomew meeting with great misfortunes on his voyage, had such difficulties to be introduced to Henry, that his brother Christopher, despairing of success in England, applied to the court of Spain. In the mean while Bartholomew, having published a specimen of his genius in a Map of the World, which he projected, had admittance to Henry, who was not at all averse to commune with him, and actually entered into an agreement about employing his brother Christopher in the proposed discovery: But Henry's frugal caution, his desire to be fully informed, and to be himself master of the subject, and the affairs of state which employed his head, seem to have occasioned such a delay in the execution, that Christopher Columbus actually agreed with the court of Spain; and in August, set out upon those discoveries which he made, and which (whether for the happiness or detriment of mankind, we shall not determine) are now so greatly improved.

Henry, however, let few opportunities slip of encouraging the adventuring spirit of discovery, as the surest means of upholding that taste for commerce, which was to assure treasure to his subjects and himself. On the fifth of March, 1497, he granted a licence to John Cabot, a Venetian, and Ludovic, Sebastian, and Sancho, his sons, to sail with five ships, under English colours, for discovering new islands or countries. Henry seems, when he granted this licence, not to have been himself engaged in the expence of fitting out these ships, for there is no limitation either as to their burden or number of seamen who were to go on board. Fabian says, that Cabot promised to discover a very rich island; and we are told by other writers, that the king afterwards was an adventurer himself, by causing a ship to be fitted out at Bristol, to which the London merchants added three or four more; but this expedition did not take place till next year; and Cabot's scheme seems to have been to find out a north-west passage to the Indies, which he actually attempted, and, after making several valuable discoveries, he sailed down to Cape Florida, and returned richly laden to England, where he was knighted by Henry. It is observable that Henry, in the licence he gives for this expedition, provides that Cabot should, besides the ordinary customs and tolls, pay the crown a fifth of all his nett gains. Thus Cabot in effect was the first that discovered the continent of America; for neither Americus or Columbus knew any thing of it at this time.

Upon Cabot's return, and report of the discoveries he had made on the continent of America, from whence he brought with him three savages, Henry was more than ever prompted to improve these beginnings: he knighted Cabot as a reward for his labours and success, and invited several merchants and others to enter into engagements with the crown for peopling and cultivating, under the royal patent, the discoveries which had been or might be made.

At the same time he confirmed a treaty with the city of Riga, very advantageous to the English nation; for by this treaty the citizens of Riga were obliged to cancel a debt of ten thousand six hundred nobles, which was due to them from the crown of England, upon condition that Henry should restore them to the liberty of trading to his coasts. Henry likewise this year revived his treaties of commerce, upon very advantageous terms, with the subjects of the archduke.

Not long after the return of Cabot from his American expedition, letters patent were granted by Henry to James Elliot and Thomas Ashurst, two merchants of Bristol, and John Gonzales and Francisco Fernandez, two subjects of the crown of Portugal, to sail with as many ships, and of what burden they pleased, under English colours, for making new discoveries: but there is in this charter an express provision that they shall not enter upon any lands or territories possessed by the king of Portugal, or any of Henry's allies. It may be likewise proper to observe, that the contractors had power to punish all outrages committed by their crews and colonists, and particularly all rapes of women, inhabitants of the discovered countries. By another article, it is provided that no native of England shall, for forty years, presume to trade to any country discovered by the said undertakers, without the king's and their special leave: if, when the forty years are expired, any such trade should be carried on without the licence as aforesaid, the contraveners are to forfeit ship and cargo, one half to the king, and the other half to the proprietors. It is farther provided, that every master of a ship shall have liberty of importing from the said discovered countries four hogheads duty free; a quarter-master two, and a sailor one hoghead, for their own use.

In the year 1505, the twentieth of this king's reign, we find the first charter granted for incorporating and establishing "the merchants trading in woollen cloth of all kinds to the Netherlands, by the style of the Fellowship of Merchants Adventurers of England." By this charter they had authority given them to hold courts and marts at Calais, provided that they exacted no more than ten marks of any merchant whatever for his freedom in this fellowship for trading to Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zealand, &c. and also enjoining all merchants adventurers to come into the freedom of this fellowship.

We shall now close this article with an observation of the rate of living in these times, compared with that in our days. The Chronicon Pretiosum says, that hay was, in the year 1505, eight shillings per load, but that it had been usually five shillings per load; yet the year following it was at ten and twelve shillings per load. This seems nearly to correspond with the proportion of wheat, &c. in those days to the same in our own times, viz still nearly about one to five; for by the preceding plentiful seasons (says Stowe, sub anno 1499), wheat was so low as four shillings (i. e. six shillings of our money) per quarter; bay-salt about two shillings per quarter; and a tun of Gascon wine, two pounds: so that supposing, very probably, the mean or moderate price of wheat to be now eight shillings per quarter, or twelve shillings of modern money, this brings it to the proportion of three one-third to one in our days, forty shillings per quarter being (if every other necessary were as cheap) about the moderate price of wheat at our time.

The Accession of King HENRY VIII. to the Union of the Two Kingdoms of ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, under JAMES I.

P A R T IX.

A. D. 1509.

FEW princes have made a more considerable figure in history, than the monarch whose remarkable reign we are now entering upon: he ascended the throne with every advantage that nature and fortune could possibly give him. Amiable in his person and address, in the flower of youth, blessed with uncommon talents, and possessed of immense treasures, he saw himself, at eighteen years of age, at the head of a flourishing kingdom, where the arts and sciences wanted only a liberal benefactor to promote their progress; and the public tranquility being secured by an honourable peace and by powerful alliances, his people had already formed great expectations from his distinguished abilities, not doubting that he would so employ his great wealth as to make the pleasing arts of peace universally successful, and, by rewarding ingenuity and industry, free them from the cruel oppressions they had suffered in the preceding reign, to gratify the odious passion of avarice, one of the most detestable that can possess the mind of a great prince. In fact, they were not disappointed; for the young monarch was no sooner seated on the throne, than he shewed himself the reverse of his father, by a liberality of temper which bordered on profusion; but was fundamentally beneficial to his subjects, though, in particular instances, his generosity was misapplied.

His education, by order of his father, before the death of his brother Arthur, was certainly in a great measure ecclesiastic; from whence some have concluded, that the king intended, as Arthur was married, and there was no prospect of his succeeding to the crown, to have brought him up for the church: this circumstance is very immaterial, and not worthy the attention that has been paid it, much less the disputes it has occasioned; it is certain, however, that he very early imbibed a taste for polite learning, and for theology in particular, which he cultivated ever after with peculiar attention, bestowing the closest application, whenever he had leisure from public affairs, on this particular science: and whoever examines his conduct with candour, will find that to this turn of mind is to be ascribed all his public measures with respect to religion, and not to his quarrel with the pope concerning his divorce from Catherine of Arragon, which, after all the pains that has been taken to represent it as the first cause of his shaking off the papal yoke, will appear, to the impartial, no other than a favourable opportunity which the king readily embraced, to carry into execution a reformation which the history of former reigns had shewn him the necessity of, and which a prince of his political abilities could not read but with abhorrence, and an ardent desire to free his people from the cruel impositions of a foreign ecclesiastical tyrant. This being premised, we pursue the thread of our history.

After the interment of Henry VII. with uncommon funeral pomp, in the stately mausoleum he had erected in his life-time, in his own chapel in Westminster abbey, the first prudent action which did honour to the judgment of the young monarch, was his continuing his father's ministers and counsellors in their offices. The board was composed of the following persons, William Warham, archbishop of Canterbury and lord-chancellor of England; Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester, secretary and lord privy-seal; Thomas Howard, earl of Surry, lord-treasurer, son of the duke of Norfolk, slain in the battle of Bosworth-field, fighting for Richard III. George Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, lord-steward of the king's household; Thomas Ruthal, doctor of laws; sir Edward Poynings, knight of the Garter, comptroller, whose name is still famous for a statute of his in Ireland, in the former reign; sir Charles Somerset, lord Herbert of Gower, Chepstow, and Ragland, lord-chamberlain; sir Thomas Lovel, master of the wards and constable of the Tower; sir Henry Wyat; sir Henry Marney, afterwards lord Marney; sir Thomas Darcy, afterwards lord Darcy. These the lord Herbert, in his History of Henry VIII. tells us were selected out of those the late king had most trusted, by the countess of Richmond, grand-mother to the young monarch. But though Henry, as being little experienced in the ways of government, was pleased to make use at first of those who had been at the head of affairs in his father's life-time, yet it is to be observed, that when these grew over-bearing and insolent, presuming too much on the king's youth and inexperience in affairs of government, he soon convinced them that by continuing his father's servants he did not intend to make himself so many masters, and dismissed them with the same good policy that he at first continued them.

The late king, on his death-bed, had signed a general amnesty, but with some exceptions: this was published soon after his interment, but, to the great joy and satisfaction of the people, Dudley and Empson, the two grand instruments of oppression in the late reign were excluded, and a proclamation was issued, inviting the people to prefer complaints against them; so that in a short time there appeared sufficient evidence of their grievous extortions, and they were summoned to attend the privy-council, when Empson made a defence, wherein he threw the whole blame upon the late king, insisting that they had only obeyed his orders. Though this was true in fact, yet it was not considered, even in these early days of liberty, as any extenuation of their offence; but the letter of the law not expressly condemning them as felons for this species of extortion, the council were obliged to commit them to the Tower, and determine on a fresh accusation, which was that of a treasonable conspiracy against the new king, upon which they were tried and condemned, but without such sufficient evidence of their crime as the law, in such cases, requires: indeed, the whole foundation of a charge which was swelled into high-treason appears by the testimony of the best historians to have been this, "That, conscious of the popular odium they had incurred by their unjust proceedings, they had summoned their friends, when they found the late king was on the his death-bed, to consult them on the necessary measures to be taken to secure them from the public resentment." These measures were construed into a conspiracy to seize the person of the new king, and to take up arms in defence of themselves and their party. On the supposition of this absurd and improbable conspiracy they were condemned to die; but their execution was delayed till the following year, 1510, when the executors of the late king having discovered some very flagrant acts of oppression, made restitution to the injured parties; and these transactions being made public, the people were so incensed against them, that the king ordered their immediate execution.

The seizing of these wicked ministers, and the proceedings against them, fully engaged the attention of the common people; but the court had a more important question to canvas, which required the maturest deliberation, and the most able advice. This was no less than "Whether the king should consummate his marriage with Catherine of Arragon, to whom he was solemnly contracted?" But it must be observed, that the king, when prince of Wales, at the age of fourteen, had protested against any consent on his part to this contract, made for him by his father in his nonage; and this protestation was made in the presence of sufficient witnesses, but was kept a profound secret for many years after the period we are now considering: it is necessary to mention it here, because it appears probable that Henry VII. whose motive to this contract was avarice, had some scruples concerning the legality of the contract in point of proximity.

The council which decided this grand question consisted of the late king's ministers and counsellors, and amongst these was Fox, bishop of Winchester, a zealous prelate, violently bigotted to the papal authority: his opinion greatly contributed to determine the king and council in favour of Catherine; for when Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, urged that a man's marrying his brother's widow was contrary to the Levitical law, and that the pope's dispensation, though obtained, was invalid, as being insufficient to cancel a positive law of God; Fox, who regarded only the political convenience attending this match, opposed to this argument the unlimited authority of Christ's vicar, and told the king, that it ought to satisfy his conscience that the pope had granted the dispensation. To this idle sophistry he added some arguments founded in sound policy, and which shewed him an able statesman: he represented the danger of forcing Ferdinand into a league with France, and the two monarchs joining to resent the affront offered to the king of Arragon by sending back his daughter, after she had been so long affianced to Henry; and, what is very remarkable, which we shall have occasion to mention again, when we come to the proceedings for the divorce, the bishop, after enlarging on the amiable qualities of Catherine, assured the king, that there was no doubt of her being still a virgin, for that she had offered to submit to the usual decision of a jury of matrons, for the confirmation of this point. The archbishop of Canterbury, finding that the king and council inclined to the opinion of the bishop of Winchester, gave up the point respecting the validity of the dispensation, and the king soon after consummated this marriage, which afterwards engaged the attention of all the courts of Europe*.

* The council determined this weighty affair on the third of June, 1509; they were married the seventh, and crowned the twenty-fourth of the same month. On this occasion the king created sir Edward Howard standard-bearer of England.

As Henry was very young, newly married, and fond of pleasure, he gave little attention to the affairs of government; and the nation enjoying a profound peace, the internal policy of the state was well preserved by the vigilance and experience of the ancient ministers and of the council; while the king spent his whole time in such pleasures and amusements as were then in vogue; and to procure him these, no cost was spared. This the bishop of Winchester could not bear, without complaining to the earl of Surry, the lord high-treasurer, and expostulating with him on his great change of conduct; whereas in the late reign he was reckoned more parsimonious than the king himself, he now readily gave into his new master's extravagancies, and encouraged him in all his profusion. The prudent prelate finding his remonstrances ineffectual, that his murmurings gave disgust, and judging that his dismissal would soon follow, artfully contrived to preserve his interest at court, when his credit should be totally lost, and personal attendance withdrawn: for this purpose he introduced at court the famous Dr. Thomas Woolsey, as almoner to the king's household; a place which the bishop still had credit to procure him, especially as he could plead his former services; for having recommended him, in the late reign to sir Thomas Lovel, in the same capacity, he was by his means employed in negotiating the marriage of Henry VII. and Margaret, duchess of Savoy, upon which occasion, though he gave a convincing proof of his talent, he was not however, considered as yet in any other light than that of a rising churchman.

This young clergyman, set up by the bishop of Winchester as a proper spy to watch the motions of the earl of Surry, who had brought on the prelate's disgrace, afterwards made as conspicuous a figure in the eyes of Europe, as Henry himself.

The most remarkable public events during the first year of this reign were the renewal of the treaties concluded between Henry VII. and the king of Scotland, and between the emperor Maximilian and the king of England, which were ratified and confirmed about the middle of this year; about the same time, Henry having nominated Christopher Bambridge to the archbishopric of York, that prelate went to Rome to solicit the pope's confirmation of his election, where the king continued him in the character of his ambassador, to watch the motions of pope Julius II. a pontiff of a daring and enterprising genius, who was on the point of entering into a confederacy with the most powerful princes of Europe, with a view to recover some dominions which the republic of Venice had seized from the Ecclesiastic State, in the time of his predecessors.

The emperor Maximilian, Lewis XII. king of France, and duke of Milan, Ferdinand king of Arragon and Naples, and the duke of Ferrara, had all much the same complaints and the same pretexts to engage them in a league against the Venetians, who by force and policy had increased their domains at the expence of each of these princes, and were now become so formidable that no one power in Europe durst attack them separately: each therefore, with a view to recover what he pretended was his just right, and to add to it the spoils of conquest, engaged secretly to assist the rest; and this shameful confederacy was ratified by treaties signed at Cambray, from whence it became customary in history to call this infamous piece of treachery, perfidy, and cowardice, the famous League of Cambray. The better to deceive the unsuspecting republic, it was pretended that the congress at Cambray was only held for settling a difference amicably between the emperor, as guardian to Charles of Austria, and the duke of Gueldres; but as this artifice soon lost its effect, a treaty of perpetual peace was signed and published, between the pope, Lewis XII. the emperor, and Ferdinand; and this was declared to be the end of the congress; while at the same time, the secret treaty against the Venetians was signed, and, in a very short time after, suddenly carried into execution. For just before the death of Henry VII. namely in the beginning of April, 1509, Lewis took the field with a powerful army, and, entering the territories of the republic on the side of Milan, in a short space of time made himself master of Cremona and five other capital cities, after having routed the army of the Venetians, undisciplined, and collected in haste, under the command of count Petigliano: this success of the French so intimidated the towns situated on the Istria, which the republic had taken from the empire, that they submitted to Maximilian: at the same time the pope's army fell upon la Romagna, and reduced its cities to the obedience of the holy see: the duke of Ferrara recovered Rovigo; and Ferdinand paid off an old debt by recovering the five maritime towns in the kingdom of Naples, which had been mortgaged to the Venetians, who in one campaign were dispossessed of their extensive territories, and reduced to the single city of Venice and its dependencies. It is true Ferdinand alone had not tried his strength against them, but when they were so reduced by the other confederates as to be obliged to sue to the pope for pardon and peace, they were obliged to offer Ferdinand the five maritime towns, in order to draw him off from the league.

Lewis having accomplished his views, withdrew his army and returned to France, only sending off a detachment to support the emperor, who had not men enough to garrison the places that had submitted to him: in the mean time the Venetians made their peace with the pope; and the emperor having made an unsuccessful attempt on Padua, he retired to Germany, and sent home the French general; by which conduct the republic enjoyed a short truce, and had time to continue their negotiations with his holiness, already grown jealous of the union between the emperor and the king of France, and apprehending more danger to the ecclesiastical territories from these powerful princes than from the once flourishing republic of Venice, and imagining there was a private treaty between them to get possession of all Italy, he formed the project of breaking the league of Cambray, of disuniting the powers engaged in it, of forming an alliance with the Venetians on certain conditions, of engaging the king of England in his interests, and of fomenting a quarrel between the emperor and the king of France.

Whilst Julius was employed in forming these projects, the parliament of England assembled, on the twenty-first of January, 1510, when the first care of the commons was to represent several grievances, occasioned by the rigour of some statutes in force, which gave too great a power to the ministers of the crown to oppress the people, even under the protection of the law: these were so mitigated and explained in this parliament, as to prevent all abuses of them by future ministers. During this session of parliament, Lewis sent ambassadors to London, to renew the treaties made with the late king, which the young monarch and his ministers had neglected, though, by the tenor of the treaty of Estaples, on the death of Henry VII. it was his successor's business to apply for the renewal of this treaty. Lewis overlooked this omission, and fearing, as Henry was a young and sprightly prince, he might be engaged in some enterprize against his dominions, either by the persuasions of the pope or the emperor, he ordered his ambassadors to conclude a new treaty with him, without mentioning former treaties: by the present it was agreed, "that the peace between the two king's should last till the death of one of them; that it should be ratified by the parliament of England and the states general of France; and that the pope's approbation should be obtained, with a sentence of excommunication against the first violator of the treaty*."

In the mean time the pope was maturing his plan, first against Lewis, and afterwards against the emperor, in case he should not bring him over to his party: his first care was to endeavour to excite all the states of Europe against France; and, in order to engage our young monarch in his favour, he bestowed on him this year a most singular mark of apostolical favour: he sent him a consecrated golden rose, which the popes used to present only to their most favourite princes; and Ferdinand having at length taken the pope's party, proposed an artful treaty of alliance with his son-in-law, the king of England, which he had reason to expect would, by its consequences, draw him into a war against France; for in this treaty which was concluded and signed at London on the twenty-fourth of May, 1510, it was expressly stipulated, "That in case either Henry or Ferdinand should be attacked by any prince whatever, the other should be obliged to declare war against him, though he should then be his ally: and that if either was attacked by the king of France, the other should be obliged to take the field against him in person."

This treaty reflects great dishonour on the ministers of Henry, who had just concluded a new treaty with Lewis, which secured their master from any attacks from France, consequently there could be no necessity for providing for a danger there was no reason to apprehend, by a treaty wholly in favour of Ferdinand, and likely to engage the nation in an unnecessary foreign quarrel; but the English court at this period was wholly taken up with pleasure and amusement, which would not admit of leisure to deliberate and weigh every article of a treaty.

In the midst of the general dissipation of the court, when each was vying with another in the magnificence of carousals, Wolsey was privately forming the plan of his future grandeur. He already began to attract the king's favour, and was this year promoted to the deanery of Lincoln, and to this was added a present of a country-house, which had fallen to the king by the confiscation of the estate of Empson, lately beheaded: but it certainly is an error to rank Wolsey amongst the ministry at this period †, for it is no where asserted, that he was even of the king's council; nor is it probable that if Wolsey had been in power, he would have made so bad a use of his political abilities, as to have given his consent to so weak a treaty as that concluded with Ferdinand, the consequences of which will soon appear, as we must return to the affairs of Italy, which are intimately interwoven with those of England, throughout the major part of this reign.

The pope's plan being ripe for execution, he quarrelled with Lewis XII. on the most frivolous pretext, by disposing of a vacant bishopric in Provence, without asking the king's consent. Lewis complained of this proceeding: the pope insisting strenuously upon his apostolical authority, and Lewis standing up as stiffly for his independence, this produced an open rupture; the pope now openly declared the league he had entered into with the Venetians, and sent his orders to the duke of Ferrara to renounce the league of Cambray and join with him. But the duke refused to comply with his commands, and continued steady to the king of France; this gave Julius a handle to interdict him and confiscate his duchy: and, that his intention might be the better known, he refused the tribute which the duke offered, as usual, for the fief of Ferrara, held of the see of Rome.

Ferdinand, in order to support the pope's interest, to whom he had united himself, used all his endeavours at this time to draw Henry from his alliance with Lewis, who all this time never suspected the Arragonian prince, but concluded, from the repeated assurances of his ambassador, that he still firmly adhered to the treaty of Cambray.

While Ferdinand was thus working in secret, the pope stirred up a new enemy against France, by engaging the bishop of Sion, who was in great credit with the Swiss, to set them at variance with Lewis, by demanding an augmentation of their subsidy: on Lewis's refusal, and entering into an alliance with the Grisons, their enemies, they immediately fell into the bishop of Sion's measures, and, in a diet at Lucerne, resolved to declare for the pope, and to send an army into the duchy of Milan.

The pope carried on these negotiations with so much privacy and expedition, that Lewis, when he found the papal army was in the field, imagined it was designed to act solely against the duke of Ferrara, and therefore he only sent orders to his general, Chaumont, governor of Milan, to support the duke in case of an attack: but soon after, the Venetian fleet, in conjunction with the pope's forces, making an unsuccessful attempt to surprize Genoa, his eyes were immediately opened to the grand designs that were forming against him by Julius, in conjunction with Ferdinand and the Venetians, and therefore lost no time in sending fresh instructions to the governor of Milan. Chaumont received his new orders very seasonably, for hearing that the pope was arrived at Bologna, and intended to lay siege to Ferrara as soon as the reinforcements he expected should arrive, he resolved to surprize him, and accordingly departed from Milan, at the head of a powerful army, and, if he had not suffered himself to be amused by treating with the pope's envoys, in all probability he would have put an end to all the projects of this enterprising pontiff; but, while he was busy in hearing proposals, some Venetian troops had time to throw themselves into the castle, and Chaumont not being prepared for a regular siege, was obliged to retreat.

* It was signed at London, on the twenty-third of March, 1510.

† See Smollett's History, Hen. VIII. have

The pope loudly complained of this pretended insult, and ordered his ministers to expatiate largely thereon in every court of Europe, but particularly at London, in order to engage Henry to espouse his cause: he also excommunicated all the French officers; and soon after made a second attempt, in conjunction with the Venetian fleet, upon Genoa, but without success: and the Swiss army, that was to enter the Milanese, under the conduct of the bishop of Sion, finding the passes into that country well defended, and not being paid by the pope according to agreement, dispersed and returned home.

Lewis at last, having tried every means to obtain a reconciliation with the pope, and finding all his proposals were rejected, determined no longer to keep any measures with him; and therefore forming a new alliance with the emperor, he afterwards assembled a synod at Tours, that he might have the sanction of their authority for his future conduct. The synod determined, that Lewis should offer fresh terms of reconciliation to his holiness; and that, in case of a refusal, he might attack him with a safe conscience. This decree obtained, and Julius still refusing to come to an accommodation, Lewis concluded a second treaty with the emperor, whereby it was resolved to summon a general council to meet at Pisa, in order to depose Julius; and for this purpose they gained over nine cardinals, who agreed to call the council in their names.

At the same time the French king published his complaints against Ferdinand of Arragon, for his behaviour in assisting the pope; but Ferdinand defended himself by maintaining, that, in quality of vassal to the see of Rome, he was bound to protect the pope's person and dominions; that he did not consider the disputes between France and the pope, but only firmly adhered to the articles of the treaty of Cambray.

While things were in this situation, Henry of England was revelling in pleasures, which, however, received some little damp in the beginning of the year 1511, by the queen being brought to bed of a son in January, which died the following month; and it was soon after this event that Henry first saw himself under a necessity of attending to the important affair of Italy; and, with an impetuosity of temper equal to his want of judgment and experience, allured by the charms of conquest, he blindly embraced the artful proposals of Ferdinand who, to engage him the more readily to enter into the confederacy against France, promised to assist him in the recovery of Guienne, which had formerly belonged to the crown of England; and while a treaty for this purpose was negotiating at London, Henry endeavoured to maintain a good understanding with the king of Scotland, appointing ministers to settle all differences between them; but a singular event gave rise to a fresh disagreement, and finally determined James to support Lewis against the confederates, and to oppose all Henry's measures. The subject of this quarrel between England and Scotland was the taking of a Scots vessel which had committed some acts of piracy in the British Channel, seizing and destroying all Portuguese ships that passed that way, in revenge for the murder of a private person (one John Barton, a Scots merchant), by the Portuguese, an act which that government by no means authorized; and yet James had the imprudence, on account of this transaction, to grant commissions to the son of the deceased (whom he also knighted by the name of sir Andrew Barton), for equipping two large frigates, to cruise in the British channel, and obstruct the trade between Portugal and England. The ambassador of Portugal complained loudly of this insult at the court of London; and Henry thereupon ordered out two ships of superior force, under the command of sir Thomas and sir Edward Howard, to fight the Scottish pirate. They met, and an engagement ensued, in which Barton was slain, and his ship taken. The king of Scotland demanded restitution and satisfaction, for what he termed a breach of treaties; but Henry alleging that pirates were not entitled to the law of nations, James in return vowed revenge.

This affair gave Henry a fair opportunity of arming the militia of the kingdom to prepare against an invasion from Scotland, while in reality he was meditating a war against France. On the other hand, the king of Arragon, afraid to push matters too far at once, represented to Henry his ardent desire to continue the war he was engaged in against the Moors, and desired a succour of a thousand English archers, which were immediately sent him, under the conduct of sir Thomas Darcy. Having received this aid, he plainly discovered his intentions by employing it, and the rest of his forces, against France, and not against the Moors as he had pretended.

At the same time the ambassadors from the Venetians at London, and the archbishop of York, Henry's ambassador at Rome, who had lately obtained a cardinal's hat, so strongly pressed the king and council to engage in the league against France, that at length they prevailed; and Henry, forgetting the ties of honour and equity, renounced his late alliance with France, and impolitically entered into the selfish views of the pope and Ferdinand. Lewis, though unacquainted with the transactions between the kings of England and Arragon, yet had a suspicion that the pope was secretly forming alliances, and that he had some more extensive plan in view than the conquest of Ferrara; and knowing that he could gain little or nothing by a war with the haughty pontiff, while on the other hand he had much to lose, he determined to attempt once more a reconciliation: to this end he made him some condescending proposals by Chaumont, his general, while he lay before Mirandola; but Julius, knowing how strongly he was supported, rejected them with disdain, and continued the siege till the town surrendered.

The king of France finding his holiness would not listen to any terms of accommodation, ordered Chaumont to lose no farther time in fruitless parleys, but at all events to support the duke of Ferrara. The French general, accordingly, by forced marches, though in the depth of winter, joined the last-mentioned prince. This seasonable activity so disconcerted the pope and Ferdinand, that, though their forces were superior to those of the French, yet they durst not order an attack; and the pope, in order to fix Maximilian on his side, put into his hands the important city of Modena, which Chaumont was preparing to besiege; and from this time the emperor appears to be greatly estranged from the cause of France. The king of Arragon, however, still dissembled with Lewis, and would not declare against him till he was quite sure of Henry; and, to gain time, while the secret treaty was finishing at London, he affected to be well disposed to peace, and proposed a congress at Mantua. All parties having agreed, the congress was opened, but with no other view on the part of the allies than to amuse the French king, whose forces were victorious, while they were secretly strengthening the confederacy by the acquisition of Henry. Thus was Lewis overpowered by stratagem, at a time when his army, flushed with success, and dreaded by the allies, might have made its way through the whole Ecclesiastical State, and have reduced the pope to the last extremity. At length, however, he ordered the marshal de Trivulcé, who had succeeded Chaumont, lately deceased, to fall upon the enemy by surprise: Trivulcé accordingly surprised and took Concordia, at the very time when, by consent of the emperor and Ferdinand the summons was published for calling the council of Pisa, in order to depose the pope; and afterwards by continual marches he came up with the army of the allies, and offered them battle, but in vain; he then resolved to approach Bologna, where the pope was in person, with a view to engage the inhabitants to rise in favour of the family of Bentivoglio, who had been formerly sovereigns of Bologna. The pope on his approach retired to Ravenna, leaving his prime minister to take care of the city. He was no sooner gone than the inhabitants, agreeable to Trivulcé's expectations, raised a tumult, obliged the cardinal de Pavia, the pope's agent to fly, and restored the government of the city to the Bentivoglios; while this was transacting, the army of the allies approached the gates, and finding the pope and the cardinal were fled, they followed the example; and the citizens and peasants falling out, entire stripped their camp, which rendered the army unfit for service during that campaign. The cowardly cardinal was stabbed by the duke d'Urbino, his nephew; while his holiness had the sensible mortification of returning to Rome, attended only by a few domestics, and of seeing the placards for holding the council of Pisa, in which his character was severely handled, stuck up in all the towns and villages through which he passed.

The duke of Ferrara, improving the favourable juncture, easily recovered his dominions; and it was generally imagined that Lewis would soon become master of Rome. Instead of this, through scruple of conscience, being urged by the queen not to oppose the church too far, he ordered Trivulcé to retire to Milan; and the pope now saw himself reduced to the necessity of proposing an accommodation to Lewis, who readily agreed to his terms, which were rather those of a conqueror than of a vanquished prince: but while the emperor's consent (which Lewis insisted on) was obtaining to this accommodation, his holiness received the welcome news that Ferdinand's fleet, destined to assist him, was arrived at Naples, and immediately altered his measures, demanding such fresh concessions from Lewis, as left him no room to doubt that his whole aim in this negotiation was to gain time. This prevarication highly exasperated the king of France, who immediately ordered his general to send strong detachments to Bologna, and firmly to support the Bentivoglios; he also added a reinforcement to the emperor's troops in the state of Venice, and took every precaution to prevent a surprise by Ferdinand, whom he now regarded as his declared enemy. The pope, on the other hand, having advice that Ferdinand had nearly gained over the king of England, determined to summon a general council, in opposition to that of Pisa; accordingly he published a bull for holding a council at the Lateran, at Rome, on the nineteenth of April, 1512, whereas that of Pisa was summoned for the first of September, 1511; so that the subsequent council of the Lateran was contrived to annul the proceedings of that held at Pisa.

The affairs of Italy now remained in a very perplexed situation: the pope and the Venetians only were at open war with Lewis XII. while Ferdinand and the pope had promised secretly to assist each other against France, yet waited for the junction of Henry, and in the mean time mistrusted a separate accommodation with Lewis.

At length Ferdinand, being most suspicious of an accommodation between France and the pope, saw himself under a necessity of openly avowing his intentions, and accordingly he sent his whole armament, which he pretended was destined for Africa, to Naples, and declared that he would defend the church against the insults of Lewis; and soon after Henry promised to enter into this unjust confederacy; as for the emperor he remained quiet at Inspruck, neither absolutely forsaking Lewis his ally, nor yet acting agreeable to treaty against the confederates, but seemed determined to wait the event, and take part with the most powerful. While this was transacting, the cardinals who were in opposition to the pope, appointed commissioners to open the council of Pisa, and though this was only for form sake, that the appointed day of opening it might be observed, yet the pope was so enraged at it, that he excommunicated the Florentines and Pisans, and put the cities of Milan and Pisa under an interdict; which only hastened the actual assembly and sitting of that council for the dispatch of business on the fourth of November; and on the eleventh following, Ferdinand having by his secret negotiations, at length fixed the court of London in the pope's interest; it was agreed, that Henry and himself should send ambassadors to the court of France, to demand a cessation of all hostilities against Julius, and to declare in case of refusal, that, as became Christian princes, they would support the cause of the church. Lewis having been long prepared for this rupture, returned an answer becoming his dignity, and loudly inveighed against the perfidious conduct of Henry and Ferdinand; and soon after, viz. on the fourth of October, 1511, a league was concluded at Rome by the pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians, and spaces were left in the league to be filled up by the king of England's minister at Rome; but he was ordered not to accede to the treaty at this time, the court of London expecting to obtain some secret articles from the pope in favour of England; but a circumstance happened in the interim, which prevented all farther delay, and engaged Henry to sign the league without waiting for any better terms for his own kingdom: for John d'Albret, king king of Navarre, being in strict alliance with France, declared for the council of Pisa, which furnished the king of Arragon with a pretext for depriving him of his kingdom; and the better to put this design in execution, he represented to Henry, that this was a favourable opportunity for recovering and restoring to the crown of England the province of Guienne, which had formerly belonged to the English, and he generously promised to furnish the necessary troops and ammunition, to save Henry the expence of transporting them from England. Deceived by this offer, and the too common ambition of sovereigns, the hopes of extending his dominions, the English monarch entered into the league, which by good policy he ought to have avoided, not only as the peace lately renewed with France was a very advantageous one for England, but as, by diverting the arms of that kingdom and turning them against Italy, he was secured in the quiet possession of his own kingdom, which had been continually exposed to invasions from France. The league at Rome being now ratified, in a short time a separate treaty of alliance was signed at London between Ferdinand and Henry, in the preamble to which they very indecently and unjustly accuse Lewis "of impiety, and represent him as a sacrilegious person, who had violated the peace of the church, and waged a civil war against the vicar of Christ; and that, having attempted in vain to engage him to desist from his cruel hostilities against the holy see, they had entered into a solemn league and alliance for the defence, exaltation, and increase of the catholic faith and of the holy Roman church, so unjustly oppressed: and for this purpose it was mutually agreed, that they should distress the king of France by carrying war into Guienne, which should be conquered for the king of England, to whom it justly belonged; that they should adhere to the council of Lateran, and oppose that of Pisa and all its adherents; that neither king should make peace without consent of the other; that this treaty should not cancel those which the two princes had formerly concluded; and that it should be ratified in four months*."

In this state, with regard to England, stood affairs in the year 1511. Very little of importance then passed with relation to domestic concerns: Henry was chiefly employed in spending the money left him by his father, and in all the parade of magnificence. His favourite seat was Greenwich, and his chief companions were William Compton and Charles Brandon (the latter of whom was afterwards the famous duke of Suffolk), sir Edward Howard, Edward Neville, Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorset, with Bouchier, earl of Essex, and Courtney, earl of Devonshire.

But before we close the transactions of this year, it is necessary that we should give some account of two expeditions set on foot from England, in the beginning of this year. Henry had granted an assistance of a thousand archers to Ferdinand, to be employed against the Moors, and to be commanded by the lord Darcy, governor of Berwick. He also sent sir Edward Poynings, with a body of forces consisting of fifteen hundred men, who were to be employed by Margaret, duchess of Savoy, against the duke of Gueldres, in the Low Countries.

The lord Darcy embarking at Plymouth in the month of March, landed safe at Cales (or Cadiz), in Spain, where he was received by Ferdinand with great friendship and magnificence; but about the time he arrived, that prince had altered the destination of his troops, and was bent upon his Italian expedition. The lord Darcy received the declaration of this with no little dissatisfaction, which communicating itself to the English soldiery, occasioned some disturbances in the town, and about the beginning of August the troops returned to England.

As to the forces under sir Edward Poynings, they sailed from Sandwich about April, and joined the French army at Bois le Duc. A few days after their arrival they had an opportunity of shewing their courage in several encounters and attacks of places; but the enemy keeping themselves on the defensive all the time the English were in that country, the latter, as soon as the time limited for their service expired, desired and obtained leave to return home, which they did about the middle of October, with the loss of above one hundred men.

On the fourth day of February, 1512, the parliament of England sat: at the opening of the sessions a very plausible speech was made in behalf of the king, with regard to the part he had taken in the present disturbances of Europe. Perhaps the members were not insensible of the error in politics which he and his council had committed; but as the honour of the nation was now engaged, and as the public entertained a very high opinion of Henry, the commons granted him a handsome supply, and the clergy did the same.

Thus strengthened, the king, upon the rising of the parliament, entered into serious deliberation with his council, on the best methods for prosecuting with vigour the war against France; and Silvester, bishop of Worcester, and sir Robert Wingfield, being sent as ambassadors to the council of Lateran; the next measure resolved upon, was concerning the operations of the approaching campaign, by sea and land. Sir Edward Howard, eldest son of the earl of Surry, had, upon several occasions, given great proofs of his abilities in the sea-service, and was therefore appointed lord high-admiral of England.

The indenture entered into between the king and the admiral on this occasion is very particular, and affords us great light as to the manner of fitting out fleets at this time; the reader therefore cannot be displeased at seeing in the note † a part of this indenture, especially as very few historians have given any particular account of the state of the

† I. Besides three thousand men, armed for sea-war, there were to be seven hundred soldiers, mariners, and gunners, in the ship called the Regent. The above three thousand men consisted of the eighteen captains of the English ships, seventeen hundred and fifty soldiers, and twelve hundred and thirty-two mariners and gunners.

II. The admiral to have, for the maintenance of himself in diet, and for wages and reward, ten shillings daily pay, during the voyage; and each captain one shilling and six pence per day, i. e. two shillings and seven pence of our modern money.

III. The soldiers, mariners, and gunners to have per month, or twenty-eight days, five shillings wages, and five shillings more for victuals.

IV. The admiral undertakes to manage his armament for the before-named and following allowance, he receiving three months expence always beforehand. Item, for the coat of every the marine in these days. Indeed, from this year we may properly date the commencement of what may be called an English navy-royal, that is a number of stout ships for war actually belonging to, and permanently kept on foot by, the English crown for natural defence, Henry VIII. being the first English king who effectually pursued this plan, and for that end first established a royal navy-office, with commissioners, &c. nearly as at present: and, according to lord Herbert, the king built, in the preceding year, the largest ship ever known in England before; it was built at Woolwich, which place is said to have had the first or oldest royal dock of any place in England. This is the ship which in the indenture is called the Regent. The next year a magazine and store-house was first erected at Deptford, near London, which has since become a large town. But to return.

Every thing being now in readiness for the expedition, the marquis of Dorset was appointed general of the land forces, and had as officers under him, the three brothers John, Anthony, and Leonard Grey, the lord Thomas Howard, the lords Brooke, Willoughby, Ferrers, and Burford, sir Richard Cornwall, sir Maurice Berkeley, sir Griffith Rice or ap Rice, and many other persons of great distinction and courage.

But here I must observe, that Ferdinand acted with his usual policy and deceit; for when he first proposed the affair of Guienne to Henry, he promised to furnish him with troops and ammunition for the conquest; but after he found that Henry greedily swallowed the bait, he contrived in the late treaty to change these proposals, by agreeing to furnish only his quota of troops, and to provide forty transports and ammunition, provisions, &c. at a moderate price.

The fleet was got ready with such expedition, that in May following it put to sea, and landed the troops in the province of Guipuscoa in the middle of June. The English admiral, in his return, made some successful descents on the coast of Brittany; and Henry learning that Lewis had fitted out a powerful fleet, sent a reinforcement to Howard. Soon after the French fleet sailed from Brest, and met the English in the Channel, when a general engagement ensued, the decision of which was prevented by a most rash and desperate action of one of the captains of the French fleet, named Porrmoguere, who, being grappled by the great English ship the Regent*, and finding himself overpowered, madly set fire to his powder-room, which blew up both ships, by which every person on board them perished, to the amount of sixteen hundred. This dismal catastrophe so affected both parties, that the engagement ceased; the French retiring to Brest, and the English remaining in the Channel.

The marquis of Dorset being ignorant of Ferdinand's intentions, was surprized to find, that, instead of pursuing the conquest of Guienne, that prince gave such instructions to his general, the duke d'Alva, as plainly shewed his whole aim was to conquer Navarre for himself; for the Spanish general, instead of joining the English army, which was encamped near Fontarabia, with a design to besiege Bayonne in conjunction with Ferdinand's forces, as had been agreed, kept moving about the frontiers of Navarre; and Ferdinand sent to the English general, to acquaint him, that as the king of Navarre was supported by France, he thought it would not be adviseable to attack Bayonne till they had taken some measures about Navarre, because, while they were carrying on the siege, the king of Navarre might call in the French, and, by encamping between the mountains of Navarre and the sea, prevent all supplies of provisions passing to the camp before Bayonne: on these considerations he said he judged it necessary to try to gain the king of Navarre to their party, before they undertook the siege. The English general, not suspecting any deceit, readily agreed to these proposals, and sent an English officer to the king of Navarre, to desire him to join the allies; while Ferdinand, who knew his attachment to France, sent him a summons to join them, couched in such terms as, he was well convinced, would only be treated at best with great coldness; however, his answer was very moderate, having resolved to observe a strict neutrality. But Ferdinand, not content with this, insisted on his declaring in their favour, or delivering up four capital places as a security that he would not act against them. This proposal was rejected with the contempt it merited, and in the mean time a French army approached the frontiers of Bearn, which obliged the marquis of Dorset to remonstrate to Ferdinand, that the time expended in treating with the king of Navarre had given the French leisure to approach and defend their frontiers; and insisted, that he should declare if he would attack Guienne agreeable to the treaty of London. Ferdinand replied, that, in the present posture of affairs, he could not send his army to the siege of Bayonne, and leave his own dominions defenceless and a prey to the incursions every captain and soldier, four shillings; and of every mariner and gunner, one shilling and eight pence.

V. For the dead shares of the said eighteen English ships the admiral was to have as follows, viz.

	Tons burden.	Dead shares.
For the Regent, being	1000	four pilots 50
the Mary Rose	500	— 34½
the Peter Pomegranate	400	— 28
John Hopton's ship	400	Dead shares needless to be mentioned.
the Nicholas Rude	400
the Mary George	300
The rest of the eighteen ships were,
One of 240 tons	Two of	140 tons
One of 200	Three of	120
Three of 160	One of	100

Moreover, for re-victualling and watering the said eighteen ships (they are here nineteen) the admiral was allowed two crayers, viz. one of sixty-five tons, and the other of fifty-five; in the former, twelve mariners and a boy, in the latter, ten and a boy, besides their commanders; each of the masters and mariners to have ten shillings per month (as before) for wages and victuals.

VI. All the soldiers and sailors to have six pence per day for conduct money, allowing a day's journey to be twelve miles only.

And forasmuch as our sovereign lord, at his own costs and charges, victualleth the said army and navy, the said admiral shall therefore reserve for the king one half of all gains and winnings of the war, which he and the fleet, or any of them, shall fortune to obtain in the voyage, either on land or water; and also all prisoners, being chieftains; and one ship royal of two hundred tons or upwards, with the ordnance and apparel of every prize to be taken by them. Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xiii. p. 326, 327.

This English fleet was, by agreement, to guard the seas from the Channel to the Streight's Mouth of Gibraltar; and king Ferdinand's fleet was to do the like in the Mediterranean. It was about this time that ships began to be reckoned by guns and tonnage jointly, gunners being now the first time mentioned in the Fœdera.

of the French and of the subjects of the king of Navarre; that it was more for their joint interest to pass through Navarre and secure three or four considerable places, in order to prevent the enemy making use of that kingdom against him; he therefore requested that the English would advance and join the duke d'Alva; that his army should make the vanguard, and be exposed to the greatest danger; that in the mean while the siege of Bayonne could not be said to be retarded, but rather hastened by the securest means, for that the king of Navarre only wanted to be hard pressed, in order to save appearances, when he should enter into the league. To this the English general replied, that he had no instructions to act offensively against the king of Navarre; that the duke d'Alva might march his army through that prince's dominions, and take possession of his towns, if he thought proper; but that he should remain where he was. Ferdinand still persisted in his design, and while he was endeavouring to bring over the English general to join his army, he ordered d'Alva to invest Pampeluna, the capital of Navarre, which soon surrendered, and the king took refuge in France, where he entered into an offensive and defensive treaty of alliance with Lewis, to whom, however, he was obliged to make several concessions, and in particular to cede to him the town of Salvatierra and all Bearn. After the surrender of Pampeluna, Ferdinand, instead of sending d'Alva to join the marquis of Dorset, ordered him to pursue his conquests, so that the English army served as an army of observation, intimidating the French from attempting to succour Navarre, while the Spanish general subdued the greatest part of that kingdom without molestation.

In the mean time Ferdinand artfully dispatched a messenger to London, to amuse Henry with a different representation of the state of affairs, and to request him to order the English to join his army. Before this order, which Ferdinand obtained from Henry, could reach the marquis of Dorset, the duke d'Alva had taken St. Jean de Pied de Port, and then Ferdinand, content with his acquisitions, made a shew of joining the English army, and proposed to march directly to the siege of Bayonne; but that able general, the marquis of Dorset, now refused in his turn, alleging that it was become impracticable, as the French had gained time to entrench themselves between Bayonne and Salvatierra; and even the garrison of Bayonne must, during these delays, have provided themselves with every thing necessary for a long siege; besides, the situation of the French was such, that he must hazard the loss of all his army by crossing the river Bidasoa. Ferdinand was apprized of all these obstacles, but was willing, if possible, to throw all the blame on the marquis, who at last was highly incensed at his conduct, and, perceiving his army daily diminished through sickness and scarcity of provision, he demanded transports to convey them to England; these were granted by Ferdinand with an appearance of discontent, but as he had gained his point in subduing Navarre, which he now annexed to the crown of Spain, it is not to be doubted that he secretly rejoiced at the voluntary retreat of the English army.

Before the embarkation took place, the marquis was taken ill, and was succeeded in command by lord Howard, who received an order from court for the English army to remain all the winter where it was, and to obey Ferdinand in all his directions; but these now produced a mutiny in the army, which insisted on embarking; and when they arrived in England, the king was at first greatly incensed against the marquis of Dorset; but when the proceedings of the whole campaign came to be fairly stated, he too plainly perceived that Ferdinand had shamefully imposed upon him and his impolitic ministers; and of this he was more fully convinced towards the end of the year, when he saw that prince in full possession of Navarre, and pretending to maintain himself in it by virtue of a bull from the pope, who had excommunicated John d'Albret, king of Navarre, for adhering to the council of Pisa, and had declared a right of possession in favour of the conqueror. Henry, though undeceived by these measures, was forced in his turn to dissemble, being apprehensive that Ferdinand would make his peace with Lewis.

While Ferdinand was making himself master of Navarre, the confederate army, consisting of the pope's forces, those of the Venetians, and a detachment of Ferdinand's, under the command of the vice-roy of Naples, undertook the siege of Bologna, at the pope's express desire, contrary to the sentiments of the vice-roy and of the general of the Venetian army: but Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, governor of Milan, coming to the relief of the place with a powerful force, the allies were obliged to raise the siege: and, in a few days after, the same general defeated the Venetian army, and at length totally routed that of the allies; but it cost him his life, for he was slain in pursuing the vanquished too warmly, after he had gained a complete victory.

After his death, la Palisse took the command of the army, and made himself master of Ravenna; upon which all the towns belonging to the pope in la Romagna voluntarily surrendered to the cardinal de St. Severin, who was legate in the French army from the council of Pisa, now removed to Milan. This rapid success of the French threw the cardinals of the pope's party at Rome into such consternation, that they publicly petitioned Julius to make peace with France; but the pope probably knew that the affairs of France were on the decline, and that the council of Pisa would have little or no weight when that of the Lateran was opened, for he persisted in refusing to offer any terms of accommodation, and only made his forces advance to prevent the French marching to Rome, which they might easily have done, if la Palisse had not judged it more for his master's interest to oppose the progress of the Swiss, who, encouraged by the cardinal of Sion, had entered the duchy of Milan with sixteen thousand men; this engaged la Palisse to fly to the assistance of that country; leaving only a small detachment, under the conduct of St. Severin, to defend his new conquests in la Romagna. In proportion as the French army retreated from the pope's dominions, his holiness assumed his accustomed haughtiness and implacability, and he now resolved to open the council of Lateran, and to refuse every offer of peace: he next proceeded to excommunicate Lewis, and laid France under an interdict; his pretence for this severe sentence was the detention of his legate at Milan, where, though a prisoner, his authority so far prevailed, that the inhabitants of that city refused fused to acknowledge the authority of the council removed there from Pisa. In the absence of la Palisse all the towns of la Romagna once more submitted to the pope; Ferdinand was become master of Navarre; and Lewis was obliged to have an army in Bearn, in order to prevent the English invading Guienne; besides this, the emperor was secretly agreeing to withdraw from France a body of German troops, lent to Lewis for the defence of the Milanese: thus the affairs of Lewis grew every day more desperate, and la Palisse, finding himself too weak to defend the duchy of Milan against the Swiss army, after the emperor had recalled his troops, was obliged to send for the remainder of his army, which he had left under the command of the cardinal St. Severin for the defence of la Romagna.

The Swiss army having obtained the emperor's permission, marched to Trent, and thus entered the duchy of Milan by an indirect road, which the French did not suspect, as the emperor was in alliance with Lewis; by this means they avoided all the passes which la Palisse had strongly guarded, and having joined the Venetians, they marched directly to Milan, which totally disconcerted the measures of the French general, who, not being strong enough to give battle to the united army of the Swiss and Venetians, was forced to retire into the fortified towns, and there wait for relief from France; which not arriving as he expected, he found it was in vain to attempt the defence of that country, and therefore retreated with his army to France: upon this the council of Pisa was once more removed to Lyons, the prelates that composed it following the motions of la Palisse, for their own security.

After the retreat of the French, the whole duchy of Milan surrendered to the Venetian and Swiss army, except Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, which were ceded to the pope; and Alexander Bentivoglio once more abandoned Bologna to the mercy of his holiness, who, by this revolution, in a short space of time saw his affairs totally retrieved, by the French being entirely driven out of Italy: but, for the completion of his wishes, there still remained the following changes to take place; the restoration of the Sforzas to the duchy of Milan, the expulsion of the duke of Ferrara, the restoration of the Medici at Florence, and the driving the Germans and Spaniards out of Italy. For this end he procured a congress of the allies to be held at Mantua, where it was agreed to restore Sforza to Milan, and to re-establish the house of Medici at Florence. In consequence of this agreement, the army of the allies approached Florence, and compelled the inhabitants to admit the Medici as citizens, but not as governors; but the cardinal de Medici entering the city, by virtue of the new agreement, while the army of the allies were at the gates, he took that opportunity of raising a sedition in his favour, by means of which the gates were opened to the allied army, and the government was vested in the house of Medici as before their banishment.

Having gained these points, Julius, flushed with success, determined to lose no time in accomplishing the rest: for this end a second meeting of the allies was held at Rome, but he could obtain nothing of the Venetians, who would not act against the duke of Ferrara, because he was supported by Ferdinand. He then endeavoured to bring about an accommodation between the emperor and the Venetians; but in this he was likewise unsuccessful, owing to the hard terms proposed by the emperor: and when he found there was no other method of completing his ambitious views, and probably that one of these powers might recal the French into Italy, he entered into an unjust league, offensive and defensive, with the emperor against the Venetians. The emperor, on his part, engaged to become a principal in the treaty formerly made at Rome, between Ferdinand, the pope, Henry of England, and the Venetians, who were by this treaty to be excluded from the former; he also promised to renounce the authority of the council of Pisa, and to abandon the duke of Ferrara and the family of Bentivoglio. This treaty being ratified, the bishop of Gurck, the emperor's minister, renounced, in the next assembly of the Lateran council, the authority of that of Pisa, and annulled all the former proceedings of his master in its support.

To return to the affairs of England. It is remarkable, that in all these revolutions in Italy, and in the several negociations consequent thereupon, the principals in the league at Rome seemed wholly to forget that Henry was of their party, so that he was merely considered as a necessary agent to carry on the designs of the pope and Ferdinand; yet, though he was not so much as mentioned in any of the transactions, after the emperor and the pope had concluded their treaty, they, in conjunction with Ferdinand, once more formed a scheme for imposing on the youth and inexperience of the English monarch, and, through the corruption or weakness of his ministry, succeeded a second time. It was represented to him, that, having driven the French from Italy, they now intended to unite their forces and turn them against France, promising to give Henry all proper assistance to recover Guienne and Normandy. In consequence of these offers Henry sent ambassadors to Brussels, with full powers to enter into a league with the pope, the emperor, Ferdinand, and Charles of Austria, sovereign of the Netherlands, against the king of France: and the parliament being assembled in November, readily granted a subsidy for the support of this confederacy; while the pope, the better to enable the king to carry his arms into France with expedition, sent over a plenary indulgence to all his subjects who should voluntarily assist him with their persons or estates.

Henry, that he might be able to prosecute this war without being interrupted by his neighbour, the king of Scotland, sent ambassadors to his court, with assurances that he would on his part inviolably adhere to the treaty of peace subsisting between them: but the affair of Barton, and the detention of his ships, had deeply affected James, who only waited a proper opportunity to resent it, and the intended expedition against France seemed to offer him a favourable one, since England would be drained of men and money for this impolitic enterprise: accordingly he secretly treated with Lewis, and agreed to make an incursion into England as soon as the English should land in France; and, by way of preparing matters for a rupture, he equipped a fleet, which he sent over to the continent, under colour of paying a compliment to the queen of France; but it was disabled, and some of the ships lost, in a storm. But when Henry soon after declared war against Lewis, the secret was divulged; for a treaty was suddenly signed between France and Scotland, which had been long concerted. Upon on this Henry sent ambassadors to Scotland, under pretence of settling all differences between the two crowns, but in reality to observe the preparations that were making by the king of Scotland to assist Lewis, and also to procure a copy of the treaty with France: which they effected*; and then Henry, finding a war with Scotland was inevitable, gave a commission to the earl of Surry to levy an army in the North of England, and to act against the Scots, if they attempted to enter England with an armed force.

Of all the allies concerned in the confederacy against France, the king of England alone had serious views upon that kingdom: the pope's sole aim was to destroy the council of Pisa, to seize on the possessions of the duke of Ferrara, and in process of time to drive the emperor out of Venice, with whom he was allied only from the motives of interest; his only design therefore, with respect to France, was to find her employment at home: the king of Arragon wanted only to secure Navarre: the emperor, who was naturally covetous, was endeavouring to sell his friendship to the highest bidder, as occasion offered: the Venetians were endeavouring to put an end to a destructive war, on the best terms they could obtain from the emperor by the strength of money: consequently, while Henry was making ready for his expedition, these allies were separately contriving the means of accomplishing their particular views, without any regard to his meditated conquest of Guienne and Normandy.

The first proof of this treachery was given by the emperor, who, early in the year 1513, proposed a new league with France, offering to assist Lewis in recovering the duchy of Milan, if that prince would aid him against the Venetians; he likewise demanded the second daughter of Lewis for Charles of Austria, his grand-son; but to this proposal, terms were annexed that were so inconsistent and incompatible with the interest of France, that they argued both extreme weakness and arrogance in Maximilian, and were treated with that indignation they justly merited: but they had one good effect in favour of Lewis, for the Venetians, who earnestly desired an union with France, listened to terms of accommodation as soon as they found the emperor was attempting to be before-hand with them. While the treaty was negotiating between France and the Venetians, the grand promoter of the confederacy, pope Julius II. died in the midst of his preparations against the duke of Ferrara, and by his death gave a new turn to the system of affairs in Europe, as will be seen in the sequel.

He was succeeded by the cardinal John de Medici, the same who, in the preceding year, had restored his family to the government of Florence: he assumed the name of Leo X. and, though while a cardinal he had disapproved of several of the violent measures taken by Julius, yet he seemed now determined to pursue his plan with regard to the affairs of Italy. He was doubly interested to keep the French from returning into that country, not only on account of the ecclesiastical dominions, but for the security of the house of Medici; and he was equally incensed against the council of Pisa. In this situation of affairs, all the allies animated Henry to pursue the war against France; and, the better to persuade him of the sincerity of their friendship, they entered into a new treaty at Mechlin. This treaty was christened by the name of the Holy League against France, and we have a copy of it in Mr. Rymer's Collection †, containing in substance as follows:

" I. The first article of the confederation made between the pope, the emperor, and the kings of England and Arragon, against Lewis XII. was to be friends of the friends, and enemies of the enemies, &c. to give mutual aid, at the charges of the demandant.

" II. To denounce war, after thirty days after the date hereof, and within two months to invade him, viz. the pope in Provence or Dauphiné, the emperor in some other fit place, the king of England in Aquitaine or Guienne, Picardy or Normandy, the king of Arragon in Bearne, Languedoc, and Aquitaine: not to desist from any hostility, or make any truce, without common consent.

" III. That the subjects of the confederates serve not the enemy, under pain of losing life and goods.

" IV. That the emperor (if he hath not yet done it) shall recal the authority by him given to the schismatical cardinals and their conventicle, and within a month after the date of this, signifying his pleasure, shall void and nullify all their proceedings and acts in the same.

" V. The pope shall, at the request of the confederates, fulminate his ecclesiastical censures against all that oppose this league.

" VI. The king of England shall give the emperor (towards the great charges he shall be at) one hundred thousand crowns.

" VII. Yet the emperor, by this treaty, will not engage his grand-child Charles (now under his tuition) into this war with Lewis."

Lewis, as a counterpoise to this league, entered into alliance with the Venetians, and immediately sent an army into Italy, under the command of la Tremouille, on whose approach Sforza abandoned Milan, and left the duchy open to the French army, who took possession without opposition; and, much about the same time, Alviano, the Venetian general, took several considerable places, and the French interest prevailing at Genoa, Lewis was again put in possession of that government. But a quick revolution succeeded this short success; for Tremouille being repulsed at the siege of Novarra, and afterwards totally defeated by the Swiss, Sforza returned to Milan, and the French lost Genoa; and, to add to their misfortunes, the Venetian general was defeated, and the state, terrified by these two accidents, referred themselves to the pope, imploring his protection of their affairs.

By this time every thing was ready in England for the expedition to France, and Henry's eyes were at last opened to the many impositions that

* It was expressed in the treaty ratified by both kings, " That whereas before the kings of Scotland and France were obliged to assist one another, in opposition to the English, or such as should offer to invert the hereditary right or succession to their respective crowns, they became now bound to aid and assist one another, and even in person if occasion should require it, against all who may live and die; that is, the king of Scotland, rather than his allies, the king of France and the duke of Gueldres, should perish, undertook, in conjunction with them, to make war against the pope and all Italy, the emperor and all Germany, the king of England and his formidable dominions of England and Ireland, the king of Arragon and all Spain, the governesses of the Netherlands and all Holland, Brabant, Flanders, &c. the state of Venice, the cantons of Switzerland, &c." The original is preserved in the Public Register Office in Edinburgh.

had been practised on him, not only by foreigners but his own ministers: the aspiring genius of Wolsey, who had lately been advanced to the dignity of a privy-counsellor, where he soon discovered his great talents for public affairs, put the bishop of Winchester, who had placed him about the royal person, upon seizing this opportunity to instruct his creature in the method of securing the king's favour, and of increasing his confidence in him, by which the good bishop hoped to obtain the advancement of Wolsey, and the removal of the king's favourites. This was soon after effected; for Wolsey, having gained the esteem of the king, by complying with all his foibles, and by humouring him in his passions, he took the liberty of remonstrating to him on the ill conduct of affairs; and fully convinced Henry how greatly he had been abused, both at home and abroad. The king finding that an able minister was wanting, to recover his affairs, rightly judged that the properest person for this office was the man who had been capable of discovering to him the insufficiency of his former council: accordingly from this hour Wolsey was entrusted with the administration of public affairs; and for the following seventeen years managed all the king's business, both at home and abroad; with what success, will be seen in the course of the history.

The first hostilities against France commenced at sea. Admiral Howard having attacked some French galleys, under the command of Pregent, an able sea officer in the service of Lewis, during the engagement, the admiral's ship having grappled Pregent's galley, he boarded her sword in hand, and threw the French into great confusion; but unfortunately the galley having disengaged herself from the English, the admiral was left on board with a few attendants, and in the confusion was knocked overboard with a handspike, and killed, before it was known who he was. The loss of the admiral so intimidated the English, that they immediately tacked about, and bore away for their own coast. The French, encouraged by the success of this action, and being joined by some ships from Brest to reinforce them, approached the coast of England, and made a descent, but in a small body, in Sussex, where they did some trifling damage, and then retired to their fleet. Henry appointed the late admiral's brother, sir Thomas Howard, to succeed him in the command of his fleet.

Shortly after, Henry came to the knowledge of a truce which Ferdinand had entered into with Lewis for one year, and to which his good father-in-law had made him a party, without giving him the least intimation of such an unexpected measure. Upon this Henry sent an ambassador to upbraid him for his perfidious conduct, and to insist on his fulfilling the treaty of Mechlin. Ferdinand still pleaded his integrity, urged the necessity of his affairs, which had forced him into this truce, desired Henry to agree to it, and promised to fulfil all his engagements at the expiration of this truce: but Henry had now a minister that was not to be amused in this manner: and shortly after, the emperor having sent the king of England a frivolous excuse for not observing his part of the treaty, this year it was resolved that England should carry the war into France alone; and thus Ferdinand equally betrayed Lewis and Henry, for the former, trusting to the truce, had sent his best troops into Italy, and left his own dominions exposed to the invasion from England.

Resolved not to lose the fruits of the great preparations which had been made for the French expedition, and which were now nearly completed, Henry, on the second of May this year, issued a commission for a general muster of the army. The marquis of Dorset was made lieutenant-general under Henry himself; the earl of Shrewsbury was appointed to command the first column; the lord Mountjoy, William Atclyff, and Miles Gerard, were ordered to take up transports, which were to rendezvous at the ports of Dover, Sandwich, Winchelsea, Hastings, and Rye; and lastly, queen Catherine was appointed guardian of the kingdom during Henry's absence: her commission for this purpose was very ample, having command given her over all the troops in England, and a power, in conjunction with five noblemen, of taking up money upon loan, and giving security for the sums to be employed for raising and maintaining forces*.

The sea was now open and safe for Henry and his army: it was, however, warmly debated in the council, how far it was proper for the king to expose his own person in the expedition; but his vanity getting the better of all other considerations, he determined to hazard every thing in pursuit of what he called glory, the council consented, and the last orders were given for the transports to put to sea. At the same time Henry, willing to oblige his favourite, Charles Brandon, who had greatly endeared himself to his royal master by his sweetness of temper and many personal accomplishments, and who, though with all the appearance of seeking pleasure only, indulged a noble ambition, gave him a very high post in his army, created him viscount Lisle†, and raised him next year to the dignity of duke of Suffolk. Wolsey, though already jealous of the least competitorship in Henry's esteem, yet was so won by the captivating frankness of this young courtier, that, instead of opposing, he closed with Henry's bent towards him, and found a conveniency in his sovereign's having such a friend, with whom he could amuse himself during those hours which might have else been uneasy to the minister, and it was resolved that both of them should attend the king in his French expedition; Wolsey in the character of almoner of the household.

Nothing now remained but to provide for the peace of the kingdom, in case of the worst event, by putting the unfortunate earl of Suffolk, still a prisoner in the Tower, to death. His brother Richard de la Pole was at that time in the French service, which has made some historians conjecture, that Henry put the earl to death in resentment for his brother's serving against him; but it is more probable that the king was determined to prevent the succession of the crown falling to the house of York, in case of his own death during this expedition: and if we believe the French writers, it was in consequence of Henry VII's dying commands to his son. However this might be, it is certain that Henry was inexorable to all entreaties in the earl's favour, who lost his head upon Tower-hill on the twenty-ninth of April.

About the beginning of June this year, two divisions of the English troops were embarked, and safely landed at Calais, where they remained till the seventeenth of the same month, when an order came from court for their marching towards Terouenne, a town of Artois, situated on the Lys, six miles from St. Omer's. The place was at this time strongly fortified, and had in it a garrison of between two and three thousand men, under Telegni, seneschal of Rouvergne, and Anthony de Crequy. Upon the approach of the English army, on the twenty-second day of June, within cannon-shot of the place, the enemy's artillery played so furiously upon them, that the baron Carew, master of the ordnance, was killed by the lord Herbert's side. The English, however, sat down within a mile of the town; the earl of Shrewsbury on the north-west and the lord Herbert on the east. By this disposition they invested the place so as to cut off the garrison from all relief, and to maintain their posts till they were reinforced. And here it will not be improper to take a review of the number of these forces, and the names of their commanders, who were sent from England to prepare the way for Henry.

The first division consisted of eight thousand men, and was commanded by George Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, and Thomas Stanley, earl of Derby, attended by Thomas Docwra, lord-prior of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, Robert Radcliff, lord Fitz Walter, the lord Hastings, the lord Cobham, and sir Rice ap Thomas, captain of the light-horse. The second division was headed by the lord Herbert*, lord-chamberlain of the household, under whom served Piercy, earl of Northumberland, the earls of Kent and Wiltshire, the lords Audley and Delewar, the barons Carew and Curson, with many other knights and gentlemen. This division consisted of six thousand men.

About the thirtieth of June Henry set sail in person for Calais, with about four hundred ships in his company, commanded by Hopton, gentleman-porter to the bed-chamber, for the lord-admiral, Thomas Howard, was then employed in the North against the Scots. Upon his arrival at Calais he was complimented by the ambassadors of the emperor, the dukes of Savoy, and the duke of Brunswick. The troops which Henry brought over with him, and which formed the third division of his army, consisted of about twelve thousand men; the vanguard was commanded by Charles Brandon, viscount Lisle, and Henry Bouchier, earl of Essex; the centre by the king himself, under whom served Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, sir Edward Poynings, and sir Henry Guilford as standard-bearer. As to the rear-guard it seemed rather for parade than use, being chiefly composed of retainers belonging to the two great churchmen who waited upon Henry in this expedition, Fox, the old bishop of Winchester, and the rising favourite, Wolsey. The English army had also a noble train of artillery, among which the French historians mention a very fine set of cannon called the Twelve Apostles. The king, considering how far the river Thames was exposed to insults from foreign enemies, gave orders before his departure for erecting a platform of cannon at Gravesend, and another opposite to it on the Essex shore, where Tilbury Fort now stands.

Henry remained some days at Calais, attending the success of the siege of Terouenne, under the earl of Shrewsbury and lord Herbert. These generals sent advice that the duke of Longueville was on his march to relieve the place, upon which Henry hastened to the siege, and arrived before the town on the fourth of August. A few days after the emperor desired a conference with the king, between Aire and Terouenne, after which Maximilian served in the English camp as a volunteer, and even submitted to receive pay for his service, his avaricious and selfish views leading him to any means, however despicable, to compass his designs. The duke of Longueville approaching Terouenne, the king passed the Lys with the main body of his army, and an engagement ensued, which was but of short duration, for the French, without any motive to be assigned for their conduct, made a precipitate retreat, particularly the cavalry, which gave occasion to the calling this skirmish the Battle of the Spurs†. The principal officers, endeavouring in vain to rally their forces, chose to surrender themselves prisoners of war than follow this shameful example. After the battle, the besieged, despairing of succours, surrendered at discretion, and, on the twenty-fourth of August, the king entered the city, attended by the emperor and his illustrious prisoners, the duke Longueville, the chevalier Bayard, and other French officers of distinction. By some secret agreement between the king and the emperor, to whom Henry seems destined to be the eternal dupe, the city was delivered into the hands of the latter, who ordered it to be razed to the foundation; which shews that he did not submit to serve as a volunteer in the English army, but in hopes of an ample reward; and it is more than probable, that the flattering Henry's vanity at his first appearance in the field, by doing him this signal honour, procured him the cession of Terouenne, to the surprize of every one.

The next place Henry resolved to attack was Tournay, which at this time was in a weak and defenceless state; and while the preparations were making for this siege, the king went to Lisle to pay a visit to Margaret of Austria, who governed the Low Countries. He staid with her three days, and then joined his army on its march to Tournay; and soon after the emperor left the king, upon some disgust: so that what most historians have asserted, that the siege of Tournay was undertaken through the emperor's intrigues seems entirely groundless, especially as Tournay appeared to be an easy conquest, the garrison being thin and ill provided; whereas Boulogne, which they imagined he would have attacked, if he had considered his own interests before those of the emperor, was well fortified and had a strong garrison. Tournay surrendered in a few days after the king appeared before it; and on the fifteenth of September the king entered the city, having granted very favourable terms to the inhabitants. It being resolved in a council of war to keep this place, the king appointed sir Edward Poynings governor, and gave him a strong garrison: and, some time after, he gave the administration of the bishopric to Wolsey, the French prelate having refused to swear fealty to him.

The day after the king entered Tournay, Margaret of Austria, attended by the archduke Charles, her nephew, for whom she held the government of the Netherlands, paid a visit to the English monarch, to congratulate him on the success of his arms. For several days the king entertained his guests with the diversions of those times, as tilts, tournaments, running at the ring, &c. and, amidst all these amusements, a treaty was set on foot between Henry and the emperor, on the part of his grand-son Charles: by this treaty, which the king signed at Lille, the emperor agreed "to keep a strong force in Artois and Hainault, for the joint defence of Tournay and of the Low Countries during the winter; and Henry, on his part, agreed to pay for the maintenance of these troops the sum of two hundred thousand crowns. It was also agreed, that Henry should carry the war into Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy, before the first of June, 1514, and that the emperor should attack some other province of France: and that, before the fifteenth of May in the same year, the emperor, Margaret, Charles, the king and queen of England, and the princess Mary of England, should meet at Calais, to celebrate the nuptials of the archduke with the princess Mary, pursuant to the treaty concluded by the emperor and the late king of England."

Having thus settled the operations of the ensuing year, the king prepared to return to England. In the mean time Ferdinand, thinking his credit was still good with the king, sent an ambassador to him, with proposals for a new treaty: but he was no longer attended to; for, on the seventeenth of October, the king left Lille, and, on the twenty-fourth of the same month, arrived safely in England, highly satisfied with the success of his first campaign.

It is now necessary to take a view of the transactions of Lewis, in opposition to the dangers he was threatened with from every quarter. The misfortunes of the campaign in Italy, joined to the progress of the English arms, and an invasion of the Swiss, threw his affairs into so desperate a situation, that he was obliged to compound with the Swiss army, already entered into Burgundy, for the sum of four hundred thousand crowns, and to think of a reconciliation with the pope; as the first step towards which he renounced the council of Pisa, which was now grown very thin; and Leo X. not having any personal enmity to him, this measure soon effected a reconciliation. This renunciation was solemnly made in the tenth session of the council of Lateran, in the month of December, 1513, and effectually took away all pretext from the kings of England and Arragon for levying war against him. The pope, being reconciled to Lewis, wrote a letter to Henry, wherein he referred to one he had sent him on his accession to the pontificate, exhorting him to peace, which exhortation was now strongly urged and enforced, as Henry had avowedly taken up arms for the defence and support of the church, which he had happily accomplished by his victories, and therefore it was reasonable he should lay down his arms. This second letter effectually undeceived Henry, who had been so long blind to his own interest; he now plainly saw that all the allies, himself excepted, having accomplished the particular designs for which they had engaged him in a war with France, were now determined to leave the whole weight of it upon him; the consequence of which was, that Henry from that instant formed a resolution to conclude a peace with France, without so much as consulting his perfidious allies.

The king's foreign affairs being thus happily settled, his next care was to put an end to the war with Scotland, which, during his absence, had declared itself against England, under pretence of an ancient alliance with France, which obliged that nation to assist France whenever the king of England should invade that country. The war with England was carried in the Scottish parliament by a great majority, but not without a warm and sensible opposition from those who had the true interest of their country at heart; but the French interest, and their money prevailed. However, to preserve some form of decency, James wrote Henry a letter, which was delivered to him at the siege of Terouenne: it contained complaints of sundry grievances, demanding immediate redress, and threatening a declaration of war if he did not desist from his designs against France. Henry's answer was delayed, on account of the siege, till the twelfth of August, and it is probable that he saw from the contents of James's letter, that it was mere matter of form, and that no answer that could be given would divert the king of Scotland from taking this favourable opportunity of invading England, for which he had been making such considerable preparations before the king passed over to France. Henry, in his answer, warmly reproached the king of Scotland for entering into a war with England on so frivolous a pretext as that of assisting France; he set before him the fate of the king of Navarre, who had just been deprived of his dominions for engaging unnecessarily in the quarrels of France; at the same time assuring him, that he had received such early intelligence of his base designs, that he had taken care to provide for the security of England against all his attempts, before he quitted it; and he concluded with vowing revenge on every occasion.

It is plain that James had no serious intention of accommodating his differences with Henry by means of the letter he wrote him; for, without waiting for an answer, he took the field in August, and entered Northumberland at the head of sixty thousand men. The first place he took of any note was Norham castle, which surrendered to him after a siege of six days. The earl of Surry, pursuant to the king's commission before he went to France, had levied an army of twenty thousand men, and was then in Yorkshire; with this army he immediately marched to meet the Scots, and on the fourth of September, having advanced near enough, he sent to offer battle to the king of Scotland, who answered the herald, that he would accept it in three days. The herald, on his return, reported, that the king of Scotland was encamped in a very advantageous advantageous situation on the ridge of Mount Cheviot; that there was but one narrow field by which to approach him, and that all the ordnance were placed at the foot of the hill to defend this pass. On this representation, the earl of Surry changed his resolution, and determined not to give the Scots battle till they should quit this situation. The English army not appearing on the day appointed, the king held a council of war, in which an old nobleman advised him to retire to Scotland with his booty, telling him that he had done enough to fulfil his engagements with France; and that it was not prudent to hazard a battle with the English in their own country; and that, in serving France, Scotland was not to be neglected merely to please the French ambassador, who wanted others to undertake hazardous enterprizes to relieve his master from his present difficulties. This prudent advice was over-ruled, and the king determined to take the first favourable opportunity of giving battle to the English. In the mean time the earl of Surry, in order to draw the king from his advantageous post, marched his forces along a river which separated the two armies, and made a feint to enter Scotland by way of Carlisle, the river leading to that city. James, observing this motion, set fire to his camp, and marched his troops along the opposite side of the river: the wind happening to drive the smoke directly in the faces the Scots, the earl of Surry took advantage of this happy circumstance, and forded the river almost unperceived, which obliged the king of Scotland to draw up his army in great confusion, and possess himself as fast as possible of a place called Floddon Field: to add to the earl of Surry's good fortune, king James's army was greatly lessened by desertion; for many, disliking the removal of the camp, and approving the advice given by some of the nobles, and by the queen, of returning to Scotland, had absolutely followed it, with the forces under their command; of this number were the earls of Angus and Hume†. In this situation the earl of Surry attacked him, and, after a very sharp and well-fought battle, the English army gained the victory; but as the battle continued till night, and the slaughter was very great on both sides*, the English were not sensible of their success till the next morning, when they found themselves masters of the field. The circumstances of this battle are variously reported, the event alone remains indisputable; for which reason we shall only add, that on all hands it is acknowledged that king James fought with great bravery, and often refused to retire when pressed to it on account of his personal danger: whether he fell in the battle, or was slain afterwards by treachery, still remains undecided; however, a dead body, supposed to be that of the late Scottish king, was found, and conveyed to London in a leaden coffin, where it remained for some time unburied, till Henry had obtained permission from the pope to have the funeral rites performed, his holiness having excommunicated him for taking part with France, in opposition to the church. James IV. had made a will before he took the field, in consequence of which, on his demise, his queen Margaret was made regent during the minority of his eldest son, who was but two years old when his father lost his life. He was immediately acknowledged king, by the name of James V. and the queen-mother, who was Henry of England's sister, wrote a letter to her brother, on his return from France, to desire him not to pursue the war during her regency; in consequence of which the king ordered the earl of Surry to withdraw his forces, and the affairs of Scotland gave him no farther trouble at this time.

It has already been observed, that Henry, towards the close of the year 1513, had taken a resolution to enter into a treaty of peace with France, and as the remainder of this year affords nothing worthy of notice in England, the time being passed away in continual rejoicings and amusements, on account of the king's late victories, it will be proper to consider the state of affairs abroad, that we may form a better idea of the peace with France, which took place in the following year.

After Lewis was reconciled to the pope, and had procured him to write a letter to the king of England, recommending an accommodation with France, renewed the negotiation which had been begun at Lisle with the emperor, concerning the marriage of his daughter Renée with Charles of Austria. This gave the pope fresh uneasiness, as by this treaty Milan must have fallen into the hands of the French; and therefore he joined with the Swiss in labouring to settle the family of the Sforzas in that duchy. The chief aim of the Venetians was to obtain an honourable peace with the emperor, which they despaired of, in this case, without the assistance of France, which was not to be expected, unless they agreed to assist Lewis in recovering Genoa and the duchy of Milan. The emperor, on his part, had no inclination for peace, the war having been carried on to his advantage against the Venetians at the expence of his allies: and as for Ferdinand, it was his desire to embroil the affairs of Italy as much as possible, that he might thereby remain in quiet possession of Navarre: with this view he was constantly changing sides, and, to gain time, equally deceiving all parties. His truce with France being expired, he renewed it for another year: and the pope, alarmed at the negotiation between the emperor and Lewis, endeavoured to reconcile the latter with the Swiss, and the emperor with the Venetians, that the French might not get footing again in Italy; but all his attempts proved unsuccessful, for, after a long negotiation, the Venetians and the emperor chose him arbiter of their disputes, and he pronounced a provisional decree, "that a truce should immediately † Smollet says the Scottish army was diminished near one half, and that the English were now superior in number; but his whole account of this transaction widely differs from all other historians, whether English or Scottish.

* Hall says, there were fifteen hundred English, and twelve thousand Scots slain, fol. 43. According to Buchanan, there fell above five thousand Scots. In this battle the vanguard was led by the lord Thomas Howard, who had with him the lords Clifford, Conyers, Latimer, Scrope of Upsale, Lumley, Ogle; sir Nicholas Appleyard, sir William Sidney, sir William Gascoyne, sir Stephen Bull, sir Henry Shirburne, &c.

The right wing was commanded by sir Edmund Howard, and the left by sir Marmaduke Constable. The rear was brought up by the earl of Surry himself, who was attended by the lord Scrope of Bolton, sir Philip Tilney, sir George Darcy, sir Thomas Berkeley, sir John Stanley, sir John Willoughby, &c. the lord Dacres, and sir Edward Stanley, with their horse, being appointed as a reserve. On the Scots side there fell one archbishop, two bishops, four abbots, twelve earls, and seventeen barons, with eight or ten thousand common soldiers. See a description of the battle in my lord Herbert, p. 18. Hall, fol. 38, &c. Stowe, p. 492.

take place: that the emperor should, by way of deposit or security, till the final decision of their dispute, put in his hands the town of Vincenza; and that the Venetians should do the same with respect to Crema, and should pay the emperor fifty thousand ducats: but that this provisional agreement should be null, if not ratified by both parties:” and the Venetians not ratifying it, the agreement was accordingly annulled. Nearly in this situation the affairs of the belligerent powers remained till the campaign of 1514.

On the third of January, this year, the parliament of England assembled, in which nothing of importance was transacted, except that the king created several peers; and amongst the rest he created the earl of Surry duke of Norfolk, thereby restoring him, for his good services, to the title which his father had lost with his life, in the defence of Richard III. at the battle of Bosworth*: by this change Thomas Howard, son and heir of the new duke, became earl of Surry. Charles Brandon, viscount Lisle, was now created duke of Suffolk; and Charles Somerset, lord Herbert, earl of Worcester: Margaret of York, daughter of the duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. obtained at the same time the title of countess of Salisbury, as heiress to the earl of Warwick, her brother, beheaded by Henry VII†. Wolsey was, during this session, promoted to the bishopric of Lincoln by the pope, and admitted to retain the administration of the bishopric of Tournay: so sensible was the pope of the value of such a friend in the English court.

In the mean time the negotiation with France was in great forwardness; but was carried on with great secrecy, no person being made acquainted with it but Wolsey; and the whole transaction was managed, on the part of Lewis, by the duke of Longueville, who was taken prisoner at the Battle of the Spurs, and who had a secret commission appointing him the king of France’s ambassador extraordinary on this occasion. As soon as all the preliminaries were settled, Lewis sent over two public ambassadors, and a cessation of hostilities immediately took place, and, after some little obstructions, three definitive treaties were signed on the seventh day of August.

The first treaty stipulated,

“That the peace should subsist till the demise of one of the parties; and that the successor should give notice to the survivor, within twelve months, if he intended to renew the treaty.

“That all impositions laid on the merchandize of the subjects of either crown within the preceding fifty-two years, should be abolished.

“That rebellious subjects should not be harbooured or protected by either party.

“That the peace should not be deemed violated by any private tumults or disorders that might arise on either side.

“That each should defend the dominions of the other when attacked, at the expence of the crown that should demand assistance, provided the attack should be made in consequence of this treaty, in which Scotland was included, on condition no hostilities were committed by that kingdom against England after the twenty-fifth of November.”

The second treaty was a contract of marriage between Lewis and the princess Mary, Henry’s sister, who had been solemnly contracted to Charles of Austria, but that prince not appearing at Calais at the time appointed for the solemnization of the marriage, by the treaty of Lisle, Henry now thought proper to give her to Lewis, who had lately buried his queen. It was agreed by this treaty,

“That the marriage between Lewis and the princess Mary should be contracted by proxies, in ten days after the signing of the treaty.

“That the princess should be conducted to Abbeville at the expence of the king of England; and that Lewis should consummate the marriage in four days after her arrival.

“That the princess Mary’s dower should be four hundred thousand crowns, one half of which should be laid out in jewels; and in case of recovery, that Lewis should only be obliged to restore the jewels: the other half was to be paid by acquittal of so much of the sum of one million of crowns which Lewis agreed to pay to Henry by the third treaty, in which he acknowledged,

“That, by the treaty of Estaples, Charles VIII. was bound to pay to Henry VII. or his successors, the sum of seven hundred and forty-five thousand crowns, and that he was obliged to pay the arrears of that sum.

“Also that Charles, duke of Orleans, his father, by an obligation dated in March, 1444, appeared to be indebted to Margaret, duchess of Somerset, grand-mother to Henry VIII. wherefore these two sums remaining still unpaid, by this treaty Lewis bound himself to pay to the king of England, or his successors, a million of crowns, by half yearly payments till the whole was discharged‡.”

Thus the war between France and England was ended on very advantageous terms for Henry, who had suffered himself to be drawn into it by the superior policy of his allies. Before the second treaty was signed, it was judged necessary for the princess to declare, in presence of two notaries, that she had been betrothed to Charles of Austria without her consent; that Charles, on his part, had failed in the performance of his promise to be contracted to her by proxy, as soon as she attained the age of fourteen; and that his counsellors and confederates had lately inspired him with enmity against her brother, the king of England; on which accounts she deemed the intended marriage with him null and void, and that she was at full liberty to marry the king of France: which marriage was accordingly consummated at Abbeville, in the month of October, without so much as demanding a dispensation from the pope to absolve the princess from her former contract.

* For his memorable victory over the Scots at Flodden, he had a special grant from the king, to himself and the heirs male of his body, of an honourable augmentation to his arms; namely, to bear on the bend thereof the upper half of a red lion (painted as the arms of Scotland are) pierced through the mouth with an arrow. He was created duke of Norfolk, Feb. 1, 1514. His father derived his descent (by the heirs male of Mowbray, and Seagrave) from Thomas Brotherton, son to king Edward I. This sir Richard was made chief-gentleman of the bed-chamber to prince Arthur, and knight of the most noble order of the garter. He had four sons by the lady Margaret; Henry, afterwards lord Montague, Geoffrey, Arthur, and Reginald, the famous cardinal Pole, archbishop of Canterbury, and one of the three that presided at the council of Trent.

‡ Rymer, vol. xiii. p. 423—439.

While Wolsey was engaged in this important negotiation, cardinal Bambridge, archbishop of York, was poisoned at Rome, by Rinaldo de Modena, his chaplain, in revenge for a blow he had given him. Notice was sent to the king of his death by cardinal Julius de Medici, afterwards pope Clement VII. acquainting him at the same time, that he had prevailed on the pope to keep the see of York vacant till the king's pleasure was known. Upon this the king demanded the archbishopric for Wolsey, which was readily granted. The remainder of this year affords little matter of any consequence, except the intrigues of the emperor and Ferdinand, who laboured to the last to prevent the peace between England and France, and to obstruct its good effects. As to domestic affairs, the king enjoyed perfect tranquility, and spent his time in his usual diversions.

On the first day of the following year, 1515, died Lewis XII. leaving behind him the glorious character of Father of his Country. But the death of this prince made no alteration in Henry's affairs, for the count d'Angoulesme, who succeeded him by the name of Francis I. plainly discovered his intention of pursuing the plan of his predecessor, by adding to his other titles that of duke of Milan. By this event Lewis's young queen was left mistress of her person, and accordingly she took care to prevent any future disposal of it to answer political ends, for she privately married Charles Brandon, the newly created duke of Suffolk. Her affection for this accomplished nobleman was so well known, even before her marriage with Lewis, that when she went over to France, the count d'Angoulesme took care to have her narrowly watched, lest she should give the king an heir to his exclusion. Henry, suspecting her design, wrote to her, in February, not to dispose of herself without his consent; but the queen, trusting to her interest with her brother, thought proper to give her hand to her beloved Brandon, and to write to the king what she had done, taking the whole blame to herself: and though Henry was displeased at first, in a short time he was reconciled, and they returned to the English court.

As England was now free from all foreign and domestic disputes, the parliament, which met on the fifth of February this year, was wholly employed in enacting some wholesome and beneficial laws respecting the civil and commercial interests of the nation, of which in their proper place.

About the middle of March this year, Francis I. sent instructions to his ambassador at London to renew the alliance with Henry, as also the bond for a million of crowns signed by Lewis. And in the month of May king Ferdinand sent an ambassador to London, to propose the renewal of his alliance with Henry, and to court his friendship; but Henry had been so often deceived by him, that the ambassador was received very coldly, and probably would never have succeeded in his negotiations, had not Wolsey been brought to favour his master's interest, and to bring about a reconciliation, which he effected in the month of October.

While these things were transacting at home, Charles, archduke of Austria, had assumed the government of the Low Countries, and had made a treaty with Francis I. which a little alarmed Henry, who had reason to fear his resenting the disposal of the princess Mary to another, when she had been contracted to him in his minority: the king therefore sent two ambassadors to Brussels to palliate his conduct, and solicit the friendship of Charles; but they were very ill received, and no notice was taken of the subject of their embassy for several months: the young archduke prudently declined entering into any party, till he saw more of the intentions of the other powers, and particularly of Francis I. who began to make preparations for carrying on a new war in Italy. Indeed, as soon as he ascended the throne, he declared that he would expel the Sforzas from the duchy of Milan, and annex that duchy to the crown of France. As he was a prince possessed of equal valour and ambition, the eyes of all parties were turned upon him, and Ferdinand began to prepare for the defence of Naples and Navarre: but he might have been relieved from his fears for the present, by a renewal of the truce which Francis proposed to him, on condition that he would remain neuter in the affairs of Milan; however, Ferdinand was so accustomed to deceive others, that he could not rely on Francis, and therefore rejected his proposal, and made use of it to engage the emperor and the Swiss to join with him in the defence of Milan; thereby to divert Francis from any thoughts of turning his arms against Navarre, whilst he saw himself likely to be so strongly opposed in his attempt to recover Milan, that it was necessary to employ all his strength in that quarter. The emperor readily entered into a league with Ferdinand, and the Swiss were at last prevailed upon, though with much difficulty, for the French had a party amongst them; but the allies agreeing to pay them thirty thousand ducats monthly, they signed the treaty in conjunction with Ferdinand, the emperor, and Sforza, duke of Milan.

Ferdinand having gained this point, engaged them to attack Francis in his own kingdom, as the shortest way to divert him from any attempts on Milan; and he promised on his part, to make a diversion on the side of Fontarabia, while they should attack Burgundy: as for the emperor, he was to continue the war in the Venetian territories, to prevent their assisting Francis. The sole aim of Ferdinand in this confederacy being, at all events, to secure Navarre, he no sooner learned that Francis was marching his forces towards the Alps, in order to enter the duchy of Milan, than he disbanded the army he had raised for the defence of Navarre, leaving Milan to the care of the Swiss; and so very deceitful was he in this, as in all his other treaties of alliance, that even his army in Italy, under the command of the vice-roy of Naples, had no orders to assist the Swiss, while on the other hand, the emperor and the pope, who had been included in the league, remained totally inactive, and the Swiss were left alone to sustain the burden of the war, in the same manner as Henry had been served a few years before.

Francis having successfully marched his army through a defile between mount Viso and mount Cenis, which, being deemed an impracticable pass, had been left unguarded, the Swiss retired precipitately to Milan, and the French advanced to the same city: a negotiation was then set on foot for engaging the Swiss to withdraw their forces, in consideration of a certain sum of money offered them by Francis; but a reinforcement of fifteen thousand of their countrymen arriving, it was was resolved, by the advice of cardinal Sion, to attack the French, who were encamped at Marignano, and little expected them. This resolution cost them dear, for they lost ten thousand men in the action, and were totally defeated; the remainder of the army returned home, and Francis made himself master of the duchy of Milan: as to Maximilian Sforza, the late duke, he had shut himself up in the citadel of Milan, which he was obliged to surrender on capitulation, and agree to retire to France, there to reside as a private gentleman. In the mean time Octavian Fregosa had reduced Genoa to the obedience of France, and instead of a doge declared himself governor for the king his master.

The popes, when they chanced to make leagues or undertake wars that did not prosper, could always find a way to extricate themselves in quality of head of the church and vicar of Jesus Christ. Leo X. had been in hopes that Francis would never be able to enter Italy, and joined in the league against him so privately, that Francis knew nothing of it till he came to Vercell; but his holiness no sooner received tidings of the victory of Marignano, than he made proposals of reconciliation to Francis; and though the pontiff's behaviour had been such that he deserved no favour from that victorious prince, yet he obtained however advantages which he could scarcely have expected, had he even been his friend from the beginning.

As the Scots had been comprehended in the renewal of the late treaty between Francis and Henry, it will be proper to attend the history of that people, so far as it is connected with that of England. James IV. who was slain in the battle of Flodden, had left one only son his successor, who was not as yet two years of age; but, soon after his death, his queen was delivered of a posthumous child. She had been by his will declared regent of the kingdom, and the surviving nobility had submitted to her authority, which, however, was but of short duration; for giving her hand to Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus, the party which opposed that nobleman, headed by the earl of Hume, persuaded the states to bestow the regency on John Stuart, duke of Albany, son of Alexander, duke of Albany, brother to James III. who, having died in France, where he took refuge †, left his title to this son, a young nobleman of great abilities, and warmly devoted to the interests of Lewis XII. who had distinguished him with many marks of favour and regard. Lewis XII. dying during these transactions, Francis I. his successor, having great reasons not to disoblige the king of England, who violently opposed the election of the duke of Albany, would not suffer that nobleman to depart till he had compleated his treaty with Henry, so that he did not arrive in Scotland before the eighth of May this year; and the first act of his government upon record, was on the twenty-second of the same month, when, as regent and protector of Scotland, he confirmed the accession of the Scots to the late treaty between France and England †.

Francis I. from the instant of his accession to the crown of France, had formed the design of getting Tournay out of the hands of the English; for this purpose he had made some overtures to Henry, but the English monarch demanding some places in exchange which Francis thought above an equivalent, the negociation was dropped. The truth is, that Wolsey, fearful, if this compromise should take place, he should lose the valuable administration of that bishopric, had persuaded Henry, who was wholly governed by his advice, to stand upon such terms as the minister knew must frustrate the design: and by his instigation, twelve hundred carpenters and masons were sent over this year, with three hundred other labourers, for making some additional works to the town; and orders were transmitted to the lord Mountjoy, the governor, to be in a particular manner upon his guard to prevent a surprize, which Wolsey affected to fear on the part of the French king.

Francis, nettled at this proceeding, persuaded the pope (Leo X.) who durst not disoblige him, to reinstate Guillard, the former bishop of Tournay, in that see; a bull was accordingly issued for that purpose, and obtained before Wolsey knew any thing of the matter. This mandate gave great offence both to Henry and his favourite, who thus saw himself deprived of a very lucrative office: but Francis, who had never an intention to break entirely with Wolsey, whose friendship was so necessary to him about Henry's person, endeavoured to appease the powerful prelate by promising to exert his utmost efforts to procure him a cardinal's hat, which he knew to be the principal object of his ambition.

Wolsey before this had made several advances to obtain that honour: upon the death of cardinal Bambridge, archbishop of York, he had employed Adrian de Castello, who was bishop of Bath, and collector for the pope in England, to be his agent in this affair; but de Castello, instead of promoting, had betrayed Wolsey's interest, which when the latter knew, he was so exasperated, that he threw Polydore Virgil, the historian, who was sub-collector in England to Castello, into the Tower, from whence he was with great difficulty afterwards released, though not till Wolsey had obtained the cardinal's hat, which Francis at this time actually procured him*; but the haughty prelate looked upon the favour as due to his merit, and, instead of shewing himself grateful to Francis, he still retained an implacable hatred against him, on account of the affair of Tournay, and did all he could, not only to exasperate Henry, but to promote a general league in Europe against him.

Henry's cabinet-council was at this time composed of Wolsey; Fox, the old bishop of Winchester; the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk; and Warham, archbishop of Canterbury: the four latter, though extremely devoted to the king, made the interest of their country the governing principle of all their councils, and were desirous that the king might husband both his treasure and his reputation. As Francis had hitherto behaved with seeming good faith towards England, they saw no reason for indulging so bitter a spirit against France, and accordingly opposed the cardinal in the council, when he was labouring to prove that it was the interest of England to humble the French monarch: at the same time they advised the king rather to turn his arms against Scotland, where the French party, under the duke of Albany, prevailed over the interest of his sister.

Wolsey, impatient of controul, and holding it for a maxim, "that those who were not with, must be against him," resented this opposition so much, that he never ceased till he had alienated the king's favour and countenance from the honest counsellors, who were not long before they perceived the change, nor much at a loss to divine the cause: they for some time, however, kept their sentiments to themselves; but at last old Winchester's patience forsook him, at beholding a creature of his own rearing, over-top himself and every one at court, and sought leave to retire to his bishopric, which was easily granted him: however, before he left the council-board, he told the king in his blunt way, "that he hoped he would not suffer the servant to be greater than the master." "Fear not, my good lord bishop (replied Henry), it shall be my care that subjects shall obey, and not command." An answer which stung Fox to the quick, who now hastened his departure for his diocese. He was followed in his resignation by the duke of Norfolk, who likewise withdrew from a court where he perceived he was looked upon as little better than a cypher. The duke of Suffolk soon after applying for the remission of a large sum of money he had borrowed from the crown, to support the great figure he had made in France, was violently opposed in his suit by Wolsey, upon which he also retired from court.

But there yet remained a formidable rival at the council-board, who must be removed before Wolsey could completely carry his point; this was Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, a prelate of approved disinterestedness and prudence, who had never indeed entered into any court intrigues, but, being possessed of the great seal as chancellor, he was often uneasy to Wolsey; but the latter not daring to push at him in a violent manner, compassed his ends in another way, and managed so as to oblige Warham to resign the great seal.

Since his promotion to the dignity of cardinal he had become more vain, proud, and imperious than ever; but the chief stress of his arrogance was levelled against Warham: to mortify whom, he this year got himself appointed legate a latere from the pope, which gave him precedency in the province of the archbishop of Canterbury; and being thus empowered to have the legatine cross borne before him, he caused that of York to be also carried erect along with it. We have spoken elsewhere of the contest between the two sees, which, after having caused violent quarrels, could not be decided but by the king's express commands to the archbishops of York not to have the cross carried before them in the other province; but Wolsey, who thought himself much above his predecessors, prepared to revive the contest in contempt of these prohibitions, and made such other encroachments upon the archbishop in his ecclesiastical capacity, as left him little better than a cypher at court. Warham, who was of a peaceable temper, seeing the most valuable rights and privileges of his primacy trampled upon by this insolent minister, and knowing that if he should attempt to oppose him, he should not succeed, by reason of the absolute sway the other had over the king, he resigned the great seal into Henry's hands, who, two days after, committed it to the custody of Wolsey, whom he enabled to support his increasing dignity with continual benefactions of prebends, wardships, and other perquisites. Besides the revenues of his archiepiscopal see, and the office of chancellor, he farmed at a low rate the bishoprics of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, possessed by Italians, who were allowed to reside abroad, and who were glad to purchase this indulgence by parting with a considerable share of their profits.

Wolsey being now rid of every check upon his conduct, pursued his favourite project of being revenged upon Francis I. by setting the king his master at variance with him, and causing him to enter into a league against France. Having properly prepared Henry by repeated insinuations of the danger of letting France grow too powerful, he privately acquainted the emperor Maximilian, that it would not be difficult to disengage his master from his connexion with Francis; and in the mean time he persuaded Henry to renew the alliance between Spain and England, notwithstanding the treachery and deceit with which Ferdinand of Arragon had formerly behaved.

As to Maximilian, he was overjoyed at this proposal: he had for some time been apprehensive that the balance of power must be ruined in Italy by the success of Francis, unless he could raise him up a competitor for the duchy of Milan; the present conjuncture appeared most favourable to his project, and he dispatched an ambassador to London, to solicit succours for Francis Sforza, who now resided in Germany, and had borne the title of duke of Milan ever since the captivity of his elder brother.

Notwithstanding all the arrogance of Wolsey, he saw many difficulties offer themselves to the carrying on his designs; but he obviated them all by that politic dissimulation which served him so effectually through the whole course of his administration: he desired Henry not to rely wholly on his advice, but to summon a general council, and take the opinions of the ablest statesmen of the kingdom; at the same time he was sure that his sovereign was already so prepossessed by the force of the arguments he had laid before him, that any opposition to his plan would only end in the confusion of those who should set themselves up against it.

A general council being summoned on this occasion, Wolsey opened the assembly with a long and laboured speech, in which he very roundly gave his opinion for a breach with France, and expatiated on the reasons which Henry had to be dissatisfied with that court; he in particular dwelt upon the protection which Francis had afforded to the duke of Albany, who, by French interest, had wrested the government of Scotland from a princess of the English blood; and, after many florid arguments, concluded with observing, that the daily successes of Francis, and the continual accretion of his power, were alone sufficient reasons for England to interpose to check the progress of those arms, which, in a short time, she might expect to see turned against herself. There was a strong opposition made to this belligerent scheme, drawn from the sacred nature of public faith, and of the engagements between Henry and Francis: but the bishop of Durham and some other new counsellors, introduced by the cardinal, declared themselves to be strongly of his opinion.

At last, the debate being over, Henry declared himself in favour of his minister's sentiments, but, in order to follow a middle course, added, "that he did not mean to plunge England into a war, but to raise work for France by supporting the Sforza family;" as, in all probability, had been suggested to him by his favourite and director. Agreeable to these views he empowered Richard Pace, his ambassador at the court of the emperor Maximilian, to treat with that sovereign and the duke of Milan on this subject, and in the mean time supplied them with a large sum of money.

Sforza was not ungrateful for this instance of Wolsey's friendship, as appears from an authentic note of hand given to Wolsey by Michael de Abbatis, secretary to the duke of Milan, for a pension of ten thousand ducats to the cardinal, as soon as his master should recover possession of his duchy*.

I must now, before we close the year 1515, briefly mention the affairs of Scotland, which likewise engaged the government's attention. We have already observed, that Alexander, duke of Albany, arrived in Scotland in the beginning of the year, where he found the kingdom involved in civil discord and dissention, which the king of England carefully fomented. As uncle to the infant James V. he assumed the title of Protector of the Scottish realm, and, by the connivance of the pope, filled the benefices with his own creatures.

The duke of Albany, though of Scottish extraction, was a stranger to Scotland, being born in the time of his father's banishment, nor could he so much as speak the country language: in this situation he was under a necessity to be guided by the counsels of others, natives of the kingdom; and he adopted those of Hepburn, bishop of Murray, a passionate and factious prelate, who having a dispute about his diocese with Fermor, archbishop of St. Andrew's, who was supported by the earl of Hume, he represented this nobleman so disadvantageously to the regent, that the latter treated him with manifest signs of coldness, and even contempt.

Hume, being naturally proud and haughty, was stung to the quick with Albany's behaviour, and resolved to let him see that he was not a person to be affronted with impunity: he directly reconciled himself to the queen dowager, and persuading her that the king her son was in danger, advised her to carry him over privately to England, and to throw both herself and the young monarch upon the protection of Henry. The queen, alarmed for the safety of her son, gave into the advice of Hume, and had actually got as far as Stirling with the infant king on their way southward, when Albany, having received intelligence of their design, suddenly surprized them both: however, he shewed so much regard for the queen of Scotland, as to leave her at liberty to retire into England, which she did this year, with her husband the earl of Angus; but the person of the young monarch was by Albany delivered to the care of noblemen of the greatest distinction and nearest relation to the crown. As for Hume, he, with the earl of Arran, a nobleman allied to his family, made his escape into England; whereupon the regent sent ambassadors to Henry, to justify his conduct; and at the same time so artfully treated with the fugitives, that he prevailed with them to return into Scotland. In the mean time the queen of Scotland was delivered of a daughter at Harbottle castle, in Northumberland, who was christened by the name of Margaret.

The beginning of the year 1516 was distinguished by the death of the famous Ferdinand, king of Arragon, by which event the crown of Spain of course devolved upon prince Charles, whose mother Juanna remained still unfit for government. Wolsey, to his great mortification, now saw his measures broke, for engaging all Europe in a war with France; for a division happening in the councils of the young prince of Spain, and a dispute about the regency of Castile during his minority, de Chievres, his governor, who had a great ascendant over him, and always inclined to the French party, persuaded Charles to take no manner of concern in the affairs of Europe until those of his own territories were settled. Nothing remarkable passed in England in the beginning of the year 1516, except the birth of a princess, of whom the queen was delivered on the eighteenth day of February, at Greenwich, and who was afterwards the infamous queen Mary.

It was not without reason that Maximilian had readily embraced the opportunity offered him by cardinal Wolsey, of making war upon France: there was no more likelihood of his being able to keep his conquests in the state of Venice, since Francis I. was become master of the Milanese, and had joined forces with the Venetians; nor could he expect any farther assistance from the pope, who had lately made his peace with the French king; he therefore found he should be obliged to act alone in Italy: but first he tried to cajole Henry, by offering to invest him with the duchy of Milan, and then to resign the imperial diadem in his favour, and put him in possession of the empire. At the same time he delivered to Pace, Henry's ambassador at his court, a plan for executing his project, in which it was proposed, "that the king of England should cross the sea with two thousand horse and four thousand archers, and march through the Low Countries to Triers, where Maximilian was to meet him, with the electors and other German princes, and the resignation of the empire was to be accomplished, and the investiture of Milan granted. An army, raised in the empire, was to be there assembled, ready to enter France on that side, on being joined by one thousand English horse and three thousand archers, under the duke of Suffolk, or some other general of equal quality; whilst Henry, with a thousand horse and as many archers, and another body of German troops, should pass through the Austrian territories, and the country of the Grisons, to the lake of Como, and so to Milan; from whence, matters being thus settled, Maximilian was to attend him to Rome, where he should be crowned emperor †."

Whatever ambition Henry had in his nature, he had too good a judgment to accept of this glaring proposal: he was by this time perfectly well acquainted with Maximilian, and therefore, thanking him for his offer, he desired he would defer the execution of his scheme to a more favourable opportunity, and in the mean time gratified him with a sum of money, which was the real object of the emperor's pursuit, who was so eager for driving the French out of Italy, that he employed this money in raising an army of about twenty thousand Germans and Swiss, with which, in the month of March, he entered the state of Venice, while the Venetians, assisted by a body of French troops, commanded by Lautrec, were besieging Brescia. Upon his approach the French and Venetians raised the siege, and, after making a shew of opposing his passage of the rivers Mincio, Oglio, and Adda, retired to Milan to avoid a battle. Then the emperor approached Milan without much difficulty; but thirteen thousand Swiss arriving at the same time, on the other side of the town, to the assistance of the French, Maximilian saw his enterprize was impracticable; and having reason, from some intercepted letters, to apprehend a conspiracy was formed for seizing his person, he decamped with great precipitation, and repassed the Adda. The French, pushing the Imperialists in their retreat, cut off numbers of them, while still greater numbers were daily deserting. Maximilian, abandoning all his conquests, retired with the utmost expedition into the Trentin, and the French in a few days took Brescia. All this happened before the twenty-seventh of May, when the ambassador Pace sent advice of the successes of the French; but their career was then stopped, being repulsed with loss in several attacks upon Verona, and forced to raise the siege of that place upon the approach of count William de Roquendorf, one of Maximilian's generals.

Whilst the emperor was endeavouring to embroil the French affairs, Francis was forming a new project for the conquest of Naples, and tried to render the pope propitious to his undertaking; but Leo wished for nothing so eagerly as the expulsion of the French from Italy, and, forgetting all his obligations to Francis, laboured to make the best of the present posture of affairs, and, while he amused the king of France with vague negotiations, exerted all his endeavours in private to traverse his designs.

Maximilian still seemed determined to pursue the war, and make another expedition into Italy. It was with this view, and in the hopes of getting more money from England, that he sent the cardinal of Sion thither, to apologize for his late retreat from the Milanese, and to propose a new alliance. The cardinal acted his part so well, that he once more brought Henry to trust his court; and, on the twentieth of October this year, the plan of a new treaty was formed for the defence of holy church, and for restraining the unbounded ambition of certain princes. The young king of Spain and his mother were parties in this treaty, as were likewise the cantons of Switzerland. The heads of the treaty now concluded were as follow:

"I. That the confederates should defend one another, and bring aid by land, at their own cost, being required, within one month after complaint against the enemy.

"II. If the enemy have not port-towns, &c. then the war should also be made by sea by them both, and the fleet supplied if it be diminished, &c.

"III. That no peace shall be made with the enemy, or truce, but by mutual consent.

"IV. Place also was left for other princes whatsoever, to come into this league within eight months, by consent of all the confederates.

"V. That pope Leo X. shall be comprized in this league, if he will excommunicate the persons and states that shall molest the confederates, and that he enter within six months.

"VI. That the Swiss shall be admitted if they will, so that they bind themselves not to serve under any other princes, and on that condition to have pensions."

This last article seems to have had no effect, since the king of France made, about the same time, a league with the whole Helvetic body (styled the Treaty of Perpetual Peace), in which, upon augmenting their pensions, the Swiss engaged never to assist any potentate against France.

As nothing in this league pointed directly against France, Francis took great care not to push Henry into any open breach; he even, on the fifth day of November, this year, punctually paid fifty thousand crowns, as stipulated by the late treaty with England; and now perceiving the insincerity of the pope, he dropped all thoughts of the conquest of Naples, and applied himself to gain over Charles, the young king of Spain. This latter, wisely resolving, if possible, in the infant state of his government, to live well with all, so as to be sure of the assistance of the one state, if he should be attacked by the other, agreed to open conferences at Noyon, de Boisi acting for the king of France, and de Chievres for the king of Spain. Each of those ministers had been tutor to his master, and was zealous for his interest. The conferences lasted thirteen days, and ended in a treaty, by which it was agreed, That Charles should marry mademoiselle Louisa, the daughter of Francis, instead of madame Renée, the late king's daughter; and that he should pay one hundred thousand crowns a year for the board of the young lady, who was but a year old, until she was marriageable. In consideration of this, Francis was to resign to Charles all his pretensions to the kingdom of Naples. By another article it was agreed, that Charles should, within six months, resign the kingdom of Navarre to Henry d'Albret, son of John d'Albret and Catherine, king and queen of Navarre, who had been dispossessed by Ferdinand; and in case he should not perform this article, Francis should be allowed to assist the king of Navarre*.

Soon after, the emperor, that mean, mercenary, timid, and inconstant prince, weary of his league with England, that brought him in no money, and afraid that Francis might interrupt his grandson Charles's journey into Spain, and thereby defeat the whole scheme of his succession, did, towards the end of this year, agree that a congress should be held at Bruges, and a treaty of peace with France was signed by his ministers at Cambray, in March following, by which, for the consideration of two hundred thousand ducats, Maximilian delivered up Verona into the hands of the French general, who immediately restored it to the Venetians.

The English court was not much alarmed at the treaty of Noyon: the discerning Wolsey plainly saw that Charles, by this treaty, meant nothing more than to gain time, by granting Francis whatever he could desire, for fear of being hindered by him from going to take possession of his dominions:

but the conduct of Maximilian was of a much more serious nature to England, and the cardinal now saw his whole system of politics dashed in pieces by a single blow. The emperor had, by his treaty with France, shut himself out of Italy, the promising alliance against France was vanished into smoke, and the great sums Henry had advanced appeared to have been uselessly squandered: in a word, England was obliged for some time to taste the sweets of peace, that most desirable of all states to a trading and a maritime power, such as she at this time began to be.

But it fared not so well with her sister kingdom, Scotland, where the Humes still continued to foment disturbances; and Henry, at their instigation, had, in the beginning of this year, wrote to the Scottish parliament, desiring that they would send back the duke of Albany to France, because it was not proper that the young king should be in the power of his presumptive heir; and he threatened, in case they should refuse to comply with this proposal, that he would take other measures for the preservation of his nephew. The parliament, in answer to this letter from Henry, sent a memorial, or, as they style it, "a refusal to the king of England, touching his advice to remove the duke of Albany from the government of the young king of Scotland," sealed with the seals of the chief nobility of the kingdom. In this paper, after some reasoning with Henry touching the nature of his demands, they tell him, that "the duke had been elected regent without one dissenting voice in all their parliament, whose ordinances and elections were not to be impugned by any person whatsoever*."

The Humes finding their scheme frustrated by the noble resolution of the parliament, persuaded Hamilton, earl of Arran, to claim the regency, as kinsman to the king, and in the mean time they levied troops to support his pretensions. The duke of Albany being informed of this conspiracy, marched against the earl of Arran, and in a few days reduced his castle of Hamilton; then the Humes, pulling off the mask, made themselves masters of Dunbar, which they demolished; but being defeated and taken in fight, they were brought to trial, and lost their lives and estates as traitors to their country. The regent having thus established his authority, acted with so much prudence that he preserved the affections of the Scots, and gained the esteem of Henry and his minister, notwithstanding all that the party of the queen dowager could do to hinder it; and, on the last day of December, 1516, Henry agreed to a truce with Scotland for one year.

The year 1517 affords very little business for the historian's pen in relation to affairs in England, which now enjoyed a profound peace, save that a sedition was raised by the London apprentices, on account of the great number of foreign tradesmen that had settled in England, on the great encouragement which cardinal Wolsey, who may truly be styled the father of revived learning in this country, gave to men of learning and abilities in the polite and mechanic arts. As those foreigners, at their first settlement, generally excelled the English in dexterity and application to their business, the shopkeepers and the lower set of artificers complained that their customers fell off, and that greater encouragement was given to foreigners than to the natives. From murmurings they came to acts of outrage, and many strangers were insulted and beaten upon the streets, until the government was obliged to interfere by issuing an order for all tradesmen to keep their apprentices and servants within doors from seven at night till nine in the morning: but the latter so ill brooked this restraint, that, on the evening of the thirtieth of April, they gathered in great numbers, broke open several prisons, set criminals at liberty, and pulled down the houses of foreigners. But they were suppressed in a few days, and many of them condemned to death: one Lincoln, a broker, their ringleader, with a few others, were actually executed; but all the rest, amounting to above four thousand, were pardoned at the intercession and by the advice of cardinal Wolsey.

This year England was visited with a return of that most dreadful epidemical disease, the sweating sickness. The effects were very sudden, for it proved fatal in three hours after the patient was affected. When it first began, Henry's court was extremely splendid and numerous, on account of the queen of Scotland's being in London upon a visit to her brother; but the dreadful havock which the sickness made, soon thinned it: that princess retired to Berwick with her husband; the law-terms were adjourned; and Henry, to keep as much as he could the infection from his family, reduced his officers and domestics to a very small number. It was computed, that in some towns half, and in others one third of the inhabitants, died of this dreadful distemper.

In the mean while Maximilian, finding his late conduct in Italy had reduced him very low in the esteem of the English court, sought to revive Henry's ambition by keeping him in hopes of the imperial dignity: what absurdities will not ambition and avarice lead men into! Though Henry had at first affected to decline this honour, it made an impression upon his mind; and now that the emperor had come into the Low Countries, to visit his grandson Charles, he dispatched the earl of Worcester and Dr. Cuthbert Tunstall to treat with Maximilian, and propose an interview; but when they came to press the point of resignation home to Maximilian, he shuffled in such a manner that the ambassadors plainly perceived that he had no design to part with the imperial crown, and that his proposal was no other than a plot to draw more money from the king their master. Of this they gave Henry notice, and Wolsey now dissuaded him from having any farther concern with Maximilian, or from the least trusting him, unless he should, by his actions, give some previous earnest of his sincerity; and, above all, he wisely and honestly put the king in mind of his father's maxim, "that the lesser dominion is always swallowed up in the greater," and that the dignity of an emperor of Germany must do great prejudice to the great figure which England then made.

And, indeed, it must be confessed, that Henry, through the management of the cardinal, was at this time in very high reputation all over Europe, as appears from the many letters, and other instruments, upon our public records, sent to the government of England during this pacific year, in particular an application from the pope and the whole college of cardinals, imploring a subsidy against the Turks, who had just defeated the sultan of the Mamelucks* in Egypt, and who, they observed, would certainly turn their arms next against the Christians; though it afterwards appeared, that the sole design of pope Leo was to enrich himself and his family with the spoils of Christendom.

* Rymer's Fœd. vol. xiii. p. 550, 551.

This pontiff had, in the preceding year, made use of the interest and arms of Francis I. to strip Francis Maria de la Rovera of the duchy of Urbino, which he bestowed on Laurentio de Medici, one of his own nephews; but Rovera, in this year, by the help of the Spanish forces, recovered his duchy: though Francis I. being afraid of losing Milan by the intrigues of the pope, not only supplied his holiness with troops for the war of Urbino, but likewise offered Catherine, heiress of the house of Boulogne, in marriage to Laurentio de Medici, who espoused her accordingly. The pope was so well pleased with the match, that he indulged Francis with a tenth upon his clergy, on pretence of maintaining the war against the Infidels.

At the same time, to indemnify himself for the mortification he had suffered by Rovera's success, he availed himself of the friendship he now entertained with all the princes of Europe, each of which vied with one another in giving his holiness proofs of their esteem: the season was to be improved, and the progress of the Turks gave a plausible handle for beginning the operations, and laying all the Christian world under an immense tax.

It was still taught and believed for a good while, that the pope, out of the inexhaustible treasure of the church, arising from the merits of Christ, and works of supererogation of the saints, had a power of distributing indulgencies on certain conditions prescribed by him, to the greatest and most profligate of sinners, for a plenary remission of sin (as it is practised at this day in Portugal, &c.) These indulgencies were supposed at first to reach only to relaxation of penances or ecclesiastical discipline. Urban II. in the beginning of the XIth century, was the first that granted a full remission of all sins, to those who should take up arms for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Infidels; which custom was kept up by his successors, some of whom extended the benefit of their indulgencies to such persons who, being unwilling or unable to go, maintained a soldier in their room. At length these spiritual favours were distributed to those who took the field against the enemies of holy church, or heretics. Great sums were raised by this means, but seldom applied to the ends for which they were intended. Leo X. resolved to follow so good precedents, the benefit whereof was to extend even to the dead, whose souls, upon payment of so much money, were immediately redeemed out of purgatory. People had likewise the liberty of eating eggs and white meats on fast days, and of choosing their confessor, and the like. Guicciardini says, that the powers for releasing souls out of purgatory were openly played for in taverns.

The order of Dominicans, as being most in favour with the lower rank of people, were made the brokers of this scandalous commerce; each friar or agent was entrusted with a set of indulgencies of all prices, of all denominations, in all cases, and for all sins; and the better to collect the money arising from this market, all Christendom was divided into different departments, in each of which a certain number of those priests were commissioned to recommend and enforce the utility of indulgences.

But Leo had, in some measure, already defeated his own intention; the great encouragement he had given to learning, had awakened curiosity in those whose profession it was to be scholars, and the flagrant practices of his agents had disposed many of the common people against him: nevertheless, such was the authority of the see of Rome at this time all over Europe, that it is hard to say where this evil would have stopped, had it not been for Martin Luther, an Augustin friar, professor of divinity at Wirtemberg in Saxony, a man of great parts, learning, and spirit, who, full of zeal against these abuses and novelties, rose up to expose and refute them. He confined himself to his subject in his first writings, but having occasion afterwards to enquire into the grounds and pretences upon which such indulgences were founded, he began to call in question some of the received notions about penance, purgatory, and the papal authority: this he did in ninety-five problematical theses, which he sent this year to Albert of Brandenburg, archbishop of Mentz, which he offered to maintain against all opponents. Hence arose a controversy, in which other doctrines were disputed. And this happening at a time when the art of printing had rendered learning more easy and general than it had been in former ages, a foundation was laid for one of the most remarkable and important revolutions in the human mind that occurs in history, either ancient or modern; this was no other than the Reformation, an incident which opened the eyes of men to discover the cheats and impositions of the court of Rome, and, together with the inestimable privilege of the freedom of private judgment in religious matters, introduced the no less valuable blessing of civil and political liberty.

Had any one told Luther at that time, that he would subvert the Roman catholic religion in almost one half of Europe, he would not have believed it. He went farther than he intended; as is the case in all disputes, and in almost all transactions. It has been said, and with an air of probability, that the best method to have made this zealous reformer change his opinion, would have been to have sent him a cardinal's hat; but the contempt he was held in by the church of Rome proved fatal to her power; for Luther, seeing himself upon the brink of a great undertaking, that of a total breach with the court of Rome, and

* The word Mameluck signifies in Syriac, a hired soldier. Jovius says, they were Circassian slaves, sold by the Tartars and Podolians to the merchants, and being trained up at Cairo in military exercises, were picked out for the sultan's guard, and preferred to the highest posts, who in 1255, resolved to obtain the kingdom of Egypt for themselves. The government was elective, and the son could claim no inheritance but his father's personal estate. Every Mameluck, whose number in all was about sixteen or eighteen thousand, had a vote in the election, and required a gold ducat of the sultan, as soon as chosen. There were in all of this race sixteen kings, from the year before-mentioned, to the present year 1517, when Tonombeius II. their last king, was conquered in the first year of his reign, by Selimus I. Thus Egypt became a province of the Turkish empire, as it still continues. Heylin, &c. Guicciard.

not receiving assurances of protection from any of the German princes, though several of them had given ear to his doctrine, he endeavoured to reconcile himself to the pope, by writing a letter to cardinal Cajetan, in which he makes an apology for his behaviour, and promises to drop his dispute concerning indulgences, provided silence was imposed upon his adversaries; but the court of Rome taking the letter as a proof that Luther was intimidated, and would soon become tractable, paid no regard to his proposal of a reconciliation: but at length the controversy arose to such an height, that Leo, though in his own mind he despised such kind of disputes, was obliged, as pope, to interfere in defence of the doctrine of indulgences, and of his own right to grant them.

Luther now saw that he had no hopes but by declaring open war against the pope himself. Not to enter into particulars, he first appealed to a general council against his holiness; he then proceeded to plead "for restoring the cup to the laity; for reforming the disorders of monasteries; and for abolishing auricular confession." Upon the pope's condemning forty-two of his articles, upon those and other heads, and ordering his books to be burned by the universities of Louvaine and Cologne, this bold reformer, in a public assembly of the university of Wirtemberg, threw into a fire, made in an open square, all the pope's bulls and decretals.

At length the old elector of Saxony, Frederick surnamed the Wise, and several other German princes, with a great body of the people, openly espoused Luther, whose writings were thereby dispersed all over Europe, and in England especially, where the dispositions of the people at this time seemed particularly favourable to the great event which soon after happened. But it is now time to resume our relation of civil transactions. The sickness, or rather plague, which still continued in England, seems, for the most part of this year, to have confined Henry to a private life; we shall therefore proceed to the more busy year 1518.

The French king, who had still greatly at heart the recovering of Tournay, thought he could not hope to succeed in that design, unless he could gain Wolsey over to his interest; and this was only to be done by indemnifying him for the loss of the administration of that bishopric: accordingly he sent a gentleman of his bed-chamber over to England in the spring of this year, in order to sound the cardinal on that subject. The messenger found Wolsey very ready to listen to the overtures he had to make: the truth is, that this minister was heartily tired of his bishopric, as he found very little regard paid to his administration, and consequently he could draw very little profit from it; and as he had no hopes that Maximilian, who was excessively poor, and Charles taken up with settling his affairs in Spain, would come up to his price, he resolved to make the best bargain he could with Francis, who agreed to give him a bond for the payment of twelve thousand crowns annually, during his (the cardinal's) life, in consideration of the loss he might sustain by the redelivery of Tournay. This private convention being settled, Wolsey on a sudden changed his strain, and represented to Henry, that the restoring of Tournay to the crown of France would be the most political measure he could pursue, inasmuch as the citizens had, ever since it came into the possession of England, been contriving how to deliver it up to France, and the keeping it cost every year an immense sum to the king, while the nation received no return either in power or profit. This argument, however Polydore Virgil and some other prejudiced writers may have tried to misrepresent the motives of it with regard to the cardinal, was certainly just, and founded on sound policy. Henry saw it in this light, and, though it is probable that he might think his favourite had a point to gain in it for his own advantage, yet, as his interest and that of the nation happened to coincide, the king assented to the proposal; and admiral Bonivet, with the archbishop of Paris, and Villeroy, secretary of state, were sent over by Francis, in the latter part of the summer, with a retinue of no fewer than twelve hundred persons, to open the negotiation: at the same time they brought a letter, all written by the hand of Francis himself, to Henry, with the strongest professions of his friendship, and some presents.

Wolsey had now a commission given him by Henry, for settling preliminaries with Villeroy; and the generous offers of Francis had such an effect with the English minister, that in a few days four different treaties were engrossed.

The first related to the marriage between the princess Mary and the dauphin, which was to be solemnized as soon as the young prince should be full fourteen years old, each of the two kings promising to pay five hundred thousand crowns, in case it was his fault that the marriage was not completed. Mary's dower was to be three hundred thirty-three thousand crowns of gold, one half to be paid on the day of marriage, and the other within a year after. The jointure was to be as great as had ever been assigned to any queen of France, and particularly to Anne of Brittany, and Mary of England, wives to Lewis XII.

The second treaty was upon the restitution of Tournay, for which Francis I. engaged to pay Henry six hundred thousand crowns of thirty-five pence Tournois each, besides fifty thousand livres Tournois due to him from the inhabitants. But out of these two sums Francis was to keep back the princess Mary's dower. As to the payments, he obliged himself to pay fifty thousand livres upon taking possession of the place, and then twenty-five thousand livres every six months, till the whole was paid.

The third treaty concerned the outrages which might be committed for the future against the peace by the subjects of either king, and contained certain regulations to procure speedy reparation.

By the fourth, the two monarchs agreed upon an interview in the village of Sandinfelt, between Ardres and Guisnes*.

These treaties being ratified, the princess Mary was betrothed to the dauphin in St. Paul's church, at London; and the earl of Worcester (late the lord Herbert), with West, bishop of Ely, and a magnificent train, were sent over to demand the performance of Francis, who swore to the observance of the treaties, delivered hostages for the payment of the money, and, in the name of his son, fulfilled the contract of marriage.

* Rymer, vol. xiii. p. 624—679.

During these transactions, which took up the greatest part of the year, pope Leo, still intent upon the affair of the crusade (or rather the sums he proposed to raise by virtue of that holy bubble) appointed cardinal Laurentius Campeius, or Campejo, his legate a latere* to the court of England, with instructions to solicit Henry's engagement in the general league, or five years truce, amongst all the princes of Europe, in order to prosecute jointly the war against the Infidels; and an authority to demand a tenth of the English clergy for the same service.

Campejo set out from Rome in the beginning of May, on his way to England; but Wolsey, having gotten notice of his appointment, sent one of his confidants to Rome, to complain to the pope of the affront put upon him by the nomination of another legate, while he resided cardinal in England. Leo being unwilling to disoblige so powerful a favourite, joined Wolsey in the legation with Campejo, and at the same time sent the English cardinal a commission, vesting him with the sole right of visiting English monasteries. Campejo arrived in England in July; but when he came to open the points of his embassy, Wolsey, who was the pope's enemy in every one of these matters, managed it so that the English clergy gave a flat denial to the pope's demand; and as to the project of the league, he represented it to Henry in its just light, that of a stale expedient for squeezing from the crown subsidies to the see of Rome: Henry therefore declined all such engagements. There is in the Collection of Public Acts a bull of Leo X. with extraordinary powers to the two legates, authorising them to grant a plenary indulgence to the faithful of both sexes who should be present at the mass which either of the legates should celebrate in the presence of the king and queen, or at least at the Benediction, provided they confessed their sins or desired to confess, and were penitent†. Among other circumstances which this year contributed to Wolsey's greatness, we are to mention two new grants conferred on him by the king: by the first he is empowered to give letters patent of denization, under the great seal, to all who should sue unto him for the same; and by the other he had the following full powers from Henry, which we shall give in the words of the patent‡.

“To doo and make out our letters patent, under our great-sele, from time to time, of all congie d'elires, royal assentes, restitution of temporalities, as well as archbishopprickes, bishopprickes, monasteries, abbies, and priors of our foundation, as of all other houses of religion, beyng for the tyme in oure handes by any other meane, within this our royallme of England, Wales, and the Marches of the same, unto such person or persons, as hereafter shall, by due order, sue for such congie d'elires, royal assentes, and restitutions of temporalities. And also that ye, by virtue hereof, from tyme to tyme, doo cause to be made out our commissions and writtes of Dedimus protestatem to such as ye shall think convenient to take the omagies and fealtise of all manner of persons, as well archbishops, bushops, or other, due unto us for our said temporalities; and that all such summes of money as from tyme to tyme shall be due unto us by reason of the said archbishopprickes, bushopprickes, monasteries, abbeyes, priories, and houses of religion, be always contented and paid to our use, in our hanaper of our Chauncerie, unto the clerke of the same for the tyme being. And theis our letters shall be to you sufficient warrant and discharge in the premisses at all tymes hereafter.”

Those, with other dignities and powers, now conferred upon the cardinal, gave him double lustre abroad, and made him respected equal to a crowned head; and such was the deference paid him by the court of Rome, who were fearful of doing the least thing to disoblige him, that, on his application, cardinal Adrian de Castello, whom, as was before observed, he had gotten removed from the office of pope's collector in England, was now deprived of the cardinalate and of the bishopric of Bath and Wells, which had been conferred on him, and the administration of which was now given to Wolsey, in order, as is there said, to enable him the better to support his dignity of cardinal and legate of the holy see.

Campejo's negociation, however, was in no wise accelerated by these concessions of the pope to his English colleague, for all he could obtain was a defensive alliance in favour of the holy see, in case it should be attacked by the infidels, to which Henry, about the end of the year, agreed, with room for the pope, the emperor, and the king of Spain to enter into the same. This cold alliance, however, was far from answering the views of his holiness, who intended to fill his coffers with the money which the more distant powers were to advance, to buy off a personal attendance upon this expedition; nevertheless, he approved and ratified the treaty, and the report of an intended invasion by the Infidels, immediately vanished.

The genius of the English was daily taking a new and more pacific turn; it was now cultivating rising arts, it was improving trade, and encouraging manufactures; and we must do cardinal Wolsey the justice to say, that he made the noblest use of his power, excepting the vanity that attended it, that any minister ever did. His post of high-chancellor placed him at the fountain of justice, and never was it better administered; he was particularly careful in punishing that most destructive of all evils, perjury: he was a great protector of the poor, and enforced several excellent laws for the protection of the mercantile and industrious part of the people. We have already observed, that he was a great promoter of the arts and sciences: the learning of the English was at this time equally useless and heavy, and their taste none; Wolsey saw this, and had the virtue to attempt to improve the one, and to introduce the other. With this view he spared no pains to find out men of literary merit, nor thought any reward too great for such merit. He employed no ministers but such as were

* There are four sorts of legates. 1. They whom the pope sends to preside at general councils. 2. The pope's perpetual vicars in countries remote from Rome; thus before the Reformation, the archbishop of Canterbury was legatus natus apostolicæ sedis. 3. They who for a certain time, and in certain places, are delegated to convene synods for restoring church discipline and other emergencies. 4. The name of legate is given to the pope's extraordinary ambassadors to emperors and kings, who are called legati a latere. At present none but cardinals have this character.

scholars; and under his administration the dignities of the law, of the church, and of the state were filled with men whose merit was their only recommendation: Dr. Clark and Dr. Knight were, through him, made bishops; Dr. Taylor was made master of the Rolls; Dr. Pace, one of the principal secretaries of state; Dr. Gardiner, who had a very fine turn for letters, was employed in several ambassies; not to mention Cromwell and Moore, who, by his means, rose to the highest offices in the state; with a vast number of other promotions, equally just and generous.

He this year laid before the king a scheme for the advancement of learning, particularly at Oxford, which he proposed to effect by founding several lectures for the furtherance of the belles lettres, and by reforming the statutes of that great seminary. Henry, whose heart was as yet good, had a regard for the prosperity of his people, and gladly lent his countenance and authority to the noble and patriotic views of his favourite. The statutes of the university were put into Wolsey's hands, and he had the new-modelling of them, which was followed by the noble institutions by him erected for the encouragement of learning, the particulars of which we have given us by a late writer of his life, and were as follow.

The first was that of theology, whereof one Blackwell, an excellent divine, was the first lecturer, of whom honourable mention is made in an epistle from the university to the cardinal, wherein they acquaint his eminency, "that they are not able to express the great benefit of his lectures in general, and more particularly the theological." Secondly, civil law; but who was the first person who read this lecture does not appear. Thirdly, of physic; the first who discharged this province was Thomas Musgrave, master of arts. Fourthly, philosophy; though we know nothing more concerning the person who was first appointed to read this lecture than that the initial letters of his name were L. B. Fifthly, for the mathematics, one Richard Crutcher was the first reader, of whom we find this character, representing his morals and learning: "Crutcher is a person of so great probity and goodness, that he deserves a better fortune than is common to mathematicians; and so great a master of his art, that he merits to be called so, by way of eminence and peculiar distinction." He was a native of Holland, and educated in the colleges of Wirtemberg and Cologne. Sixthly, for the Greek language, one Calphurnius, a native of Greece, was first appointed by the cardinal to this province, who first taught the pronunciation of that language in Oxford, as it is now read. Seventhly, for rhetoric and humanity, Clement was the first reader, who was succeeded by Thomas Luport, concerning whom More writes to his friend Erasmus, "That he read in both tongues with the greatest reputation*."

Neither must it be forgotten, that Henry, in imitation of the best regulated cities in Italy, and at the request of the cardinal, and that of several other learned men mentioned in the preamble to the patent†, founded the College of Physicians, "to check (to use the words of the said patent) the boldness of those unskilful men, who profess physic more out of avarice, than any confidence of a safe conscience;" a salutary and undegenerating institution!

At the same time that Wolsey was giving proofs of his glorious zeal for learning, he was exerting all the painful talents of a consummate politician. The peace which Europe now enjoyed was interrupted in the beginning of the year 1519, by the death of the emperor Maximilian‡, of whose mercenary feeble character the preceding pages have furnished some lively instances. This event necessarily induced Wolsey, as an able minister, to change his party with regard to France; for, upon the emperor's death, Francis I. declared himself a candidate to succeed him; a design which, had it taken place, must have proved very injurious to the interests of England: but Wolsey found means to frustrate it, through the means of Dr. Pace, the shrewdest negociator of the court of England, who so managed matters, that Charles, king of Spain, grandson of the deceased emperor, was elected by a majority of one voice among the electors||.

The election of Charles was a terrible mortification to Francis, and the jealousy of those two potent princes occasioned the bloody wars, of which we shall have occasion to speak in the course of this reign. In the mean time, as the government of England was now free from the fears of seeing a king of France emperor of Germany, Wolsey now renewed the former negotiations with Francis, from whom he had received, while the election of an emperor was depending, a commission constituting him that prince's procurator, commissary, and deputy for settling the whole particulars of the approaching interview between him and Henry; but it may be observed, that the advances made the cardinal not only by this monarch, but likewise by the new emperor, who, soon after his election, gave him a pension of five thousand ducats upon the bishopric of Pace, in Castile, and two thousand more upon the bishopric of Pala, was not so much the effect of any personal esteem for the minister, as through the fear of losing the friendship of the king his master, whom they knew to be entirely governed by him. Francis, on his part, to give Henry a fresh mark of his respect, desired him to stand god-father to his second son, afterwards king of France by the name of Henry II. Hence we may perceive how happy Henry's situation then was, and how glorious his reign might have been, had he wisely improved it; but, unfortunately for him, by his after-conduct he forfeited all those advantages, and incurred a load of guilt and infamy.

As for Wolsey, all his fine qualities were disgraced by his insolence, pride, and rapaciousness:

Some say, the reason was, because he declined the charge and hazard of going into Italy, to receive the imperial crown at the pope's hands. He spent his leisure hours in poetry, and writing the history of his own life in Dutch verse. As knight of the garter, his obsequy was solemnly kept in St. Paul's, by our king and the knights of that order. Herbert, p. 34.

having

having lately prevailed on the pope to recal Campejo, and to vest him with the sole power of legate, he opened a new tribunal called the Legatine Court, wherein he exercised very high, if not illegal powers. It was in effect a court of conscience, that took cognizance of almost all the actions of life; and one John Allen, doctor of laws, being appointed judge of this bench, committed the most flagrant acts of violence and extortion, on pretence of reforming the manners of the people. He pretended that his jurisdiction reached to all suits arising from wills, and contracts of marriage, and tried an infinite number of causes which properly belonged to other courts; while the king's judges were afraid to oppose his encroachments. While his substitute thus harrassed the laity, the cardinal himself treated the clergy with no less rigour and severity: he bestowed all the benefices of the kingdom upon his favourites, nor durst any one complain to the king of these arbitrary and oppressive measures, until Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, ventured to inform him of the discontents of the people, and the insolence of his minister. And shortly after, John London, a priest, boldly accusing the judge of the legate's court of malversation in his office, the king resolved to take cognizance of the affair himself; and Allen being convicted of numberless misdemeanors, the king so reprimanded the cardinal for his choice of such a man, that from thenceforward he became more cautious how he acted.

The cardinal's pomp was equal to his power: he now celebrated mass with all the state and magnificence of the sovereign pontiff, being constantly served by bishops, and even earls and dukes presented him with the water and towel. In his habit he was most gorgeous: besides the richness of his vestments, which in that respect were even regal, he wore shoes of silver gilt, set with pearls and precious stones: whenever he went abroad, he caused two large crosses (the one for York, and the other as legate) of massy silver to be carried before him by two tall priests; as also two pole-axes and two pillars of silver gilt, and golden cushions; with a train of stately horses, richly caparisoned. Nor was he content with the great power, wealth, and authority he enjoyed in England, while there was one degree of ecclesiastical dignity to which he had not yet attained; accordingly he already began to concert measures for procuring the papacy, whenever the holy see should become vacant, and the king of France had actually promised him the votes of fourteen cardinals; but since Charles had been elected to the imperial dignity, Wolsey seemed to think that prince more capable of advancing him to the papal throne, and began gradually to detach his master from the interests of France, and engage him in the behalf of the house of Austria.

The news of the approaching interview between Henry and Francis alarmed Charles V. who feared it might be a means of creating a personal friendship between the two monarchs, or of producing a league between them to his prejudice. These apprehensions put him upon endeavouring to gain the cardinal so far over to his interest as to try his master, king Henry, to agree that Charles, in his return from Spain to Flanders, might land in England, and confer with the king before the latter passed over to France. The cardinal, who, as we have just observed, thought it his interest to make a friend of Charles, brought Henry to consent to this proposal, by observing to him, that if Charles landed in the manner proposed, and went to the court of England, such an action could not be deemed an interview, but merely a visit to his aunt Catherine, Henry's consort. The king not only consented, but agreed to have a formal interview with Charles, after that with the king of France was over. In consequence of this private agreement, Charles set sail from Corunna, and, about the twenty fifth of May, 1520, landed at Dover, while Henry had proceeded as far as Canterbury, on his road to France, Wolsey having now settled every thing relating to the ceremonial of the interview between his master and Francis.

Upon the news of the emperor's landing, Wolsey was immediately dispatched to compliment his imperial majesty at Dover, where he was next day met by Henry in person, who conducted him to Canterbury, whither likewise the queen came, to pay her respects to her nephew, whom she had never seen before. The emperor, during his stay, laboured to dissuade the king of England from his intended interview with Francis; but Henry told him, with an air of frankness, that he had gone too far to retract, but, at the same time, assured him that nothing should pass between him and Francis to his prejudice. We have nothing besides that is material to relate concerning this visit, excepting that Charles renewed the treaty of commerce which had been concluded in 1506, and then took his leave of the English court.

Henry having made some necessary reformatations in his court, where the licentious behaviour of several young noblemen had given offence, set sail for France, on the thirty-first of May, and landed the same evening at Calais*, from whence he proceeded to Guisnes, a small town near the frontiers. Francis, attended by a like splendid retinue, repaired to Ardres, a few miles distant, and the two monarchs met, for the first time, at a place situated between these two towns, but still within Henry's French territories, Francis having agreed to pay that compliment to the English king in consideration of his having passed the sea in order to come to the interview.

The reader can scarcely exceed in his idea of the magnificence of the interview between the two kings; it was so splendid, that the place where it was held was called the Field of Cloth of Gold. Henry had caused a building, three hundred and twenty-eight feet square, to be erected, from which a private gallery reached to the castle of Guisnes;

* He was attended by his own queen, the queen dowager of France (married to the duke of Suffolk), cardinal Wolsey, the archbishop of Canterbury; the dukes of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Buckingham; the marquis of Dorset; the bishops of Durham, Ely, Armagh, Chester, Rochester, Exeter, Hereford, and Llandaff; the lord prior of England; the earls of Stafford, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Shrewsbury, Worcester, Devonshire, Kent, Wiltshire, Derby, Essex, and Kildare; the lords Abergavenny, Curson, Maltravers, Montacute, Herbert, St. John, Ros, Fitz Walter, Hastings, Delawar, Mountjoy, Dacres, Ferrers, Cobham, Daubeney, Morley, Lumley, and Howard, with many others, knights, esquires, and gentry to the number of four thousand three hundred and thirty-four persons; and of horses one thousand six hundred and thirty-seven, besides those who attended the queen dowager of France and the duke her husband, and the cardinal's retinue. See Grove's Wolsey, p. 111. 112.

the parts of this great building were artificially framed in England, and brought over for this purpose. Its outside was covered with painted cloth, so as to have the appearance of fine hewn work, and its inside richly hung with tapestry: in the front was painted a device, being the figure of an English archer, with these words for the motto, CVI ADHÆREOPRÆEST, "he prevails, whom I favour," thereby expressing Henry's situation, as holding in his hands the ballance of power among the politicians of Europe.

Francis at first proposed to lodge in a rich pavilion of cloth of gold; but the wind having thrown it down, he caused a large house, no wise sumptuous, but built of such materials as could be got in haste, to be erected near Ardres. Wolsey was sent thither to him on the fifth of June, to settle every thing for the final ratification of the late treaties between him and Henry. This was done next day, with only two additional articles; "one referring all matters in dispute to the judgment and award of the countess d'Angoulesme (mother to Francis) and cardinal Wolley; the other, providing, that when the million of crowns, stipulated by the treaty of May, 1513, was satisfied, the king of France should pay one hundred thousand livres Tournois yearly to Henry, till the marriage of the dauphin with the princess Mary of England should be solemnized in the face of the church."

The intelligent reader, who is sensible upon what small incidents the greatest events of life turn, cannot be offended if we subjoin some particulars of this famous interview, which strongly mark the dispositions of the two kings. When Henry, at their first meeting, was reading the draught of the proposed treaty, instead of pronouncing his own titles of "I, Henry, king of France and England," he stopped short, and very handsomely told Francis, that he had almost been hurried into a breach of good manners, and went on with the simple appellation of, "I, king Henry." Francis, charmed with this delicacy, returned him the compliment by an obliging bow; and observing in Henry a frankness of disposition, and a kind of willingness to shake off the restraints of formality, he resolved to hold conversation with him in a more friendly manner.

It had been agreed that Francis should visit the queen of England at Guisnes, while Henry was visiting the queen of France at Ardres; and that neither visit should continue longer than an appointed signal. Both accordingly withdrew to their respective lodgings; and Francis took that opportunity of slipping from all his guards, and going with only two gentlemen and a page to Guisnes, where he found the commanding officer for the day, with two hundred archers, posted on the bridge: the officer knew Francis, who addressed him with an air of frankness: "Gentlemen (said he) you are all my prisoners; and I order you to conduct me to the apartment of my brother the king of England." The officer instantly obeyed, and Henry was astonished on seeing his brother of France enter his chamber single; but instantly recovered himself, and, embracing Francis, "Brother (said he) you have served me as shrewd a turn as ever one man did another; you have instructed me with what confidence to behave towards you: I yield myself your prisoner from this hour." Upon this Henry immediately made Francis a present of a rich collar which he wore about his own neck, to the value of fifty thousand angels: and Francis presented Henry with a bracelet from his own arm of double the value. A conversation then ensued, to the mutual satisfaction of both kings, who laid aside the formalities of state in their ensuing conversations*.

The emperor had daily information from the cardinal, and even from Henry himself, concerning what passed at the interview; but still he was extremely uneasy about the event. Having occasion soon after to come to Gravelines, Henry went, on the tenth of July, with a noble train, to visit him there; and being met on the way by his imperial majesty in person, was entertained with as much magnificence as the place would admit. This meeting gave Francis great disquiet: he ordered la Pluche, one of his ministers at the imperial court, to require Charles's accession to the triple league, in his new quality of emperor; but the latter waved the demand, saying, that as he had already signed it by the name of Charles, he deemed that sufficient; Henry at the same time declaring himself of the like opinion. This left Francis no farther room to doubt of an intimate connection subsisting between his rival and the court of England. The interview between these princes did not last above three days; Henry returning to England about the middle of July, and Charles, after passing some time in Flanders, proceeded to Aix la Chapelle, where he was crowned emperor, on the twenty-third of October, with great solemnity; and, to crown his good fortune, he about this time received an incredible accession of wealth by the bravery and conduct of Hernando Cortez, who subdued the Mexican empire*, by whose treasures both this prince and his successor, Philip II. were afterwards enabled to aspire to universal monarchy.

The posture of affairs in the beginning of the year 1521 seemed to threaten Europe with a fatal war. The violent personal emulation and political jealousy which subsisted between the new emperor and the French king soon broke forth into action. These two princes invaded the dominions of each other with numerous armies; and, after they had gratified their ambition by some petty conquests, and glutted their revenge by committing the most terrible ravages and devastations, they preferred their complaints to the king of England, as the most proper person to decide the difference between them.

Henry, influenced by the cardinal, affected to lay the blame of this rupture upon Francis; nevertheless, professing to observe an exact neutrality, he prevailed on the contending princes to send their ambassadors to Calais, where they should find cardinal Wolsey, vested with full powers to act in his (Henry's) name as mediator. Charles willingly embraced this proposal, because he knew himself sure of the favourite's interest; and Francis durst not reject it, lest he should furnish Henry with a colour to declare openly for his enemy: it was therefore agreed, that the plenipotentiaries of the two monarchs, the pope's nuncio, and the cardinal of York, should meet at Calais on the fourth day of August.

The time appointed for the congress of Calais being come, Wolsey repaired thither, attended by a most splendid retinue of noblemen, prelates, and gentlemen; in the mean time a six weeks truce was appointed between the emperor and the king of France*. According to the lord Herbert, the cardinal mediator had given the emperor a hint not to agree, whatever seeming advances were made, to any peace with France: it is certain, from the whole tenor of his conduct, that Wolsey entered upon this his high office with very partial sentiments, and a firm resolution to make his master declare against Francis, whom he thought not so able to serve him in his great design of obtaining the papal dignity as the emperor. The consequence of these underhand dealings was, that Charles insisted on such high and unreasonable terms, that Francis absolutely refused to agree to the conditions he offered.

This refusal furnished Wolsey with a pretext to undertake a journey to Bruges, in order to confer personally with the emperor, and find out some expedient to procure a peace between the two monarchs: accordingly, on the twentieth of August, he set out, attended by four hundred and sixty horse, and was met by the emperor himself, a mile out of the town of Bruges. Here he concluded a league between Henry and the emperor, against France, by which the king of England obliged himself, in case of Francis's noncompliance with the terms offered him by the emperor, to invade France with an army of forty thousand men, and to bestow upon Charles the princess Mary, his only child, who had now some prospect of succeeding to the throne, notwithstanding that the emperor had already agreed to espouse the king of France's daughter, and that the English princess was already affianced to the dauphin of France†.

Thus ended this secret negotiation, for it can be called no other, between Wolsey and Charles, and thus was Henry wrought upon by his minister to declare himself the enemy of Francis I. without the least provocation, and contrary to all the rules of sound policy, considering the vast and continually increasing power of the emperor, which it was his interest to ballance.

Wolsey having now placed matters on such a footing as he thought most for his own interest, and having nothing more to do in the quality of mediator, he returned to England about the latter end of the year, and presented Henry a most magnificent bull from the pope, conferring upon him the title of Defender of the Faith, in consideration of a book which Henry had written against Luther, and which shall be farther taken notice of, in the ecclesiastical part of this history. But it is now now time to take a view of what passed in England during this year.

The cardinal had long borne a grudge to the duke of Buckingham, on account of that nobleman having not only made free with his character in public conversation, but having offered him some personal affronts; in particular it is said, that the duke one day holding the bason to the king, soon after his return from France, the cardinal, when the king had washed, dipped his hands in the same water, upon which the duke, enraged at his insolence, threw the water into his shoes: the cardinal, ready to burst with rage, told him, in a threatening tone, that he would sit upon his skirts. The duke, in order to expose the cardinal's malice to the king, came the next day to court richly dressed, but without any skirts to his coat: the king asking what he meant by appearing in that strange fashion? he repeated the cardinal's threats, with the occasion of them, adding, that he thus equipped himself to baulk the cardinal of his intention, for that now he could not sit upon his skirts.

This jest, however, did the duke no service, for from that instant Wolsey vowed his destruction. He began by depriving him of his two best friends, the earl of Northumberland, his father-in-law, and the earl of Surry, his son-in-law; the former of whom he caused to be put under arrest, on account of some matter in law concerning a wardship; and the latter he sent into an honourable banishment, by making him lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Buckingham thus standing alone, the cardinal gained over one Knevet, a retainer of the duke's, but who, upon being discharged his service for some misdemeanor, was now his mortal enemy: this fellow gave information against his master, that he should say in private company, that, should the king die without issue, he would lay claim to the crown, as the descendant of Anne of Gloucester, grand-daughter of Edward III. and that, should he ever ascend the throne, he would punish Wolsey in the most exemplary manner; also that the said duke corresponded with one Hopkins, a monk in the priory of Hinton, who pretended to the gift of prophecy, and flattered the duke with assurances of his succeeding to the crown of England.

The cardinal now thought he had gotten sufficient matter for an accusation, which he so aggravated to the king, that orders were instantly issued for apprehending the duke, who, on the fifteenth of April, was committed to the Tower, and shortly after was arraigned in Westminster-hall, before the duke of Norfolk (who was, for the time, constituted lord high-steward) of divers points of high-treason: the substance of the charge against him was, "that, in the second year of the king's reign, and at divers times before and after, he had imagined and compassed the king's death, at London, and at Thornbury, in Gloucestershire; and that, in the sixth year of the king's reign, he went in person to the priory of Hinton, and there had conference with the aforesaid Nicholas Hopkins, who told him that he should be king; and that he had often said to the lord Abergavenny, who had married one of his daughters, that if king Henry died without issue, he would make sure of the rule of the realm, in spite of whosoever said the contrary; swearing, that if the lord Abergavenny ever revealed this, he would fight with him to death."

The duke made a long and vigorous defence; but, after a full hearing, he was, by his peers, found guilty, and condemned; and, on Friday the seventeenth of May, was beheaded on Tower-hill†. Thus fell Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, who was descended from Edmund, earl of Stafford, who married Anne, daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester, and son of Edward III. He was also earl of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton. He married Eleanor, daughter of Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland; and had issue Henry, lord Stafford; Elizabeth, married to Thomas Howard, earl of Surry (son to the duke of Norfolk); Catherine, married to Ralph Neville, earl of Westmoreland; and Mary, married to George Neville, lord Abergavenny. In this duke the office of hereditary high-constable, which he inherited from the Bohuns, earls of Hereford (and which was the greatest post in the kingdom, its power extending, in some cases, even to controul the crown), became forfeited, and was never afterwards revived‡. His son Henry was, by an act of parliament, in the year following, restored in blood, though not to his father's honours or estates; but some of these were afterwards granted him: and George, lord Abergavenny, his son-in-law, was imprisoned for misprision of treason, but soon restored to favour.

We are now, after a long interval, to enter upon some review of the affairs of Ireland, as they stand connected with the affairs of England. In the late reign, the earl of Kildare, and the ministers of state, who had favoured Simnel, had received their pardon; and sir Richard Edgcombe was sent over, with five hundred men, to take a fresh oath of allegiance from the Irish nobility to Henry's government. We have already seen what share these people had in supporting Perkin Warbeck, and the earl of Kildare, for that and several other reasons, was detained prisoner in England in the year 1496. Henry VII. however, saw within this nobleman such great sentiments of honour and valour, that he soon after gave him his liberty, and even raised him to the dignity of lord-lieutenant, in which station he acquitted himself with great loyalty and honour: and in the year 1499, he acted as lord-deputy under Henry, then the second son of the king, who was made lord lieutenant. In year 1504, he, with great courage and resolution, quelled a conspiracy of some of the chief nobility in Ireland, who had brought a great army into the field, which he totally defeated with very little loss to himself. All the rest of Henry VII's reign was free from any commotions in Ireland, and Kildare was continued in that government till his death, which happened in 1513, the fifth year of the present reign, when he was succeeded, as well in his posts as estates, by his son, who in no wise degenerated from the virtues of his father||.

He began his administration with great success against the turbulent Irish; but Wolsey finding it necessary to remove the earl of Surry to a greater distance from the court, on account of the duke of Buckingham's affair, Kildare was called to England, to answer some frivolous complaints, and Surry was sent over in his room, though with powers so greatly circumscribed, that he found he could not maintain his character with any degree of dignity, and soon after had interest enough to get himself recalled from this troublesome post, and was succeeded by Pierce, earl of Ormond. Under him the Irish again took arms against the English government, encouraged by the earl of Surry's carrying away with him all the English forces. The truth is, the Irish, without the pale of the English government, seem as yet to have considered themselves as an independent and unconquered people: each clan had its own head, who made war and peace, as he was provoked or satisfied; so that Henry found the best measures he could take in respect to Ireland, was to support the principal chiefs one against another: and in this situation stood the affairs of Ireland towards the end of this year.

On the first day of December, this year, died pope Leo X. (John de Medici) in the forty-sixth year of his age and the ninth of his pontificate. He had, a little before his death, granted to cardinal Wolsey, for life, the administration of the abbey of St. Alban's, which, being authorized by the king of England, was afterwards confirmed, and the cardinal's dignity of legate renewed by Adrian VI. Leo's successor in the papacy.

Wolsey was not without hopes of being chosen at this time to fill the vacant see, and had actually in different scrutinies nine, twelve, and nineteen voices, this last number being more than half the number of cardinals assembled in the conclave*. He applied to the emperor for his interest; and Henry, zealous for the elevation of his favourite, sent Dr. Pace to Rome, with instructions to promote his election; but these measures proved in vain: Charles V. though he had engaged to assist Wolsey with all his interest, had no inclination to

* The conclave is in the Vatican, where there is a long gallery full of cells, which are chosen by the cardinals by lot. The funeral of the deceased pope lasting nine days, on the tenth each cardinal goes to his cell, and are shut up in the conclave with one servant, called a conclavist, with each a secretary and gentleman to attend them, carry their messages, and manage their intrigues. The conclave is guarded by the militia of the city, to prevent their receiving any letters; and the dishes of meat (which are received in at a window by the conclavist) are searched by the master of the ceremonies for the same reason. The cardinals meet every morning and evening in the chapel for a scrutiny, which is done by writing their suffrages in the billets done up in two folds, and sealed with two seals. In the first fold, the conclavist writes the name of the cardinal his master votes for, because the cardinal's hand would be known. In the second the cardinal writes his own name; and on the outside, the conclavist writes any motto the cardinal pleases, as Deo volente, by which they know their own billets when they are read, for the fold containing the elector's name is not opened till the pope is chosen, and then he opens all to know who elected him. When the billets are ready, they put them, after a short prayer, into a chalice upon the altar, and appoint two of their number to read the names of the cardinals aloud, and keep account of the votes for each. And this they do till two thirds of the votes fall upon one person; and if they do not, the billets are all burnt. The court of Rome consists at present of the pope and seventy cardinals; viz. fifty cardinal-priests, fourteen cardinal-deacons, and six cardinal-bishops, who are for the most part of the pope's privy-council. perform his promise; he wanted to have a pope who should be entirely at his devotion, and he was too well acquainted with the imperious temper of Wolsey to think that he could ever manage such a pontiff; he therefore determined to advance cardinal Adrian Florentio, bishop of Tortosa, who acted as his prime minister in Spain, to the papal chair, and proceeded so artfully therein, that this prelate was unanimously elected pope before the arrival of Pace at Rome, and thereby his imperial majesty was furnished with a plausible excuse for the failure of Wolsey's application; and as he was desirous to maintain a friendly correspondence with this favourite, on whose pleasure he knew in a great measure depended whether or not he should live on good terms with Henry, he granted him a pension of twenty-five thousand ducats a year, in lieu of the administration of the see of Paca, granted him by the late pope, besides another of nine thousand thousand crowns a year, in lieu of that of Tournay, the payment whereof Charles undertook, since, after the league above-mentioned, it could not be expected from Francis.

This prince had by this time gotten intelligence of the private league made at Bruges, which he doubted not would be followed by a war with England; he therefore, in order to oblige Henry to declare himself one way or the other, on the twenty-third of February, 1522, sent a letter to the king of England, putting him in mind of the treaty of October, 1518, between them and the late pope and the present emperor, whereby the contracting parties obliged themselves, upon notice of any of their territories being invaded, to require the invader to desist and make satisfaction for what he had done, and in failure thereof to declare war against him, requiring Henry accordingly to declare himself an enemy to the emperor, whose troops had taken Mouzan, in Champagne, and joined those of the late pope in an invasion of the Milanese.

This seems to have made Henry declare himself sooner than he intended; and accordingly, about the latter end of March, he sent Clarendieux king of arms to the French court, with a declaration, that he looked upon Francis as the breaker of the common peace, and therefore found himself under a necessity of taking part with the emperor against him. Nothing but war was now to be looked for; the ambassadors on both sides were recalled, the effects of merchants were seized in both countries, and Henry fitted out a strong fleet for making prizes of the French ships, and protecting the English commerce. The command of this fleet was given to the earl of Surry, who was now in high favour, and made lord high-admiral of England.

Besides the other motives which induced the king of England to side openly with the emperor, he pretended great cause of complaint against Francis in regard to some transactions of his, relating to the affairs of Scotland, of which it will be necessary here to take a cursory review.

Towards the latter end of the preceding year, the duke of Albany had returned to Scotland from France, where he had been detained some time at the instances of Henry, who wanted to avail himself of the regent's absence to procure an ascendant in the Scottish council; besides, he suspected the duke of a design to marry his sister, the queen dowager of Scotland, who, having a dispute with her husband, the earl of Angus, had applied to the pope for a divorce, and in the mean time not only refused to cohabit with the earl, but gave all her interest to Albany. Henry upon this complained that Francis had deceived him, in suffering the duke to return to Scotland: he likewise revived his complaints against the duke to the Scottish parliament, in the beginning of this year 1522, accusing him of procuring a dissention between the queen dowager and her husband, and of an intention to procure a divorce that he might marry her himself; and concluded with insisting that the duke might be removed from the regency and the custody of the young king. The parliament of Scotland replied to this letter with so much spirit and firmness that Henry plainly saw they were resolved to stand by the duke. He also now learned, that, upon the return of the cardinal, without communicating any result of his conferences at Bruges to Francis or his ministers, the latter, suspecting what was indeed the truth, had thought it necessary to strengthen himself by a strict alliance with Scotland, through the means of the duke of Albany, with whom he had, on the twenty-eighth of December, in the foregoing year, concluded a treaty at Edinburgh, by which, in case of a war between Francis and Henry, the Scots were to send six thousand men to the assistance of the former; and if Scotland was attacked, which Henry seemed to threaten, if the duke was not removed from the regency, Francis was to aid the Scots with a powerful force: and to bind this treaty, a marriage was stipulated between one of the daughters of France and the young king of Scotland. These considerations, partly real and partly pretended, were by Henry made use of as his reasons for preparing for a double war against France and Scotland.

Such was the situation of affairs when Charles V. paid a new visit to England, with a view to strengthen his interest with Henry and the cardinal, whom he was fearful of having disobligeed by what had passed at the late conclave, and also to confirm the articles agreed upon at Bruges. He landed, on the twenty-sixth of May, this year, at Dover, whither the cardinal went to receive him with a magnificent train, and was followed by Henry himself two days afterwards, who conducted the emperor to his court at Greenwich. As Wolsey did not think this a proper juncture to shew any resentment, the emperor had reason to be satisfied with his reception, and found a ready compliance with all his desires. After some days were passed in the customary diversions of those times, the king carried the emperor to Windsor, where he was installed of the order of the Garter. This done, the two monarchs received the sacrament from the hands of the cardinal (who omitted nothing to display his grandeur on the occasion), and swore to the treaty of Bruges, to which some new articles were now added. The preamble to this treaty, as containing the grounds of the war which afterwards happened, we shall here give.

"Whereas there was lately war begun between us, Charles, and the king of France; and, by virtue of a league between us king Henry, and the said king of France, both we and Francis, by our letters, required aid of the said king Henry, one against the other, and the said king of England, in the beginning of this year, to compass these differences, sent to Calais the most reverend father in God, Thomas, cardinal of York, as his lieutenant, before whom, when many disputes had been on both sides who first began the war, and it was found that the fault was in the French king, and that he first began with us, not in Luxemburg only, but by his captains also in Navarre, and hired foreign soldiers which were not his own subjects, to break the public peace, contrary to the treaty of London; wherefore, when the most reverend father could not effect at Calais neither peace nor truce, under any honourable conditions, the king of England understanding, as well by the relation of the most reverend father, as by the letter of Francis king of France, written by his orators and captains, which were shewed to the king of England, that the said Francis had broken both the treaty of London, and all other treaties and agreements of affinity concluded between them, not only by sending the duke of Albany into Scotland (which was against his oath given), but also denying the king of England his pension, and violating his subjects, against the league; the said king of England hath resolved thereupon to send us aid against him, accordingly as he is bound by the treaty of London: and therefore, upon treaty of a perpetual and stricter confederacy between us and the said king Henry, and also of a marriage with the princess Mary, we being on both sides free from all agreement made heretofore in this kind with the French, have concluded both league and alliance in manner following."

As the treaty itself is too long, we shall only give its principal clauses, which are as follow.

"That Henry shall give with the princess Mary four hundred thousand crowns; the same to be restored to the king of England's executors, in case that the said princess should succeed to the crown of England; but subject to the deduction of such sums as Maximilian the late emperor borrowed of Henry VII. and that the marriage shall be consummated as soon as the princess shall be twelve years of age: her fortune to be made a million of crowns in case of Henry's having a son; and she to be invested with a jointure of fifty thousand crowns a year."

The chief articles of the treaty of alliance were as follow.

"That before the end of May, 1524, or sooner, the emperor shall declare war, in all his dominions, against the king of France, and invade France on the side of Spain, with thirty thousand foot and ten thousand horse; while Henry was to enter France, with the like force on what side he found most convenient. In like manner each was to furnish three thousand marines, for investing the coast of France by sea; and likewise a competent number of soldiers to harraßs the frontiers of France on the side of Artois and Picardy; the emperor obliging himself to do his best to recal all German mercenaries out of the French pay.

"The emperor was to assist Henry, should the latter think proper to attempt to annex the crown of Scotland to England, or entirely to reduce Ireland: and Henry was to assist the emperor if he should attempt to reduce the dukes of Gueldres or Friesland, or any of the rebel feudatories of the empire: and that neither prince shall make peace, nor diminish their contingencies, without consent of the other; and that both should declare their pretensions to the places to be recovered from France, before the first of May, 1524, that proper restitution may be made. The whole of the treaty to be kept secret from the French.

It was agreed also, "That this treaty shall be signified to pope Adrian VI. and he be intreated to enter into it, and held as a principal contrahent if he accept it within three months. The Venetians, if they will accept this treaty within three months, so as, according as they ought by the treaty of London, they will forsake the French and declare themselves against him, shall be comprehended. The Swiss shall have this treaty signified to them, and be practised to renounce the French, or at least to be neutral. None shall be comprized in this treaty which is enemy to either of the two principal contrahents; for the rest, each may have his friends."

We must not forget that there was in this treaty a clause, by which both contracting parties obliged themselves to appear before Wolley as judge, in what place he should chuse, and voluntarily submit to his jurisdiction as legate; and confessing themselves to be bound to observe this treaty, shall require the said legate to pronounce the sentence of excommunication against them, if they violate the articles thereof.

At the same time that this treaty was concluded, Charles gave Henry an indemnification, by which he bound himself to save Henry harmless for all the sums of money and pensions, which were or should be due to king Henry from Francis, upon former agreements, and now were or should be withheld by the said Francis, upon denunciation of war against him.

In the mean time, to ingratiate himself with Henry and the English nation, the emperor, during his stay here (which was but five weeks) presented the earl of Surry, high-admiral of England, with a commission for being admiral of his dominions likewise: and the English fleet being now joined by a great number of Flemish ships, and some Venetian gallies, the whole amounting to one hundred and eighty sail, the earl of Surry, as lord high-admiral of both kingdoms, took command thereof; and the emperor going on board on the third of July, landed, on the sixteenth of the same month, at St. Andero, on the coast of Biscay, in Spain; after which, cruising off the French coast, he made a descent near Cherbourg, and, after having destroyed the adjacent country, sailed for Morlaix, in Brittany, and burnt and plundered that town, from whence he brought a great booty; but the season advancing, and his men growing sickly, he returned home.

The war being thoroughly resolved upon, Henry's next concern was how to get money for its support. He did not chuse to call a parliament to demand a subsidy, seeing that he could allege no just cause for undertaking a war so detrimental to the trade and commerce of his subjects: however, money must be raised, and it was the cardinal's business, who had embarked his master in the war, to find means. His first step was to borrow twenty thousand pounds of the citizens of London, and other sums of other persons capable of advancing them. A general loan was then demanded, in the king's name, of the tenth of all the estates of the temporality, and a fourth of the clergy, requiring the Londoners to give in the value of their estates upon oath; but they opposed this method of taxation tion in the most strenuous manner, alleging, with great justice, the impossibility of giving an exact account of their effects, seeing that, as a trading people, the greatest part of their properties were in the hands of their correspondents in foreign parts. This argument bore so much conviction with it, that the king contented himself with a sum barely sufficient to bear his expences until a parliament should be called, to which at last he was obliged to have recourse.

The moneys thus raised falling far short of the king's necessity, a general muster and valuation was appointed, by means of a new Domesday book, to be formed in a very peculiar manner. Stowe gives us an account of this survey from the original warrant, dated at Brentwood, in Essex, March 27, 1522. It was by appointing commissioners throughout all the counties of England; and these commissioners were to issue warrants to the constable of every hundred, who was commanded to charge the constables of every parish within the said hundred to appear personally before certain commissioners, and to bring with them the names of all persons above sixteen years old, dwelling within the said hundred, and to enjoin them to repair to a certain place assigned, with their arms, and declare what their names are, and to whom they belong, and who is lord of every town or hamlet, and who stewards, and who persons of the town, and what their benefice is worth, and who owners of every parcel of land within the said precincts, and what is the yearly value of every man's land, what stock on the lands, and who the owner thereof; also what strangers dwell there, and what business they follow; also the value and substance of every person above sixteen years of age; also what pensions go thence to religious and spiritual men*.

Henry resolved to apply some part of the money his favourite had thus squeezed from the people, in chastising the Scots for the little regard they had shewn to his demands in the case of the duke of Albany. In the spring of the year sir William Fitz Williams, vice-admiral of England, had put to sea with his squadron, and sailed up the Firth of Forth; but the Scots had so well secured their shipping, that he was obliged to return without effecting any thing to their detriment. On the thirtieth of July, George, earl of Shrewsbury, was appointed to command as the king's lieutenant against the Scots, and had a commission for making a general array of the northern counties, in order to enter Scotland; but the duke of Albany had by this time raised a strong army, and advanced as far as the river Esk, near Carlisle, with an intention to invade England; but when he gave orders for passing the borders, many of the principal nobility refused to advance, alleging that it would be extremely impolitic to involve their country in an unnecessary war with England, since they had no quarrel with Henry, nor he with them, but on account of their adhering to the duke as regent. This latter, finding it impossible to engage the Scots in a war on his account, and seeing no remedy, made a short truce with the lord Dacres of the North, who had been detached by the earl of Shrewsbury, and had burnt the town of Kelso: and, under favour of this suspension of hostilities the duke retreated to Edinburgh, where he dismissed his army, and sailed, the twenty-fifth of October, for France, to get a body of foreign troops from Francis, his ally, by the help of whom he hoped, at his return, to make the Scots more tractable. Here we shall have time to take a short view of the state of affairs in Italy, where the events of the war proved very unfavourable to Francis.

The new pope was entirely in the interest of Spain, and consequently an enemy to France. A little before the death of the late pontiff, Leo X. the crafty cardinal of Sion, finding means to corrupt the Swiss in the French pay, had brought them over to the allies, who were thereby vastly superior to the French army. The consequence of this was, that Prosper Colonna, the pope's general, passed the Adda, and surprized Milan, where he had a correspondence. This was followed by the reduction of Pavia, Lodi, Parma, and Placentia, and many other places in the Milanese; and this year Cremona and Genoa fell into the hands of the Imperialists. The Venetians, who had hitherto been the friends and confederates of France, afraid of the resentment of the allies, began to treat with the emperor, and civilly desired Lautrec, who commanded for the French in Italy, to retire out of their territories, where he had taken refuge with his troops after a defeat he had suffered in attacking the Imperialists at Bicocque; and, about the latter end of this year, Henry and the emperor prevailed on them, partly by threats, and partly by fair promises, to engage to observe a neutrality. They were chiefly induced to do this from the dreadful apprehensions they were under from the Turks, who had this year taken Belgrade from the king of Hungary, and the island of Rhodes from the knights of St. John of Jerusalem; besides, the new pope, the devoted servant of the emperor, had found means to gain over the dukes of Ferrara and Urbino, and thereby terribly weakened the French interest in Italy. In Navarre the French kept their ground with good success, under the marshal de Chavennes, who compelled the Spaniards to raise the siege of Fontarabia†.

Such was the state of England and of English concerns on the continent in the beginning of the year 1523, when the cardinal, finding how disagreeable his late method of raising money had been to the nation, advised the king to convoke a parliament, which accordingly met on the fifteenth of April, at Black-friars, in London: the clergy meeting in convocation at the same time, Wolsey, to convince the laity that he did not intend to burthen their shoulders only, in what he had lately done, began the plan of his operations with his reverend brethren, of whom he demanded a subsidy of one half of their annual revenues, payable in five years. This unreasonable demand was strongly opposed by Fox and Fisher, bishops of Winchester and Rochester; but the cardinal, incensed, at their hesitation, rated them so roundly in a speech he made on the occasion, that the rest of the clergy were discouraged from supporting them, and the subsidy was agreed to.

Having thus succeeded in the convocation, he repaired to the house of commons, where he made a very long and copious speech on the state of affairs, setting forth the faithlessness and ambition of the French king, and the necessity of England's taking part with the emperor, concluding his harangue with a demand of eight hundred thousand pounds, to be raised by the fifth (or four shillings in the pound) of every man's goods and lands, payable in four years †.

This demand was enforced the day after by sir Thomas Moore, a creature of the cardinal's: but the members objecting to the extravagance of the sum required, occasioned many and warm debates, which at length ended in an offer of granting the king two shillings in the pound from those possessing twenty pounds and upwards per annum, and one shilling in the pound for all who had above forty shillings per annum; and for those under forty shillings, and above the age of sixteen, two pence per head, to be paid in three years.

The cardinal, impatient of the least controul, when he had a point to gain, was much offended at this backwardness of the commons, and accordingly, returning to the house, by an insinuating speech prevailed on them to resume the debates on a more extensive plan; at the same time he had recourse to a notorious falsehood to win them over to his will, by telling the house that the lords had agreed to four shillings in the pound; whereas the lords had granted nothing, but waited to see what the commons would do. We are told farther, by some of our oldest historians, that when several members of the house begged Wolsey to prevail with the king to moderate his demand, he peremptorily replied, "that rather than attempt to persuade the king to abate one shilling, he would have his tongue plucked out of his head with hot pinchers."

The debate was then revived, and lasted fourteen or fifteen days, and at last it was agreed, upon the motion of sir John Hussey, which was seconded by Mr. Montague, a lawyer of great credit in the house, and of great weight in the debates*, that those of fifty pounds a year should pay three shillings in the pound for two years; which, saith the lord Herbert, being at length continued to the fourth year, and extended to such as were worth five pounds in goods, was all that could be obtained; and the parliament was, on the thirty-first of July, adjourned to Westminster, where it sat till the thirty-first of August, when it was dissolved. For the statutes made in this parliament, we refer the reader to their proper head.

About this time the bishop of Durham died, and the king gave that bishopric to the cardinal, who resigned the bishopric of Bath and Wells to Dr. John Clark, master of the Rolls; and sir Henry Marney, who was vice-chamberlain, was made lord privy-seal, and shortly after created a baron. Also, during this parliament, Arthur Plantagenet, bastard son to king Edward IV. was created viscount Lisle in right of his wife, who was widow to Edmund Dudley, the wicked minister of Henry VII.

In the summer of this year, Christiern, king of Denmark and Sweden, who had married the emperor's sister, and had been driven out of his dominions by his own subjects, on account of his insufferable cruelty, came into England with his queen, and was honourably received by Henry, who made him many valuable presents: he then went to Flanders, where he remained as a banished man. Some years after, king Henry sent ambassadors, to persuade his people to receive him again; but they could not prevail, so great was the hatred of his subjects against this tyrannical king.

Henry being thus, by the timidity or the venality of parliament, furnished with an immense sum, prepared to put in execution his great engagements. The Venetians had been strongly solicited by the Imperial and English ambassadors to renounce their alliance with Francis: the senate was for a good while irresolute what party to take, but finding, by advices from their ambassador at Paris, that Francis, through want of money, disturbances in his court, and the necessity of defending his frontier against the attempts of the Spaniards, the English, and the Flemings, was not in a condition to send over an army into Italy, they agreed, on the twenty-eighth of June, to a league with the emperor, Ferdinand, archduke of Austria, and Sforza, duke of Milan, by which they engaged to furnish six hundred men at arms, with as many light horse, and six thousand foot, for the defence as well of the Milanese as of the kingdom of Naples, against all powers whatever, except the Turks, with whom they durst not break; and the emperor was to assist them with the same force, if any of their territories should be invaded. The pope, at the request of the contracting parties, entered into this league, and was followed by the republics of Florence, Genoa, Lucca, and Sienna ||: the marquis of Mantua was appointed general of the Ecclesiastical and Florentine troops, a separate army of observation was formed, and Prosper Colonna was made generalissimo of the grand alliance.

Francis behaved on this occasion with an intrepidity truly heroic; and it is more than probable that he might have been able to have withstood all the efforts of his enemies, had it not been for the injustice he was guilty of towards Charles, constable of Bourbon, to whom he had been indebted for the success of his arms in Italy. It was not thought sufficient to mortify him on all occasions, but Louisa of Savoy, countess of Angoulesme, the king's mother, being desirous of marrying the constable, who was lately become a widower, and having been refused by him, resolved to ruin the man she could not wed, and preferred a suit against him, which was deemed highly unjust by all the lawyers of those times, and which no other but a powerful queen-mother could have gained. This suit was for no less than all the possessions of the family of Bourbon. The judges suffered themselves to be prevailed on by the queen's solicitations; and, by a sentence of sequestration, stripped the constable at once of all his estates; who thereupon sent his friend, the bishop of Autun, to request the king at least to put a stop to the proceedings: but the king would not even see the bishop. Upon this the constable, who had already

* It is said, that when Henry was informed of the commons having refused to grant the required supply, he was so incensed that he sent for this Mr. Montague, and addressed himself to him in the following manner: "Ho! man! will they not suffer my bill to pass?" and laying his hand on Montague's head, who was then on his knees before him: "Get my bill passed by to-morrow (said he), or else to-morrow this head of yours shall be off." Such was the haughty and tyrannical style employed by this arbitrary king, to the free-born natives of England; and such the oppressive practices of his imperious minister!

been strongly solicited by Charles V. to enter into his service, now, in a fit of despair and anger, accepted the offer. It would have been truly heroic in him, to have continued to do his duty to his country, though ill treated; but there is another kind of heroism, that of revenge: unfortunately, Charles of Bourbon, made choice of the latter, quitted France, and entered into the emperor's service. Few men ever tasted the fatal pleasure of revenge more fully than himself.

The emperor received him with open arms, and immediately made Henry acquainted with the affair, who sent sir John Russel, an able negociator, over to Calais, to treat with the constable, whom he brought to enter into a league offensive and defensive with the emperor and the king of England, by which he obliged himself to act against Francis in the heart of his dominions with an army of his own vassals, reinforced by seven thousand Imperialists, while Charles and Henry should attack the French in Bearne and Picardy. It was also stipulated in this treaty, that, after they should have conquered France, the constable was to have for his share Provence, erected into a kingdom, and espouse the emperor's sister Eleonora, widow of don Emanuel, king of Portugal*.

In the mean time, as the affairs of Italy pressed, and the emperor was sensible of the great advantages a general must have, who knew the strength and weakness of all the French troops, he constituted the constable his lieutenant-general in Italy, and the latter repaired to Milan; which was now in the hands of the French admiral Bonnevét, Bourbon's greatest enemy.

But about this time Henry was greatly chagrined by the news of the duke of Albany being ready to sail from France, with a reinforcement of foreign troops, for Scotland. Upon this the earl of Surry was appointed general of the army to act against the Scots; and sir William FitzWilliams was sent, with a squadron of thirty-six ships, to cruize off the French coast, and prevent the duke's getting out; but being obliged by severe gales of wind to return to the Downs, the duke took the advantage of his absence to put to sea, and, sailing west-about, landed in Scotland about the middle of September, which country the earl of Surry had by this time entered and most miserably ravaged, burning the town of Jedburgh and several villages and castles.

The duke of Albany, upon his arrival, called a parliament at Edinburgh, when, after some debate, it was resolved to march against the English. Accordingly, the duke, taking the field with a numerous army, approached the English borders, where he heard that the earl of Surry was then lying at Newcastle; upon which he sent a herald to him, promising him, if he would come forth to meet him, he would give him battle; and if he took him prisoner, grant him good quarter. To this defiance the earl replied, that he should in no wise decline meeting the duke in the field; but, if he took him prisoner, all the quarter he would give him should be to cut off his head and send it to his master, the king of England.

The last day of October, the duke of Albany crossing a wooden bridge over the Tweed, which divided England from Scotland, with a part of his army, laid siege to the castle of Werk, which was very near capitulating, when sir William Lisle, the commander, making a sudden sally at the head of his garrison, drove the enemy from before the place, with the loss of three hundred men, most of them French. By this time the earl of Surry's army being reinforced, for which purpose he had returned back out of Scotland, amounted to upwards of forty thousand men; but having received orders from court to act only upon the defensive (lest by pressing the Scots too much they might be brought to unite among themselves), he did not follow the enemy into their own country. Shortly after, the queen dowager of Scotland sent to her brother, the king of England, desiring him to refrain from farther hostilities, and agree to a twelve-month's truce, which proposal Henry readily consented to, as it left him more at leisure to prosecute his designs against France. Accordingly orders were sent to the earl of Surry, to disband his army, and that nobleman returned to court, where he soon after took the title of duke of Norfolk, fallen to him by the death of his father, the old duke.

Henry had been so taken up with attending to the affairs of Scotland, that it was the twenty-fourth of August this year before the English army could be carried over to Calais. It was commanded by the duke of Suffolk, under whom served several valiant noblemen, and other persons of distinction. On his arrival at St. Omer's, in September, he was joined by three thousand foot and five hundred horse in the Imperial service; and a council of war being held, it was resolved to coast along the Somme, and, if possible, draw the French to a battle: but these latter not daring to hazard an engagement, contented themselves with harrassing the enemy by flying parties, and depended on the strength of their frontier garrisons, and the advanced season of the year, to prevent the English taking winter-quarters in their country.

The duke of Suffolk coming before Bray, a town on the Somme garrisoned by sixteen hundred men, took it by assault on the twentieth of October, and, passing the river, made himself master of Montdidier, Roye, and other considerable places. He thus continued to advance till he came to the Oyse, within eleven leagues of Paris, which put that city in the utmost consternation: however, the arrival of the duke de Vendôme with a large body of troops re-animated the inhabitants, and filled the English, in their turn, with apprehensions, lest their provisions should be cut off, and themselves enclosed between this army, and one which was forming by marshal Tremouille, from draughts out of the garrisons of Picardy. The English were masters of no strong towns to maintain themselves in, during the winter, which now set in so severe that numbers of the soldiers died by the extremity of the cold, and Suffolk found himself obliged to retire to Calais, to put his army into winter-quarters. The necessary effect of this treaty was, that almost all the places he had taken during the campaign fell again into the hands of the French.

The emperor was not more successful in the attempt he made at the same time upon Gascony, though he had come in person into Navarre, in order to hasten the enterprize. His troops, making a feint of laying liege to Fontarabia, passed the mountains the next day, encamped at St. John de Luz, and on the eighth of September invested Bayonne.

The city was nobly defended by Lautrec, the French general, and the attack was as obstinate as the defence. The Spaniards had invested it on all sides by sea and land, and incessantly battered the walls with great fury; but Lautrec animating not only the small number of soldiers that were in the garrison, but even the women and children, to defend the place, the Spaniards, after ravaging all the country round, and finding the rigour of the season increase, were obliged to draw off their troops, and return to their own country, leaving a sufficient number however to renew the siege of Fontarabia. Thus ended the operations of the two expeditions designed against France: we are now to attend the third, which the reader may remember was to be attempted by the constable of Bourbon, with his own vassals and a body of German troops, in the very heart of the kingdom.

It was September before these troops, commanded by general Furstemberg in the constable's absence in Italy, entered Burgundy through the Franche Comté, who, after taking Coiffi, passed the Meuse, and made himself master of Montclair; but being surprized by the count de Guise, and having no horse to oppose to the French cavalry, he resolved to retire into Lorraine: he could not, however, make his retreat so safely but that Guise, falling upon his rear near Neufchatel, cut in pieces the best part of his troops.

As to Francis, the rebellion and flight of the constable of Bourbon threw him into the greatest perplexities. He was just setting out from Lyons, to head his army in Italy, when he heard of the treaty this revengeful subject had made with his enemies, and fearing he might have interest enough to foment a rebellion in France, he committed the care of the Italian war to admiral Bonnivet, to whom he gave the sole command of his army there, amounting to thirty-three thousand men, and who passed the Alps about the end of August or the beginning of September. Bonnivet was but an indifferent soldier, and a worse statesman: he took, however, Novara and some other places of no great consequence in Italy; and had he marched directly to Milan, he might have recovered it for his master; but he lost so much time in treating with the inhabitants, at four leagues distance from the city, that the constable of Bourbon had an opportunity to put it in a state of defence. The rest of the campaign was spent in several fruitless attempts made by the admiral upon Cremona and Milan, in all which he was disappointed. At last, after being in danger of his army starving in camp, and daily threatened with a mutiny from the Swiss troops, he sent his forces into winter-quarters in Piedmont.

While these things were transacting, pope Adrian VI. died, and the conclave was split into two different factions, one of which favoured cardinal Colonna, and the other Julio de Medici, a natural son of Julio de Medici, uncle to pope Leo X. the latter of whom, after a debate of fifty days, was chosen pope, and assumed the name of Clement VII.

Wolsey was no sooner informed of Adrian's death, than he persuaded Henry to write a letter with his own hand to the emperor, recommending him in the strongest terms to the papal throne;

but Charles had already espoused the cause of Julio, and the English cardinal affected to bear his disappointment with all the resignation of an hermit, though, in all likelihood, his heart was inflamed with revenge against the emperor, who had twice deceived him in a point which he, from his inmost soul, so much coveted to gain: however, his ambition was in some measure gratified by the new pope, who bestowed on him a grant of the legatine power for life, which had never been conferred upon any other person.

Before we close the transactions of this busy year, it will be necessary to mention a word or two concerning the state of affairs in Scotland towards the end of it.

The duke of Albany, upon his return to Edinburgh from his unsuccessful attempt against England, did not find the estates of the realm so obsequious to him as they used to be: James V. was now in the thirteenth year of his age, and many of the nobility thought it was high time that he should be taken out of wardship and initiated into the affairs of government. This was the general sense of the nation; and the duke of Albany, seeing it difficult to stem the tide, desired leave to return to France: he was taken at his word, and going over in the following year, his post of governor was abolished, and the queen, in her son's name, assuming the government of the kingdom, had, jointly with eight lords, the custody of the royal person. The truce lately concluded was soon after followed by a treaty for a perpetual peace, and for the marriage of the young king of Scotland with the princess Mary, Henry's only child, and as yet the heir of his dominions. As for the duke of Albany, he never again returned to Scotland; and the Scottish nobles, distracted by their own intestine dissensions, were not able, for a number of years, to give any more disturbance to England.

The year 1524 opened with some military operations on the frontiers of Spain, that made the emperor amends for the ill success of his arms in the preceding campaign, for his troops, under the command of the constable of Castile, having entered Bearne in January, and taken Mueillan, St. Palais, and Sauveterre, and cut off all communication between Bayonne and Fontarabia, they invested this last place on the first of February, and on the twenty-seventh Frangel, the French governor, capitulated for a surrender; for which he was soon after condemned by a council of war, and degraded: however, the Spanish army suffered so much by the severity of the weather during this siege, and the toil of the operations, that it was not fit for any farther business for some time.

The emperor's arms were no less successful in Italy, where the confederate generals, at the head of whom was the constable of Bourbon, having taken Marignano, resolved to attack admiral Bonnivet before he should receive the reinforcement he expected from France. The operations of the allies, who took the field as early as the beginning of March this year, were so quick, that they actually drove the French quite out of the Milanese, and forced Bonnivet to repass the Alps. But this great success of the Imperialists alarmed not only the pope, but the duke of Milan and the Venetians, who now began to cool greatly in their ardour to the cause of the league, seeing themselves ready to be swallowed up by the Imperial power; and and the Venetians actually withdrew their troops out of the Milanese.

The evacuation of Italy left the emperor now at liberty to carry the war into the heart of France; and, agreeable to this scheme, which had been concerted between Charles, Henry, and the constable of Bourbon, the latter passed the Alps, and entered Provence about the end of July, with fifteen thousand foot, two thousand horse, and a train of eighteen pieces of cannon; and, after having made an easy conquest of the almost defenceless towns of Antibes, Frejus, Vignolles, and Aix, the imperial army, on the nineteenth day of August, sat down before Marseilles, which was defended by a garrison of three thousand foot and two hundred men at arms, besides nine thousand inhabitants, who took arms on the occasion. In the mean time don Hugh de Mençada, the Spanish admiral, who had been sent with a stout fleet from Genoa, to assist the operations of the land-forces, took Toulon. The siege continued to be vigorously, but ineffectually, pressed for almost a month; but on the approach of Francis, with an army of forty thousand men to its relief, the constable was obliged to rise from before the place and retreat with some precipitation into the Italian territories.

Francis hereupon resolved to march immediately into the Milanese by a shorter route; and the constable, being apprized of his design, redoubled his diligence in order to prevent it: thus the two armies, marching by different routes, arrived the same day, the one at Alba the other at Vercelli, both in that duchy; then the constable being joined by the vice-roy of Naples, at Pavia, they consulted upon what was to be done in this unlucky juncture, when finding money and provisions grow scarce, it was resolved to abandon Milan, where a terrible plague now raged, and having strongly reinforced the garrisons of Pavia and Alexandria, they retired to Socino. Thus Francis took possession of Milan without opposition, and undertook the siege of Pavia, one of the strongest fortresses in Italy, in the beginning of November.

The arrival of the French in Italy, and the success they had hitherto met with, determined the Venetians and Florentines to abandon the party of the emperor; and at the same time pope Clement VII. forgetful of the obligations he owed to Charles, or considering himself as the guardian of Italy, engaged privately to support Francis against the powerful confederacy which had been made to overwhelm him, and made a secret treaty with that monarch, by which he promised to give a free passage through his dominions to a body of French troops that were to march under the duke of Albany, now returned from Scotland, for the conquest of Naples, and who was accordingly sent thither early in the ensuing spring; and the pope published his accommodation with the French king, which he wanted the world to consider as the effect of compulsion. The emperor, however, saw through the trick, and even threatened to take severe vengeance on the treacherous pontiff; though, in truth, this league of Clement with Francis was in a great measure the cause of the success of Charles's arms, as it induced Francis to divide his forces, by which his army was greatly weakened.

Mean while the court of England seemed to adopt new maxims. By the agreement between the allied parties, while the emperor was making an attack upon Gascony with a powerful army, Henry was to have fallen with another, in conjunction with the Flemings, into Picardy; but this he had neglected to do, by which means Francis had been enabled to draw down in a manner the whole force of his kingdom to Avignon, and march to the relief of Marseilles, as has been already related. Not only so, but the king of England had discontinued the payment of a subsidy he had granted to the duke of Bourbon, and even demanded reimbursement of a sum of money he had lent Charles when he was last in England. These concurring proofs of a coolness to the general cause, alarmed the emperor not a little; and his suspicions were still farther increased by hearing from his ambassador in England, that a person sent by Louisa, countess of Angoulesme, mother of Francis, whom her son had left regent of his kingdom during his expedition into Italy, had been some time at Henry's court, where he had long and frequent conferences with cardinal Wolsey. In a word, Charles foresaw that the king of England intended no less than to abandon his cause, and engage in a league with his enemy, and doubted not that this alteration in the sentiments of Henry was owing to the instigation of Wolsey, out of revenge for his (Charles's) having twice disobliged him in the affair of the papacy; and the behaviour of pope Clement plainly shewed that he would second the endeavours of the cardinal.

That pontiff now shewed the greatest deference and respect to the court of England: he confirmed the title of Defender of the Faith, which his predecessor Leo had granted to Henry; he issued a bull, impowering the cardinal to suppress as many monasteries as he should think proper, to raise the yearly rent of three thousand ducats, to endow a college which he was about to found; and, in the month of December, he, with the king's consent, appointed cardinal Laurentius Campejo bishop of Salisbury.

We must now return to the siege of Pavia, to behold an event which made a very great alteration in the affairs of Europe, wherein England was deeply concerned.

Francis had weakened his army by the detachment he had sent off, under the duke of Albany, towards Naples; and Pavia, to which he had laid siege, being extremely well provided for a defence, the Imperial generals had some hopes of attacking the French at a disadvantage. The arrival of the duke of Bourbon, who joined Lannoy, vice-roy of Naples, with twelve thousand Germans, on February 9, 1525, determined the Imperialists to attempt to raise the siege of Pavia: with this view they marched within a mile of the French camp. They were not yet so strong as the enemy; but having no money to pay their forces, it was necessary for them to come to an action, lest their men should disband, which would have proved full as fatal as the loss of a battle. Had Francis raised the siege, the Imperial troops would doubtless have dispersed, and he might have reduced the Milanese without any difficulty; but thinking his honour concerned, he resolved either to make himself master of Pavia, or lose his life before the place.

As the French camp was very strongly entrenched, the constable was obliged to wait above a fortnight before he could put his resolves of attacking Francis in execution. Mean while however, the Swiss having recalled their six thousand men from the French service, and these troops departing notwithstanding all the king's endeavours to detain them, besides the desertion of three thousand Italians under John de Medici, who disbanded themselves, the constable thought he should no longer neglect an opportunity so favourable to his purpose; and on the eve of St. Matthias, February 24, being the emperor's birth-day, he attacked the French camp in the dead of the night.

Upon the first alarm being given, Francis put himself at the head of two thousand gens d'armes within the camp, and fell with such impetuosity upon a body of troops, commanded by the marquis of Pescara, that this general was unhorsed and dangerously wounded, and the entire body he commanded must have been ruined, had not he been succoured by the duke of Bourbon, who had already made a terrible carnage in another quarter of the camp, and now returning, fell upon the French gens d'armes with irresistible fury: all that the great officers now surviving could do, was to assemble and defend the person of their sovereign, who fought like a knight-errant, sword in hand: la Pelisse, la Tremouille, Galeas de San Severino, and admiral Bonnivet fell by his side, and he was surrounded by the Imperial cavalry, the officers of which perceiving, by his armour, that he was some person of great rank, resolved to take him alive, and for that purpose slew his horse: in his fall he received a wound in the leg, notwithstanding which he started up, and still fought on foot with surprising prowess.

It happened that Pomperant, an officer of some distinction, who had accompanied the duke of Bourbon in his revolt, came up at that instant, who seeing the king in such a dangerous situation, drew his sword, and, placing himself by the side of Francis, assisted him in keeping off the soldiers who pressed upon him in order to take him alive; at the same time he desired that the duke of Bourbon might be called to receive the king as a prisoner: Francis, transported with rage, declared that he would rather die than deliver his sword to a traitor; then, turning to Pomperant, "Send for Lannoy, viceroy of Naples (said he), to him I will surrender." That officer accordingly approaching, the king said to him, in the Italian language, "Mr. de Lannoy, there is the sword of a king, who deserves some commendation, seeing, before he parts with it, he has made use of it in shedding the blood of many of your army, and who is not a prisoner through cowardice, but the accidents of fortune." Lannoy received the sword upon his knee, and respectfully kissed the king's hand, to whom he then presented his own sword, saying, "I beg your majesty will be so good as to receive mine, which hath this day spared the lives of many Frenchmen; it does not become the emperor's officer to leave a king disarmed, though a prisoner."

Francis was now conveyed to the viceroy's tent, where his wounds were dressed, and he was treated with all possible respect. Lannoy is said to have begged his majesty would see the constable of Bourbon, who, at his request, was admitted, and, kissed his hand: but some historians assert, that he positively refused to admit the duke into his presence. He ought not to have provoked the duke's resentment by acts of tyranny and injustice, which, by the law of nature, cancel the obligation of allegiance, for the duties of allegiance and protection are reciprocal. Next day Francis was conducted to the strong fortress of Pizighitoni, where he remained for some time under the guard of Alva-zon, the Spanish governor of the place, who preserved to him all the punctilios of decorum. On the fourteenth of August, the royal captive was, by the emperor's order, conducted to Madrid.

Never was letter more true than that which this prince wrote to the queen regent, his mother, the night after the battle: "Madam, all is lost, save our honour." Every thing seemed to foretel his inevitable ruin. His frontiers were unguarded, his treasury exhausted, a general consternation prevailed throughout all orders of the state, and violent dissensions in the council of the queen, who governed the kingdom during his absence; lastly, the king of England threatened France with an invasion, and to revive the fatal times of Edward III. and Henry V.

Charles V. without having as yet unsheathed his sword, kept a great king prisoner in his capital of Madrid: and here Charles for once seems to have neglected to make the utmost of his good fortune; for, instead of entering France in person, to take advantage of the victory his generals had gained in Italy, he remained idle in Spain; and in room of seizing Milan for himself, he thought it necessary to bestow the investiture of that duchy on Francis Sforza, that he might not give umbrage to the rest of Italy. Henry of England likewise, instead of joining with Charles to dismember France, became jealous of his rising greatness, and resolved to support France against the emperor; for which purpose he, on the ninth of June, entered into treaty with the queen regent, for procuring the liberty of her son; and this negotiation was carried on so heartily, that, on the third of August, a treaty of peace and alliance was actually signed between John Joachim de Passau, lord of Vaux, and John Brinon, president of Rouen, ambassadors from the queen mother of France, at London; and the archbishop of Canterbury, the duke of Norfolk, treasurer of England, the marquis of Exeter, the earl of Worcester, the bishop of Ely, and sir Thomas Moore, sub-treasurer of England, on the other*. In a word,

* The principal articles of this treaty (as we find them in the Fœdera, vol. xiv. p. 39) were as follow:

"That all transactions of the late war should be forgot and forgiven on both sides, and that the subjects of the two crowns should live together in good correspondence.

"That they should furnish succours to one another in case of an attack from a third power; which succours were to be in proportion to their several abilities.

"That the intercourse of commerce should be again opened between the two nations; neither side to harbour the rebels of the other.

"That prisoners on both sides should be released; and that their several allies should be comprehended in the treaty. But that neither of the contracting powers should maintain or protect those allies in any usurpations which they have made since the date of the treaty of London in 1518.

"That Francis should, within three months after he is at liberty, ratify the present treaty.

"That the constable of Bourbon, the duke of Vendosme and Longueville, the count de St. Paul de Lautrec, the count de Sevelles, the lords of Montmorency and Breslay, with the counts Maufurier and Brunne, and nine of the chief cities in the kingdom of France should engage for Francis's ratifying and fulfilling the said treaty."

By another treaty, which is dated at Tours, the sixteenth of August, and ratified the thirtieth of the same month, at word, the captivity of Francis, which to all appearance should have occasioned such great revolutions, produced nothing of any consequence or advantage to England or the empire.

The court of France had too much sense; if not gratitude, to forget the good offices of cardinal Wolsey on this occasion, to whose management Henry committed this, as he did almost every other affair of state: the cardinal was promised the arrears of the pension which had been granted to him in lieu of the administration of the bishopric of Tournay, which amounted to the sum of twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and ninety-three crowns of gold, and furthermore gratified with the additional sum of one hundred thousand crowns of gold. And now Henry finding his treasury was almost emptied, he committed the care of recruiting it to Wolsey.

That minister, instead of applying to parliament, from which he had already received a repulse, issued a decree, in the king's name, to levy through the whole realm one sixth of all lay revenues, and a fourth of the clergy's effects. This impost was considered as such a violent encroachment on the liberty of the subject, and such a flagrant violation of Magna Charta, that it produced a general clamour over the whole nation, and almost caused a rebellion; which being represented to the king, he disowned the measure, saying that "no necessities of his, though ever so great, should make him attempt the raising money in any other way than by the people's consent in parliament." Thus this illegal project of the cardinal was defeated, though it has left an indelible stain upon his memory: however, he soon fell upon another method of fleecing the subject, which he thought would not appear altogether so odious; this was by way of benevolence: and to carry that through, he sent for the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and told them, that he had prevailed with the king to recal his commission for the heavy tax, and to throw himself on their free-gifts. But in this he was likewise disappointed, for the magistrates of London refused to submit to the imposition, alleging, that the practice of raising money by benevolence had been abolished by Richard III. In short, the court finding that they could not carry their point in any way, it was laid aside, and a general pardon was issued for all delinquents, on account either of the loan or the benevolence.

Henry seems to have been hitherto unacquainted with the arbitrary measures of the cardinal, and to have imagined that the people were happy and contented under his mild and gentle administration; but the clamours and frequent insurrections which had happened in consequence of the late attempts to oppress the subject having satisfied him to the contrary, he was highly incensed against the favourite, who could not appease his master's wrath without the most humble and abject submission: he produced his will, in which he had left all his substance to the king; and at length found means to convince him, that all he did was for his honour, and should turn out for his profit. To confirm his protestations by deeds, he made Henry, about this time, a present of his stately palace at Hampton-court; and in return the king granted him this year letters patent for the founding of his college at Oxford, of which farther notice will be taken in the ecclesiastical part of this history.

Before the close of this year, several promotions were made: among others, Henry Fitzroy, the king's natural son, by the lady Elizabeth Blunt, daughter of sir John Blunt, and widow of sir Gilbert Talbois, was made duke of Richmond and Somerset, earl of Nottingham, and lord high-admiral of all the king's dominions, English, French, and Irish. This young nobleman, though he died before he attained his eighteenth year, is much celebrated by the writers of that time for his accomplishments both of body and mind.

Towards the end of this year almost all the powers of Europe interested themselves in procuring the liberty of Francis; but the emperor insisted upon such harsh terms, that Francis declared he was resolved to suffer any extremity rather than give way to them, and actually sent into France, by the duchess of Alençon, his sister, who had come to visit him in his confinement at Madrid, a public act signed by his own hand, consenting that his son, the dauphin, should be crowned king of France, while he himself would remain a captive for the rest of his days.

This appearance of resolution in Francis had so great an effect on Charles, together with the generous advice and remonstrance of Guatimara, the Imperial chancellor, that the former began to abate considerably in his demands, and to treat in earnest of Francis's liberty, and a treaty was accordingly signed on the fourteenth of January, 1526, at Madrid, the principal articles of which are as follow.

"That Francis should give up to the emperor all the duchy of Burgundy, with its dependencies, with full sovereignty, within six weeks after the king's return to France, without any regard to the decrees of parliament, the Salique law, or any other claim.

"That Francis should be set at liberty, in his own kingdom, by the tenth of March ensuing, at which time the dauphin and the duke of Orleans, his two eldest sons, were to be put into the emperor's hands as hostages; or, instead of the duke of Orleans, the duke of Vendosme and Albany, with ten other of the chief nobility of France: but this last alternative was at the option of the duchess regent. It was likewise agreed, that upon the return of those hostages to France, the duke of Angoulême, third son to Francis, should be given to Charles, to be kept and brought up in his court; and with him Francis likewise obliged himself, in case the restitution of Burgundy should not be made in six weeks, to return prisoner to Charles.

"Francis gives up all his pretensions to the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, the lordship of Genoa, the county of Asti, Arras, Tournay, Mortaigne, St. Amand, Lisle, Douay, Orchies, Hedin, and also all sovereignty which he could pretend to over the countries of Flanders and Artois, and all other territories which the emperor was actually in possession of.

"That the emperor should resign all his rights and pretensions to the cities and lordships of Pe-

More (a house of king Henry's) a state is formed of all the arrears and demands which Henry had upon France, amounting in the whole to two millions of crowns; and the manner in which they were to be paid is settled; and the same cautioners as before, were bound to see it discharged.

ronne, Montdidier, Roan, Boulogne, Guisnes, Ponthieu, and all the cities and territories lying upon the river Somme.

“That there shall be between the two powers a league offensive and defensive; and that the king shall be obliged to furnish troops to the emperor, for completing the conquest of the duchy of Milan.

“That Francis should marry the emperor’s sister, the queen dowager of Portugal; who was to have from the emperor two hundred thousand crowns, with several lordships in dispute between the two powers; but upon condition of her renouncing all other pretensions and demands upon the house of Austria, unless the emperor and his brother should die without children. The dauphin was likewise to marry Mary, infanta of Portugal, and daughter to the late king Emanuel, and to the queen dowager, who was to be Francis’s wife.

“Francis was to do all he could to engage Henry d’Albret, king of Navarre, to renounce his pretensions upon that crown: and if he could not prevail in this, he was to give him no assistance. He was likewise to withdraw all support from the dukes of Gueldres and Wirtemberg, and the house of la Mark; and to lend his fleet, fitted out at his own expence for three months, to carry the emperor, when he had a mind to go to Italy for his coronation.

“The duke of Bourbon was to re-enter into possession of all his estates, as were all his followers; and they were to be left at liberty without ransom: he was likewise to indemnify the Castilians, and other Spaniards, for what they had suffered in the late war, to the amount of three hundred thousand ducats: and the governess of the Low Countries was to be indemnified for Francis’s keeping her out of the possession of the county of Charolois*.”

Such, with some other private stipulations, was the famous treaty of Madrid, which Francis bound himself by oath to ratify at the first town he should enter upon his arrival in his own dominions; but the ceremonies of exchanging Francis for the hostages could not be performed till the eighteenth of March, when he was set at liberty; and arriving at Bayonne, he immediately dispatched a letter to Henry of England, thanking him for the great share he had in his deliverance; but when the Imperial minister waited on him, requiring him to ratify the treaty, he made such evasions as plainly shewed that he was resolved not to be bound to the performance. This double-dealing gave rise to mutual reproaches between the emperor and him; the lye given on each side, challenges in consequence of that, and a thousand idle actions, which threw a kind of ridicule on the most important events, and seemed to degrade the two chief personages in Christendom.

As soon as Francis arrived at Bourdeaux, he ratified the treaty concluded at More with the king of England. From Bourdeaux he came to Cognac, where he made some stay with the viceroy of Naples, still in his train, pressing him to ratify and execute the treaty of Madrid, or return to Spain, as he had sworn to do when he signed that treaty; but all in vain, for the French monarch at length told the viceroy in plain terms, that as the treaty did not concern himself alone, but all his realm, particularly his subjects of Burgundy, he could not therefore ratify it before he had assembled the states of his kingdom, especially those of that duchy.” But he offered to give the emperor two millions of crowns as an equivalent for Burgundy; but Charles would not consent to the least alteration in the treaty.

The pope, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, had readily foreseen that Francis would act in this manner, as the treaty of Madrid had been extorted from him, while under confinement, and therefore they sent private agents to Cognac, who having found Dr. Taylor there, who had been sent by Wolsey from the court of England, they, on conferring together, soon found out that their dispositions were the same, namely, to curb the rising power of the emperor; and having sounded Francis on this head, they likewise found him perfectly ready to concur with them therein, and in a short time they concluded a treaty with Francis, at Cognac, on the twenty-second of May, which was christened by the name of the Most Holy League, and was entirely the effect of that great ascendancy which England had then in the affairs of Europe, for the terms were in a manner dictated by Wolsey, and were as follow.

“The allies were, at their common expence, to levy an army of thirty thousand foot, two thousand five hundred men at arms, and three thousand light horse, the particular number which each power was to furnish being specified: and the like agreement made with regard to the ships and galleys they were respectively to equip. They were immediately to levy Swiss troops, and Francis was to assist them therein by his credit with the cantons, whom he was to engage, if possible, to undertake the defence of the Milanese, on the same conditions they had done formerly. The king of France engaged never to disturb Francis Sforza in the enjoyment of the duchy of Milan, upon his paying him an annuity not exceeding fifty thousand crowns a year, in lieu of his pretensions, and providing for his brother Maximilian, who had for some years had a large pension in France for his subsistence. The duke was likewise to marry a princess of the blood of France, chosen by the pope; and the county of Asti was to be restored to the king as having been the estate of his ancestors; or at least, the government thereof be given to his son, the duke of Orleans. The sovereignty and title of lord of Genoa were to be restored to the king: and if the emperor rejected the common request of all the allies, for setting the two sons of France at liberty; for leaving all the Italian princes in quiet possession of their territories; for being attended, when he came to Italy to be crowned, with no greater a train than the pope, the duke of Milan, and the Venetians should think consistent with the safety of the country, and suitable to his imperial dignity; and for paying the sums he owed to the king of England, by several treaties; they were, when they had driven his troops out of the Milanese, to invade Naples. If this kingdom was reduced, the pope was to dispose of it; but whoever should be placed on the throne was to pay the king of France an annuity not less than seventy-five thousand crowns a year; otherwise this prince was to reclaim all his rights, and might enter thereon. The family of Medici was to be maintained at Florence, with all their rights and prerogatives.

And the king of England, being declared protector of the league, was, in gratitude for his services, to have a duchy or principality in Naples, worth thirty-six thousand ducats a year; and the cardinal of York, for his good services, was to have another of ten thousand; to themselves and successors*."

Such were the principal articles of this league, which was made while the Imperial ambassadors were at Cognac, though they knew nothing of it till the next month. In the mean time they represented to Francis, that, notwithstanding the states of Burgundy might refuse to comply with the promised cession of that duchy, his majesty might still keep his word by returning to his prison in Spain, as his ancestor, king John, had done with regard to England. But Francis complained of the ill treatment he had met with in his captivity, and repeated his offer of two millions of crowns in lieu of Burgundy, and the like sum for the ransom of his two sons. The ambassadors upon this sent another express to their court, who returned with the emperor's ultimate resolution, to run all hazards rather than suffer the least abatement in the articles stipulated by the treaty of Madrid.

The ambassadors returning this answer from their master, were surprized with the league above-mentioned being published in their presence; upon this they took their leave of the French court immediately, and returned to Spain.

The chief view of the French king in entering into the league of Cognac, seems to have been to frighten the emperor, hoping that the open declaration of the court of England to assist him with all its forces, would give weight to the instances that Henry was at this time actually making at the Imperial court for delivering him back his children; and accordingly he was not very forward in drawing the sword, because willing to leave room for an accommodation. But this conduct had almost proved the ruin of the Italian states; for the pope and the Venetians, relying upon the assistance of France and England, sent their troops into the field, under the command of the duke of Urbino; but the Swiss forces, who were paid by France, and the marquis de Saluces, who commanded the French troops in Italy, were so slow in their motions, that Sforza, duke of Milan, who still remained shut up in the castle of that city, was obliged, on the twenty-fourth of July, to surrender to the duke of Bourbon, the emperor's general, and retire to Lodi, which had been taken by the pope's troops.

And now Charles resolved to chastize those allies who had deserted him in the time of danger: of these the most considerable was the Roman pontiff, who, though he had chiefly owed his election to the good offices of the emperor, had been so ungrateful as to abandon the interest of his benefactor, and espouse the cause of the French monarch. In order to punish his holiness for this instance of perfidy and ingratitude, Charles commanded the duke of Burgundy to advance towards the city of Rome, and attack Clement VII. in his capital, Bourbon executed his commission with equal bravery and conduct; and, though he lost his life in the attempt†, the prince of Orange, who succeeded him in the command, continued the assault with so much vigour and resolution, that the city was at length stormed and sacked, and the pope himself made prisoner.

The kings of France and England were so greatly alarmed at the rapid run of success which constantly attended the emperor's arms, that they now engaged in a fresh league to oppose the growing power of that formidable monarch. Accordingly, Francis having sent a solemn embassy to London, in the spring of the year 1527, the negotiators made so good use of their time, that, on the last day of April, according to the lord Herbert, three treaties were concluded. The contents of the first were,

"That the two kings should jointly send ambassadors to the emperor, with offers concerning the ransom of the two hostages, and to demand the payment of what was due to the king of England.

"That if he rejected the offers, or gave no answer within twenty days, the two kings should proclaim war against him.

"Another article of this treaty contained a mutual engagement for the marriage of Francis, or his son the duke of Orleans, with the princess Mary, at the king of France's choice, and upon such terms as should be agreed on when the time came‡." Probably, this treaty was to be made public, in order to induce the emperor to desist from his claim to Burgundy and be satisfied with the offered equivalent.

By the second, it was agreed, "That in case the emperor rejected their proposals or deferred his answer, all commerce should be forbidden with his subjects by the two kings, allowing them however forty days to withdraw their effects.

"That the two kings should make war upon the emperor in the Low Countries, with an army of thirty thousand foot and fifteen hundred men at arms, and that two thirds of the foot and all the horse || should be furnished by the king of France.

"That they should equip a fleet with fifteen thousand men, whereof the king of France should find ten thousand.

"That if the king of Portugal or any other prince or state should join with the emperor, they should be declared enemies to both the kings.

"That the pope and Venetians should be deemed included in the league, provided they continued the war in Italy.

"That the king of France should endeavour to persuade the king of Navarre, the duke of Gueldres, and Robert de la Mark, to make war upon the emperor.

"That the two kings should use their joint endeavours to encourage John de Zapol to prosecute his right to the crown of Hungary, in case he had not already made an alliance with the Turk, in order to keep the emperor's brother Ferdinand employed in those parts.

"That the league should be notified to the princes of Germany, and the two kings endeavour to prevent their assisting the emperor."

The substance of the third treaty was:

|| Twenty thousand foot, and fifteen hundred men at arms. Lord Herbert, p. 81.

"I. That this treaty should not derogate from that of More, which remained in force.

"II. That there should be perpetual peace between Francis and Henry and their respective subjects.

"III. That neither of them should give aid or advice to any person whatever that should attack the dominions of the other.

"IV. Henry renounced for himself and successors all right and title to the kingdom of France, and in general, whatever Francis now possessed.

"V. In consideration whereof, Francis bound himself and successors to pay to Henry's successors an annual pension for ever, of fifty thousand crowns, at two payments; namely, on the first of May and the first of November, and that the payment of the pension should commence, on the first of those two days which should happen after Henry's death, without deduction of what should remain to be paid after Henry's decease of the two millions stipulated by the treaty of More.

"VI. Moreover Francis bound himself to give yearly to Henry fifteen thousand crowns worth of salt of Bruage[¶], besides the fore-mentioned fifty thousand crowns.

"VII. That to prevent the objection which might hereafter be made, that a king cannot bind his successors, the two kings should cause the treaty to be confirmed by the states of their realms, and held as a perpetual and inviolable law.

"VIII. That the treaty should be approved and confirmed by the archbishops, bishops, princes, dukes, earls, barons, and other great men of the two kingdoms, whose names were inserted in this article, under forfeiture of all their goods; and by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouse, Roan, Bourdeaux, as well as by all the courts of justice in England."

The news of the pope's captivity arriving soon after the conclusion of these treaties, the parties agreed, that, instead of carrying the war on in the Low Countries, they should act solely in Italy; and as English troops could not be transported into that country without great trouble, time, and expence, the French king took upon himself the maintenance of the war, on condition of Henry's paying him a certain monthly subsidy. And now, as a mutual earnest of friendship, Francis bestowed upon Henry the order of a knight of St. Michael; while Henry, in return, chose Francis a knight of the Garter.

The pope's imprisonment affording reason to suspect that the emperor might force him to some improper use of his ecclesiastical authority, cardinal Wolsey was sent over to Francis about the measures fit to be taken on the subject. They met at Amiens, and, on the eighteenth of August, agreed, "that neither king should allow a general council (the liberty of which constituted its principal authority) to be either called or sit, nor admit any bull to be issued to the prejudice of either realms, whilst the pope continued in captivity; and that the method of government in spiritual matters, in both realms, during that time, should be settled for England by the cardinal of York, with the concurrence of a convocation; and in France, by the king and an assembly of the French clergy: at the same time it was agreed, that the princess Mary of England should be given to the duke of Orleans (instead of Francis), as of a more suitable age for her; and that this young prince should be brought up in the court of England*.

The emperor was extremely perplexed at these negotiations, and sought to break their force by seeming to comply with the propositions which Francis had made to the viceroy of Naples, when the latter required him to ratify the treaty of Madrid: but he paid all the compliment of this compliance to Henry, whose ambassadors at his court were daily pressing for the enlargement of the pope; and he now published a kind of manifesto, as from himself, addressed to the English ambassadors, dated at Valladolid, in which he specifies not only his own concessions, but the offers of Francis: a copy of these articles were also transmitted to Wolsey, who was acquainted that Charles had signified he was willing to have them moderated by the king of England. At the same time, to bring that monarch, if possible, off from the allies of the Clementine or Most Holy League, Charles offered by one of his ministers, to give the daughter of Portugal, with the Milanese for her dowry, to the duke of Richmond, Henry's beloved natural son; but matters had now taken a new turn, and very little attention was paid to what Charles proposed, who next endeavoured to gain over the cardinal, by advantageous offers; but Wolsey was too far engaged with Francis to retreat, or he was determined at all events to be revenged on the emperor, by whom he had been twice deceived; and perhaps the king's divorce from Catherine was already resolved upon, in which case he could not possibly espouse the interest of Charles. Certain it is, the cardinal, in a letter to the king, dated on the thirty-first of August, told him it was already reported in Spain, that his majesty intended to obtain a divorce; and counselled him to send orders to his ambassadors in that country to stifle the rumour as soon possible, by alleging it had no other foundation than some scruples expressed by the bishop of Tarbe, one of the plenipotentiaries from the French king to the court of England, on the subject of the proposed match between the duke of Orleans and the princess Mary, as if there had been some room to doubt her legitimacy.

At the same time the cardinal shewed himself resolved to compass his ends by arms, if he could not by treaty; at least he continued to act as if arms were the most effectual means to give success to negotiations, for he persuaded Francis to send orders to marshal Lautrec, his general for Italy, to advance into that country, in support of the Clementine league, at the head of the French army, which was to join that of the Italian princes.

Accordingly, on the first of August, Lautrec, entering the Milanese, took Alexandria; and soon after, assisted by Doria, who commanded a squadron of fourteen galleys for the king of France, he invested Genoa by sea and land, and obliged that city to capitulate, and the marshal de Trevulcé was appointed to command the garrison. The Lomeline, Vigninano, Bragassa, and Pavia were his next conquests; and Antonio de Legna, who commanded in Milan, not having a sufficient force to resist him, he might easily have made himself master of that capital; but by his affected delays he plainly shewed that he had private orders not to be too much in earnest. The king of France was as yet uncertain of the issue of the treaty for the ransom of his sons; and if the emperor could be prevailed upon to accept of the cession of the Milanese instead of Burgundy, rather than run the hazard of losing both, that project would have been obstructed by the putting of Francis Sforza in possession of the capital of his duchy.

These were not reasons to be urged to the princes of the league; but Wolsey having given the pope, who entirely depended upon the friendship of the English court, the strongest assurances that he should be set at liberty, cardinal Cibo was sent to summon Lautrec to march directly to Rome for the pope's relief, in consequence of the treaties lately concluded between the courts of England and France. Lautrec took a middle way between the solicitations of the duke of Milan and the Venetians, who pressed him to make himself sure of the Milanese, the applications of the pope, and the secret views of his own court. He left the conquest of Milan to be completed by the forces of the Venetians and Sforza; and, passing the Po, on the eighteenth of October, he took possession of Parma and Placentia, which opened their gates to him, and at the same time he found means to draw off the dukes of Ferrara and Mantua from the emperor's interest.

That prince, seeing the ill effects of his detaining the pope a captive in the storm that was raising against him, came to a resolution of setting his holiness at liberty, and had sent an order to the viceroy of Naples for that purpose; but as the security he exacted from the pope for his ransom was greater than the pontiff could grant, the negotiation proceeded very slowly; but the march of Lautrec for the ecclesiastical dominions hastened the treaty, which was at length concluded to this effect: "That the pope should not oppose the emperor with regard either to Milan or Naples; that his holiness should grant to Charles the tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues within his dominions; that he should pay ninety-five thousand ducats before he left the castle of St. Angelo (where he was detained prisoner), and thrice that sum afterwards; that, till the two first payments should be made, the pope should be conducted to some place of safety, out of Rome, and give hostages."

The treaty being signed, and the cardinals of Cessis and Orfino delivered in hostage, it was agreed, that, on the tenth of December, the pope should be taken out of the castle of St. Angelo, and conducted to a place appointed; but, as he was afraid of being detained a good while longer, as he was not in a condition to perform the pecuniary stipulations, he made his escape in disguise the night before, and was escorted by Lewis Gonzaga to Orvieto.

As soon as Lautrec heard that the pope was at liberty, he restored to him the city of Parma, and marched to Bologna, where he staid three weeks, expecting fresh orders from the king his master. Some days after, he received a letter from the pope, acknowledging himself indebted to the marshal for his liberty; at the same time acquainting him, that having been forced to grant the Imperialists whatever they were pleased to demand of him, he did not think himself bound to keep his word.

During these transactions on the continent, Henry's attention was engaged by an affair of a more domestic, and to him of a more important, nature: this was no other than a divorce from his queen Catherine, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Spain, and aunt to Charles V. This affair is the most remarkable we meet with in the history of almost any country, whether we consider it in itself, with respect to the parties concerned, or, for the consequences it was attended with.

Henry VIII. was, by nature, sensual, violent, and obstinate in his desires: he had lately cast his eyes on Anne Boleyn*, a young lady of his court, who at this juncture was one of the maids of honour to the queen; her free and sprightly carriage seemed to promise very little resistance, nevertheless she had still the prudence not to yield to the king's solicitations, by which she so inflamed his passion that he resolved to make her his wife.

But how was he to procure a divorce, or annul his marriage with a person like queen Catherine, whom he could not reproach with harshness, ill conduct, nor even that morose humour which is so frequently found in women of strict virtue? Add to this, that he had lived with her upwards of eighteen years, during which time she had brought him three children, of which there was one still living, viz. the princess Mary, afterwards queen of England. Catherine was a princess of the highest quality, powerful in her family, relations, and friends; her title to be his wife had been confirmed by all the sanction which could be given by that religion to which he and all the greatest princes of

* Anna, or Anne Boleyn was of a good though not a noble family. Sir Thomas Boleyn, her father, married a sister of the duke of Norfolk, and had by her this Anne, who was born, according to Camden, in 1507, about two years before Henry VIII. mounted the throne. Her father was twice ambassador to Francis I. in 1515, and again in 1517. He was made viscount Rochford in 1525; and afterwards earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, in right of his mother. Anne, his daughter, when only seven years of age, was carried over to France, in 1514, when Mary, the king's sister, went and consummated her marriage, at Abbeville, with Lewis XII. and after that king's decease she continued in the French court, in the same post about Claude, consort of Francis I. till that queen's decease, when she was taken into the family of Margaret, duchess of Alençon. Coming from France in 1525, her father brought her to court, where Henry's queen Catherine took such a liking to her, that she made her one of her maids of honour. Her fine person, lively wit, and pleasant and agreeable conversation, accompanied with all the ease, politeness, accomplishments, and graces, which an education in the court of France could give her, naturally procured her many admirers; among these, Henry, lord Percy, son and heir to the earl of Northumberland, gained so much upon her affections, that solemn promises of marriage were made between them, in the presence of witnesses. This coming to the king's ears, who was by this time deeply smitten himself, he employed Wolsey, whose pupil the young nobleman was, to break off the match. Both parties were obliged to release each other from their promises; but retained ever after a violent resentment against the cardinal. As for the lord Percy, he was, by his father, soon after married to the daughter of the earl of Shrewsbury: and we shall see Anne mount the royal bed, and from thence be conducted to the scaffold. Sir Roger Twissden's Account of Anne Boleyn, from an authentic MS. T. Sebright, No. 9.

Europe were devoted. This princess, as we have already seen, was first married to prince Arthur, eldest son to Henry VII. who died a few months after the nuptials. Henry procured a dispensation from pope Julius II. and made a contract of marriage between her and his second son, this Henry VIII. who, as soon as he came to the crown by his father's death, was solemnly espoused to her. A considerable time afterwards he had a natural son by one of his mistresses, whom he created duke of Richmond, and of whom he was remarkably fond; but he had then only conceived a dislike to his marriage, and no scruples of conscience: but as soon as he fell so passionately in love with Anne Boleyn, and found that he could not obtain her without marriage, he instantly began to feel a remorse of conscience, and shuddered to think how much he had offended God by having lived eighteen years with Catherine of Arragon as his wife.

He was not long before he opened to Wolsey the great secret of his heart; and this artful minister, affecting to believe that those sentiments did not spring from the distaste of an old, nor the love of a new object, but purely from scruples of conscience, fell in with his master's designs about the divorce, and thought he could not have found a time more favourable than the present to his wishes: France depended on the friendship of England, and the pope could be relieved only by Henry's support; and Wolsey doubted not, by his address, his authority, and the force of his money (he being then about to set out for France, whither he was to carry with him twenty four thousand pounds in specie) that he should be able to procure powers to himself from the pope for determining the matter of the divorce in Henry's favour.

As the pope was at this time in captivity, and no suits could be regularly carried on in the court of Rome, two methods were proposed for getting the affair dispatched: one was, to engage the cardinals, not imprisoned with the pope, to meet at Avignon, and take upon them the administration of ecclesiastical affairs during Clement's detention: the other was, to obtain from the pope a commission, constituting Wolsey his vicar-general in all countries on this side the Alps*. But the latter of these methods was disagreeable to the French, and the former was deemed very difficult, if not impracticable.

However, as the pope's compliance with any request of the court of England was not doubted, under his present circumstances, the king sent Dr. Knight as his envoy to Rome, ordering him to pass by Compeigne, in France, where the cardinal then was, and to receive his eminency's instructions for his conduct. Knight did so; and having received them, proceeded on his journey, being furnished with two instruments, drawn up in England and revised by the cardinal, which the pope was to be requested to sign, viz. a commission to Wolsey, empowering him to call in whom he pleased to his assistance, to enquire into the validity of pope Julius's bull; to proceed in the cause, and to give sentence with regard to the divorce and subsequent marriage: for which last the pope was likewise desired to grant a dispensation. He was also to bind himself never to repeal these acts. At the same time Knight was furnished with ten thousand ducats, to be employed in getting the chief cardinals over to favour his solicitations. But as the pope was prisoner, and guarded by a Spanish captain, it was impossible for Knight to have an audience; he found means, however, to convey to his holiness a memorial, containing the sum of his commission, to which the pope returned a favourable answer: but as it was impracticable for the English envoy to have access to the pontiff's person, the matter was carried no farther at that time.

This seems to have occasioned Henry's recalling the cardinal from France, in order to consult him again on the difficulties attending this affair: Wolsey accordingly arrived on the thirtieth of September, bringing back with him the great-seal of England, which, by an unprecedented strain of power, he had carried over to France, and left at Calais.

Upon the pope's escaping from Rome to Orvieto, on the ninth of December, Knight followed him thither, as did also sir Gregory Cassali, the king's agent in Italy, and renewed their instances for the acts being forthwith expedited. Clement's circumstances were now such that he was greatly perplexed how to act. To have annulled the marriage under the present circumstances of its being contracted and consummated contrary to a law which was morally irreversible, and eternally binding, would have given a mortal blow to the high claim of the dispensing power in popes: to grant the acts in his then situation, while the French army was at a distance from his relief, and while he was surrounded by the troops of his inveterate enemy, appeared to him certain destruction. On the other hand, he knew of what great service the court of England had been, and could be, to him, and dreaded every thing from its resentment, should he disoblige Henry in this favourite point. He therefore endeavoured to find a medium between throwing himself entirely into the arms of the emperor, and making him his irreconcilable enemy; he therefore set all his wits to work to spin out the affair by ways and means the king mistrusted not: to that end he told the English envoys, that, before he signed the acts, he should be glad to consult the cardinal de Santi Quatro.

Knight and Cassali, on hearing this, immediately repaired to that cardinal, and offered him four thousand crowns down, if he would befriend them in their suit, with other promises more than sufficient to bias a needy and plundered Italian: he promised them all the good offices in his power; but his eminency and the pope seem to have understood each other perfectly well, for the cardinal having examined the instruments drawn up by Wolsey, found very great faults in them, particularly in the affair of the commission, and took upon him to draw up one more perfect: which done, Knight and Cassali went to the pope, and pressed him to sign.

His holiness finding himself so much pressed, put into their hands the commission for cardinal Wolsey to try the marriage, and the dispensation for the king; but with this express provision, that Henry should not proceed to any process upon them before his holiness was delivered from all apprehensions from the Imperialists; at the same time he persuaded the envoys to accept of the acts with a post-date, viz. April 13, 1528; by which he had it in his power, as the commission could not operate before this date, to revoke it, in case the emperor was successful; or deliberate upon the confirmation of it, if the allies should prevail. As for the bull of decretal, to annul the marriage of Henry with Catherine, he promised to send it to England after the agents. Thus, however urgent Henry was to have this affair terminated, he found, at the close of the year 1527, that he was but just where he began.

While this affair was thus warmly soliciting at the court of Rome, a very strong spirit was working at the English court against cardinal Wolsey, by means of the new favourite, Anne Boleyn, who, being in her heart a great favourer of the reformation began in religion by Luther and his followers, and knowing Wolsey to be a professed enemy to that sect, and to possess all Henry's esteem, she used all her endeavours to estrange that prince from him. Something of this kind seems to have been effected about this time, for Knight having set out for England with the commission and dispensation, left Cassali behind at Orvietto, who received a dispatch, dated December 27, but from whence it does not appear, requiring him to apply to the pope for a legate to be sent over to England for determining the matter of a divorce. It is certain that Wolsey does not appear to have been actuated in his proceedings in this affair, by any regard he had for Anne Boleyn; it rather seems that he had winked at the king's growing passion for her, but had never thought it would have terminated in matrimony; and that when he found this likely to be the case, he cooled in the zeal he had before expressed for the divorce; and this might occasion the sending for a legate, who might be tempted by advantageous offers to stir more heartily in favour of the king's desires.

Be that as it may, Cassali, on receiving this dispatch, waited on the pope, and communicated the contents thereof to him. Clement was extremely alarmed at the demand, which could not, as the former acts had been, be granted without throwing off the mask, and declaring to the Imperialists, who were still masters of Rome, that he was resolved to proceed in the matter of the divorce: his holiness, in this dilemma, ordered the cardinals de Santi Quatro and Simonetta, two of the most able of that venerable body remaining about him, to attend while the demand of the English court should be debated before sir Gregory Cassali. After mature consultation and deliberation, the pope gave it as his opinion, "That if the queen should, as she certainly would, protest against the proceedings so carried on in an incompetent place, and by judges who had it not in their power to be impartial, and appeal to his tribunal, he could not help avocating the thing to himself, which would give such advantages to the Imperialists, as might disappoint all Henry's wishes. That this being the unavoidable consequence of any judicial proceeding, he thought Henry's best way, if he really was convinced in consciousness of the unlawfulness of his marriage, was to proceed upon the commission sent to Wolsey by secretary Knight, or upon his legatine capacity, and for the king immediately, without any manner of noise, to marry another wife, and then to send for a legate in full form to confirm the sentence." The two cardinals were strongly of the same opinion; and told Cassali, "That in case the queen should appeal, his holiness could not, without flying in the face of all justice and decency, refuse an inhibition to the Imperialists, and an avocation of the whole process to the court of Rome: but that if the king went so far as an actual marriage, the pope could not be solicited for any inhibition, and would take care to confirm all the proceedings, so as that there should be no manner of dispute upon it." His holiness, at the same time, charged Cassali, who was an Italian, to signify to the English court, that these were only the sentiments of the two cardinals, Santi Quatro and Simonetta. As to the proposal of sending a legate, he said, "there were but six cardinals of all the conclave qualified in point of abilities to be sent, five of whom were very improper, on account of their bodily infirmities; and that Campejo, who was very ill of the gout at Rome, was the only proper person to be trusted: his holiness concluded with desiring Cassali to acquaint the English court of his earnest dispositions to oblige Henry in the affair, saying, that he was sure the emperor never would forgive him for what he had done, and that he threw himself into his majesty's arms; that he had but very faint hopes of relief from the French, or from any but the king of England and the cardinal of York*."

Henry looked upon this as a snare of the pope's. He considered, that it was not possible to have such a cause tried without noise, since it was necessary the queen should be heard, otherwise the sentence would be evidently void: in the next place, should he do what the pope proposed, he would have been entirely at the pontiff's mercy, who, according to the opinion of the canonists, would have had it in his power to refuse to confirm the cardinal's sentence, as well as the marriage that should be contracted in consequence thereof. It was therefore determined to apply directly to the pope, and require new bulls, on pretence that the cardinal of York found his commission insufficient. Pursuant to this resolution the king sent Stephen Gardiner, Wolsey's secretary, and Edward Fox, both of them able men, the first one of the best canonists, the latter one of the deepest theologists in the age, to manage the affair. They were instructed to declare to the pope, that the king, conceiving the dispensation to be insufficient to his purpose, they were come to have all impediments removed, in a more full and less exceptionable manner. Here we shall leave them, as we are now to attend the progress of the war and differences among the three great powers of Europe, which had so great an influence in forwarding or retarding Henry's solicitations with the pope.

The French and English ambassadors had in vain exerted their utmost endeavours with the emperor to moderate the articles of the treaty of Madrid; but, after an infinite number of memorials, propositions, and replies, the emperor could only be brought to relax in the point of Burgundy, consenting that his right to that duchy should be determined in a way of justice; upon which both French and English ambassadors desired leave to depart, which was very readily granted them: and, after they were gone, two persons, who had come with them in their train, and whose characters were hitherto unknown, desired an audience of Charles, and appeared to be the one Clarencieux and the other Guienne king at arms, who, being admitted into the Imperial presence, on the twenty-second day of January, 1528, at Burgos, Guienne defied Charles, in the name of Francis, on the following accounts: for not agreeing to a just and honourable peace, and for detaining the two royal hostages; for not paying to the king of England the money due to him; for having detained the pope a prisoner; and for kindling a war in Italy. It was next the turn of Clarencieux, who spoke like the herald of him who was arbiter of the Christian world, requiring Charles instantly to accept of the terms of peace which had been offered, or to receive his declaration of war, which he then pronounced. But both heralds, before they finished their speeches, declared they had orders to offer forty days notice to the subjects of Charles, for withdrawing their persons and effects out of the dominions of the kings their masters.

A few days after, Charles ordered a long laboured reply to be given to Clarencieux: it consisted, in the first place, of a gentle reproach to Henry, who seemed to seek for a quarrel: Charles said, "That, upon his brother of England's account, he had abated in the demands he could have made by the treaty of Madrid, even so far as to be contented to accept of the same proposals which Francis, when at liberty, had made to the viceroy of Naples: he disclaimed having had any hand in the captivity of the pope, who he declared was now free: and he laid the non-payment of the just debts he owed to Henry, upon the ambassadors of the latter not being furnished with the original bonds and contracts, without which he could, as he said, have no full acquittance: the matter of indemnification was, he said, not without its difficulties, which would require commissioners on both sides to remove: as to the penalty upon the marriage, he said, the civilians and canonists were agreed, that all penal stipulations, whereby the free power of marrying in a proper place, are, ipso facto, void: that Henry could not make it appear, that he had fulfilled on his part the treaty of Windsor, of which he sought to avail himself: that he had required the princess Mary to be sent to him, but had been refused; and that he had sufficient proofs in his hands of a marriage-treaty between her and the king of Scotland, even while the contract between her and him (Charles) was supposed to be in full force; and this, as he conceived, turned the penalty upon Henry: he next took notice of the treatment de Praet, his ambassador, met with at the court of England, only for doing his duty; of the same court's entertaining Joachim, a declared French agent, in direct violation of the treaties between himself and Henry: he complained of Henry rising in his demands, in proportion as he abated in his; and of the gross affront offered to the imperial house, if, as fame reported, Henry was soliciting a divorce from his queen: he next proceeds to reproach him with endeavouring to palm upon him a bastard (as Henry must imply the princess Mary to be), if he was soliciting such a divorce: he concludes with a bitter invective against the cardinal, whose insatiable ambition, he says, led him to be his implacable enemy, because he would not employ his army in Italy to make him pope, as he (the cardinal) had desired, and procured his master to write to him (Charles) to the like effect."

But the emperor dealt not so complaisantly with the king of France's herald, whom he ordered to tell his master, that he had acted like a knave and a villain, and that he would maintain it body to body; adding, that Francis ought not to have forgot the last conversation they had together. It seems, before Francis left Spain, the emperor asking him one day, whether he did really and truly intend to perform all the articles capitulated between them? the latter answered, "Yes; and when you find that I do not keep my word with you, I wish and consent that you hold me and publish me for a knave and a villain*." Francis, however, though conscious of his having made this solemn protestation, was so incensed at the use the emperor had made of it, that, in an instrument drawn up by his own hand, and read on the twenty-eighth of March before the Imperial ambassador at Paris, he gave the lye direct to the emperor, accepted his challenge, and required Charles to appoint the field, which he did in the very place where Francis had been exchanged with his two sons; but some difficulties arising thereon, and Francis affecting delays, these ebullitions of a violent resentment passed over without any great effects.

The declaration of war was not agreeable either to the English or the Flemings, as it put a stop to the commerce, wherein both found great advantages, and being followed by a seizure of the English merchants and their effects in Spain, which produced a like seizure in England and the Low Countries. The pope's being set at liberty had cooled the resentment which the English had conceived against the emperor on account of his holding him captive, and their animosities against France revived. The clothiers, spinners, carders, and other manufacturers in the country, suffered by the merchants not buying the cloths sent to Blackwell-hall, under pretence they had no vend for any commodities: this gave occasion to a general uneasiness, and Wolsey was blamed for precipitating the declaration of war, though agreeable, in the main, to the king's intentions, and the stipulations with France for acting jointly in that matter: but the Flemings, on their side, making the like complaints, Margaret of Austria sent ambassadors to London to propose a truce for eight months with regard to all the countries under her government. This was signed on the fifteenth of June, by her's and the English plenipotentiaries, and confirmed afterwards by the king of France and the emperor. This treaty put a stop to the war in all parts but Italy, the affairs of which country now claim a part of our attention.

As soon as it was known that the negotiations in Spain had ended in a declaration of war, the marshal de Lautrec entered Romagna, and, having reduced Imola and Rimini to the pope's obedience, advanced, in the beginning of February, this year, 1528, towards Rome, which the Imperialists, whose forces were by this time reduced to fifteen thousand, immediately quitted, and retired into the kingdom of Naples, whither Lautrec followed them; and, after having reduced several strong towns in that kingdom to his obedience, he, on the ninth of May, sat down before the city of Naples itself; but as the viceroy, Moncada, had thrown himself into the place with the greatest part of the Imperial forces, the marshal would not venture to take it by force, but resolved to reduce it by famine. With this view he posted his army, amounting to thirty thousand men, round the city by land, while Philippino Doria blocked it up on the sea side with two men of war and eight galleys, belonging to his uncle Andrew Doria: by this disposition the besieged were reduced to great straits, and the French general thought himself at the eve of reducing the capital of Naples, when Andrew Doria, having taken some disgust against the French king, recalled his nephew Philippino with his galleys, and declared for the emperor; so that the French army, having no longer a communication by sea, suffered as much as the besieged from a scarcity of provisions. At length, to add to their misfortunes, their camp was infected by the plague, which carried off the greatest part of the officers and soldiers; and the marshal de Lautrec himself being seized with the distemper, he died of it on the sixteenth of August. He was succeeded in the command by the marquis de Saluces, who immediately abandoned the enterprize, and retreated to Averfa, where he was besieged in his turn by the Imperialists, and obliged to surrender at discretion. Much about the same time Andrew Doria, having taken Genoa in the emperor's name, restored his country to liberty, establishing that form of government which the inhabitants still retain*. Thus the affairs of Italy, which, in the beginning of this year, had so promising an aspect for Francis, were so entirely altered, that he had hardly any thing left in that country.

The war in Italy raised fresh obstacles to Henry's divorce from Catherine. Gardiner and Fox arriving at Orvieto when Lautrec was on his march towards Naples, pope Clement wanted to protract the discussion of this affair until he should see the success of the campaign, and for this purpose endeavoured to amuse Henry with a letter written in cypher, which nobody could explain. This behaviour was greatly resented by Henry, who sent orders to his envoys to insist upon his former demands, and at the same time to represent to his holiness, that the king was unalterably determined never to bed more with Catherine, on account of the scruples which troubled his conscience, "when he considered how expressly it was forbidden by the Levitical law, to uncover the nakedness of his brother's wife, or go in to his wife's sister. They were at the same time ordered to represent how much Henry was affected by the untimely deaths of several of his children, which he considered as a divine judgment upon him for his breach of the above sacred law, especially when he had no valid dispensation in the case, as several learned canonists had agreed that pope Julius's bull of dispensation being granted on the false suggestion of the marriage being necessary to preserve the peace between the crowns of England and Spain, and at the request of Henry (VIII.) then not above twelve years of age, and not only incapable of making such a request, but absolutely ignorant of the whole transaction; and being afterwards extinguished by a secret protestation against this marriage, which this prince made when he came to age of puberty, and by the death of Henry VII. was for these reasons invalid, and the marriage consequent thereupon illegal†."

Clement thus importuned, and animated by the hopes of seeing Naples soon reduced by the French (whose king strongly supported Henry's cause with the pope, both as his brother-in-law and ally, and likewise as the enemy of Charles V.) granted, on the twenty-eighth of June this year, a bull, appointing the cardinals Campejo and Wolsey his legates a latere, constituting them his vicegerents in the affair of the divorce, and for that purpose vesting them with his whole authority; he also consented to furnish Campejo with a decretal, annulling the king's marriage. These concessions were made at different periods, to protract the time; and when he was at last prevailed upon to sign the decretal, he did it very privately, without the knowledge of any of his council, and insisted that no other use should be made of it, but barely to shew it to the king and cardinal Wolsey. This last, considering it as an honourable testimony as well of his own merit and the pope's favour to him, as of his own zeal for the divorce, used afterwards very strong instances with Clement for leave that it might be shewn to the privy-council of England; but the Imperialists being by that time masters of Italy, the pope absolutely refused his consent; and (according to Burnet's Collection of Records) sent orders to Campejo, who had carried it over with him, to burn it, that he might be no more teased on the subject.

As this decretal was not to be made public, Gardiner laboured to get the intent of it answered, in some degree, by another instrument that might be shewed, and engaged the pope, on the third of July, to sign a promise, or, as it is termed, pollicitation, importing, "that he would not, on any pretence whatever, grant any bull, brief, or other writ for inhibiting or revoking the commission granted to the two legates, for delaying the process or for interrupting them in proceeding to the full and final execution of that commission: but if he should (which God forbid) do any thing of that kind, he declared every such act or attempt to be void, and adjudged it to be of no force or efficacy‡."

This seems to be the last act of compliance which the pope did in favour of Henry; for, notwithstanding all this prince's instances, supported by the strongest reasons of his envoys, Gardiner and Fox, for preventing all delays, Campejo, waiting the event of the siege of Naples, was so slow in his motions, that he did not reach London till the beginning of October. Upon his arrival in England, he began his legation by exhorting the king to live in good understanding with Catherine, and desist from his solicitation of the divorce: this advice being very ill received, he endeavoured to persuade the queen to consent to the separation; but his counsel was rejected by Catherine, who told him, she was the king's lawful wife, and so would continue until she should be declared otherwise by the sentence of the pope himself, for that she was resolved not to admit such partial judges as he and Wolsey were, to give sentence in the cause. Then the legate declared he could proceed no farther, till he sent to his holiness for fresh instructions.

Henry, vexed at these tedious and dilatory proceedings, sent, in December, sir Francis Bryan, cousin-german to Anne Boleyn, and Peter Vannes, his Latin secretary, to the court of Rome, to discover, if possible, the real sentiments of his holiness, to search the pope's chancery for a pretended brief*, which, as the queen's friends alleged, confirmed the dispensation of her marriage, granted by pope Julius II. and to propose some plausible expedients for facilitating the determination of the divorce. These agents, however, found it impossible to dive into the real designs of Clement. That subtle pontiff was at this time treating with the emperor, who made him very advantageous proposals to gain him over to his interest, which Clement, incensed at the Venetians for detaining Ravenna and Cerva from him, was not disinclined to accept; and he found means to protract the cause of the divorce by all the arts of delays, promises, and denials, in hopes that Henry's passion would not last so long as an Italian negotiation; but herein he was deceived, for the English monarch growing more and more impatient to enjoy the object of his amorous wishes, sent orders to his envoys to tell the pope plainly, in his name, that, should he refuse granting the satisfaction demanded, England would certainly renounce him and all the popes his successors; and that, as the king of England had engaged in the war merely with a view to deliver his holiness from imprisonment, all Christendom would look with horror upon his ingratitude, should he engage in any league against his deliverer, of which a report currently prevailed. These remonstrances, however, produced no effect upon the pope, who answered only in general terms, and pretended to think himself in a very dangerous situation, from which he could be relieved by nothing but the signal interposition of Heaven.

Although the pope seemed resolved to thwart the king, yet his holiness did not chuse to lose the only friend about Henry's person, who could preserve him firm with France, and break any views he might have of connections with the protestant princes, and therefore he still continued to heap favours upon Wolsey: he granted him several bulls for suppressing divers small monasteries, and many other grants towards the establishment of his two colleges, which he knew the cardinal had very much at heart; he also collated him to the rich bishopric of Winchester, vacant by the death of old Fox, which happened about this time.

Before we close the transactions of this year, it will be necessary to mention something concerning the affairs of Scotland. Henry, in the course of this year, sent ambassadors to the court of his nephew, James V. with proposals of peace; but as this could not be effected, on account of the distractions of that kingdom, which was divided into two factions, headed by the queen-dowager and the family of Douglas, a truce was concluded, at Berwick, for five years; in a separate article of which it was stipulated, "that the earl of Angus, his brother George, and uncle Archibald, might be received and protected in England, on condition that they should deliver up to their sovereign the places they held in Scotland; and that, in case they should make inroads into their own country, the king of England should repair the damages, as if it had been done by his own subjects†."

But now a violent distemper which seized the pope, in the beginning of the year 1529, seemed to be the forerunner of a very great change in the face of affairs. Gardiner communicating this intelligence to Wolsey, it revived in the latter all his ambition for the popedom: he again prevailed with Henry (though that monarch appears for some time to have entertained but an indifferent opinion of him) to send instructions, or rather he sent instructions in Henry's name, to his ambassadors at Rome, ordering them to do all that they could, either by promises, threats, or bribes, to engage the cardinals to elect him pope. But all his hopes were again blasted by the recovery of Clement, who from that time began to look upon the cardinal with an evil eye, and to regard him as a dangerous rival, who might one day supplant him on pretence of his bastardy, for which he had been already reproached, and even threatened with deposition by the emperor. In these sentiments he resolved to perplex both the cardinal and his master to the utmost of his power, and all the instances of the English ambassadors could not procure an explanation of the sollicitation formerly mentioned, which appeared very ambiguously worded, or an enlargement of the legate's commission, which was earnestly solicited, as necessary for a speedy determination of the cause, and for preventing its avocation during the process. The emperor's agents were indefatigable as well in opposing those motions, as in pressing for a revocation of the commission already given to the legates; and the pope was now so far engaged with the emperor, that he refused every thing the king desired.

Henry having nothing farther to expect from the court of Rome, recalled his ambassadors, and in their place dispatched William Benner, doctor of laws, with a letter to his holiness from the two legates, wherein, as it afterwards appeared, they alleged that the chief difficulty in the cause of the

* While Campejo was on the road for England, the emperor's ministers at Rome started a fresh obstacle to the divorce, by the pretended discovery of a brief of Julius II. confirming the bull of dispensation for Henry's marriage with Catherine; but there was this difference between the bull and the brief, that the pope said in the bull "the marriage was perhaps consummated;" whereas in the brief the word perhaps was left out: they inferred from thence, that Julius II. was not surprised, since he looked upon Catherine's first marriage as consummated. But this brief, of which they only gave an authentic copy, without shewing the original to the king's ministers, was, probably, proposed solely to cause time to be lost in examining it. For, there were two reasons, among many others, which manifestly proved it to be a forgery. The first was, that this brief, granted at Catherine's request, supposed that princess's marriage with Arthur to have been consummated, and yet she had sworn the contrary; and upon that her agents had grounded the validity of Julius's dispensation. The second reason was still more strong, namely, that the brief was dated the 26th of December, 1503. Now, as in the date of the briefs, the court of Rome begins the year the 25th of December, being Christ-mas-day, this date answered to the 26th of December, 1502, of the vulgar year, that is, ten months before Julius II. was pope.

divorce, was to determine how far the authority of the head of the church extended; and as this was a matter far above their cognizance, they persuaded his holiness to evoke the cause before his own tribunal, not doubting that the king would agree to this evocation, provided he might be previously assured that the cause would be determined in his favour. It is extremely difficult to account for the conduct of Wolsey on this occasion in joining in an advice so contrary to the interest and inclination of the king, with whom he must by such a step be for ever ruined; unless we suppose that he was either duped by his colleague, or actually betrayed the cause of his master. It may, perhaps, be no improbable conjecture, that Wolsey, finding his enemies at court had greatly estranged the king's mind from him, and that his interest was also ruined with the pope, he thought he had now no other chance for safety, but by doing somewhat that might make his party once more good with the emperor, who was now preparing to make matters up with France and England, that he might fall upon some expedient to prevent his disgrace with Henry.

Mean while Henry had such excellent intelligence abroad, that he intercepted most of the queen's correspondence, and at last came to the knowledge of a treaty which was upon the point of being concluded between the pope and the emperor. In short, every thing appeared as if there was a necessity of bringing matters to a sudden crisis. As there was no question that the pope, as soon as he had obtained his ends of the emperor, would recall the commission, and advocate the cause to Rome, Henry therefore importuned the legates to execute their commissions; and for that purpose he granted them, on the thirtieth of May, a licence, under the great seal, authorizing them to proceed with all freedom to the trial of the cause: and the next day they opened the court in the parliament-chamber at Black-friars, where their commission being read, an order was made for summoning the king and queen to appear there on Friday the eighteenth of June. Wolsey, as a proof of his impartiality, allowed Campejo to preside, though he himself was a senior cardinal.

The king and queen removed to their palace of Bridewell, to be nearer to the court; and, on the day appointed, they both made their appearance in court, having two seats placed under canopies of state, and raised somewhat higher than the legates, at whose feet sat the secretaries and other officers, the court being framed in the manner of a consistory, there being present divers bishops, doctors, lawyers, and learned counsellors: the counsel for the king were Dr. Sangton, dean of the chapel, and Dr. Bell; for the queen, Fisher, bishop of Rochester, Standish, bishop of St. Asaph, and Dr. Ridley, the last an eminent divine.

The court being opened by proclamation, the queen in person read an instrument, by which she refused the judges as partial and incompetent, and appealed to the pope, alleging that the cause was actually evoked, and depending before his holiness, and desiring to be allowed competent time for the proof of her allegation. The court then appointed the twenty-first for giving their opinion whether they would have any regard to the protest: and, upon the twenty-first both she and the king appeared again personally in court, to hear the determination of the legates upon the head, when the judges giving their opinion against admitting the protest and for proceeding, and the queen being called upon, rose, and, falling upon her knees before the king, without taking any notice of the court, addressed him in the following pathetic speech:

"Sir, I desire you to take some pity upon me, and do me justice and right: I am a poor woman, a stranger, born out of your dominions, having here no indifferent counsel, and less assurance of friendship. Alas! wherein have I offended, or what cause of displeasure have I given, that you intend thus to put me away? I take God to my judge, I have been to you a true and humble wife, ever conformable to your will and pleasure; never gainfaying any thing in which you took delight; without all grudge, or discontented countenance, I have loved all them that loved you, howsoever their affections have been to me-ward: I have borne you children, and have been your wife now these twenty years of my virginity and marriage-bed: I make God and your own conscience the judge: and if it otherwise be proved, I am content to be put from you with shame. The king your father, in his time, for wisdom was known to be a second Solomon; and Ferdinando of Spain, my father, accounted the wisest among their kings could they, in this match, be so far overseen; or are there now wiser and more learned men than at that time were? Surely it seemeth wonderful to me, that my marriage after twenty years should be thus called in question, with new invention against me, who never intended but honestly. Alas! sir, I see I am wronged, having no counsel to speak for me, but such as are your subjects, and cannot be indifferent upon my part. Therefore, I most humbly beseech you, even in charity, to stay this course, until I may have advice and council from Spain: if not, your grace's pleasure be done."

Having thus spoke, she arose, and, making the king a low reverence, departed out of the court, and never would appear in it more, or suffer any person to plead for her.

After her departure, Henry spoke extremely well of her personal behaviour and virtue, declaring, that in suing for a divorce from her, he acted purely from a motive of religion and conscience. Wolsey then standing up, made an humble request to the king, that his highness would be pleased to declare before that honourable assembly, whether he had been the cause of this his intended divorce, wherewith he was charged in the opinion of the people? Upon which Henry, in very strong terms, cleared the cardinal of that imputation, and laid the whole originally upon the objections started against the legitimacy of the princess Mary by the bishop of Tarbe, when sent to conclude a marriage between the duke of Orleans and that lady. He likewise said, that he had mentioned the same in confession to the bishop of Lincoln; at the same time he challenged the archbishop of Canterbury, whether he had not applied to him for the opinion of the bishop; and then produced an instrument, under their hand and seals, declaring, "that it was their opinion, that there were weighty reasons of conscience for the king's applying to the pope, for judging of the validity of the marriage."

Mean while the queen was cited to appear again, on the twenty-fifth of June; but, instead of complying, plying, she sent in her appeal in form, from whatever had been done, or should be done hereafter: upon which the court declared her contumacious; and the bishop of Bath was commanded to give her the same day a fresh and peremptory citation, certifying her, that if she did not appear, they would proceed in their business. But Catherine persisting in her resolution to pay no regard to the power of the court, on the twenty-eighth of the same month, twelve articles, containing the heads of what the legates were to proceed upon, relating to the queen's two marriages, and other matters of the divorce, were exhibited in the court, to be discussed by the examination of witnesses, which took up the best part of three weeks. The principal articles insisted upon, were, that prince Arthur and the king were brothers; that prince Arthur had married Catherine, and consummated the marriage; that, upon the death of prince Arthur, Henry, by virtue of a dispensation, had married the widow; that this marriage with his brother's wife was forbidden both by divine and human laws. The king's counsel insisted principally on the consummation of Arthur's marriage with Catherine, which the queen had denied with an oath, and which, notwithstanding, was proved by the testimony of several persons, as far as any thing of that nature can be proved*. It is therefore hard to conceive by what charm of bigotry and infatuation so wise and so virtuous a woman as queen Catherine confessedly was, could be deluded in persisting as she did, that she was a virgin at the time of her second marriage.

On the twenty-first of July, the king's protestation that he made against his marriage with Catherine, when prince of Wales, at the age of fourteen†, was read in the court; and his council closing their evidence, and demanding judgment, Friday the twenty-third of that month was assigned for the said purpose, and his court was now filled with expectation of the decisive sentence that was to crown his passion; but that happy moment was at a greater distance than they could possibly foresee, for Campejo had by this time received his final instructions from Rome, that every thing had been adjusted between the pope and the emperor, while a fresh proposal of accommodation had taken place between the emperor and Francis, and that the pope was resolved no longer to delay the avocation, concerning which the legates themselves had written to him, and for which he was receiving daily instances from the queen and the emperor. But it seems the avocation was not yet come, and

* Robert, viscount Fitz Walter, deposed, the prince was then about fifteen, and queen Catherine elder; and that the next day after being in bed together (which he remembered after they entered to be solemnly blessed), he waited at breakfast on prince Arthur, where Maurice St. John did carve, and the lord Fitz Walter gave drink; at which time the said Maurice demanding of the prince how he had done that night, the prince answered, "I have been in Spain this night."

Charles, duke of Suffolk deposed, that he was in the bishop of London's palace the morrow next following the day of marriage, and that he waited there upon the prince at breakfast; confirming however in effect the words of Maurice St. John, before set down. Farthermore he added, that the Shrove-tide following the marriage (which was in November preceding) the said prince began to decay and grow feeble in body; which grew, as the said St. John related, by reason the said prince lay with the lady.

Thomas, duke of Norfolk, lord-treasurer of England, deposed, that he being, the day after the marriage, in the bishop of London's palace, and the morrow after, at the prince's breakfast, heard the prince's words to Maurice St. John, when he said, he had been that night in the midst of Spain: by which words, and because prince Arthur was a gentleman of a good complexion and nature, and above fifteen, he believed that he carnally knew his lady; because himself, at the same age, did carnally know and use; and he believed this the rather, that he heard from credible witnesses, that the said prince Arthur did lie with the said lady Catherine five or six nights afterwards.

Anthony Willoughby, knight, deposed, that, being the morrow after the marriage, in the prince's privy-chamber, the said prince spoke, afore divers witnesses, these words, "Willoughby, give me a cup of ale, for I have been this night in the midst of Spain." After which he said, "Masters, it is a good pastime to have a wife." Which words he also repeated divers other times. Moreover, he heard say, they lay at Ludlow together the Shrove-tide following.

Thomas, viscount Rochford, deposed, that he heard divers of prince Arthur's followers confirm the words he used of having been in Spain. Moreover, he heard say, that the king, Henry VIII. was persuaded by his confessor, about two years since, to abstain from the bed of the lady Catherine, lest he should offend his conscience.

† This protestation, copied from the original deed written with his own hand, is here inserted, for the satisfaction of the curious reader.

"In the name of God, Amen. In the presence of you, reverend father in Christ, lord Richard, and apostolic bishop of Winchester, I, Henry, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester, do say, affirm, and by these writings declare, that although in the time of my minority, and when I was under the years of marriage, I absolutely contracted matrimony with the virtuous lady Catherine, daughter of the king of Spain; and although also, the said contract, by reason of my being under age, doth appear now of itself insufficient, weak, and of no force, vigour, or efficacy; yet forasmuch as that I am come to perfect years, and that thereby the said contract may, peradventure, be thought and seem, by silent consent, mutual abode in one house, by giving gifts and tokens, or by any other way whatsoever, to be apparently sufficient and confirmed: therefore, I, Henry, prince of Wales, do hereby protest and make known to all men, that I intend not to prove, ratify, or confirm in any sort, this pretended contract, by any thing that I have said or shall say, have done or shall do; but I do at this present renounce the same freely of my own accord, unconstrained either by force, fraud, intreaty, or any way else; and I deny it, and wholly propose and intend quite to relinquish this pretended contract of matrimony, by the best ways and means that by law more fully, effectually, and sufficiently I may or shall be able to do; and expressly do disavow the same, according as by these presents I do disclaim it and disavow it; and so protest that I neither will, nor intend to consent unto the contract, or unto the said lady Catherine as my espousal wife, by any word, or deed, act, or gesture, to be spoke, done, performed, or acted by me, or in my name, by any whomsoever, whensoever, or howsoever, for the time to come. In witness whereof I desire, require, intreat, and adjure you all to give testimony hereunto. By me, HENRY, prince of Wales.

The above-written protestation was read and made by the aforesaid noble prince, lord Henry, in the presence of the right reverend father and lord in Christ, the lord Richard, by divine permission bishop of Winchester, sitting judicially in his court; and I the writer of this act in his behalf appointed, and in the presence of the under-named witnesses, in the year of our Lord God 1505, the eighth indiction of the most holy see of our father and lord in Christ, by divine providence, pope Julius II. in his second year, and the twenty-seventh of the month of June; in which day the said worthy prince was of perfect years of marriage, as then he did there affirm in a certain outward court within the royal palace of Richmond, situate in the west part of the said palace aforesaid, concerning all and singular which things the most noble prince aforesaid instantly required and intreated me, the aforesaid notary, to frame an instrument; and likewise the witnesses, underwritten, to give testimony in justification of all and singular the premises, the aforesaid most noble prince, hath subscribed his name; and witnesses, aforesaid intreated and required, have subscribed their names with their own hands.

So it is as above said, which I, John Read, do witness, by my hand and seal.

The second protestation, when he came to years of marriage.

Campejo

Campejo had now no remedy left for preserving Henry's friendship and following the secret orders of the pope, than by pretending, that, as he and his brother legate sat there as a part of the consistory of Rome, they were obliged to observe the same days of vacation which were observed at Rome; and accordingly, when the twenty-third of July came, instead of proceeding to give judgment, he solemnly adjourned the court to the twenty-eighth of September following.

Henry was thunderstruck when he heard the adjournment pronounced, and that on the very day when he thought himself sure of a sentence in his favour, the hopes whereof had induced him to bear the affected delays of the court of Rome through all this process. The nation in general was as much offended at this dilatoriness of the legatine court in determining a cause of the utmost consequence to the peace and welfare of the kingdom.

It was but a few days after the adjournment of the legatine court, when the evocation arrived from Rome, by a courier, furnished with a bull summoning Henry to appear at Rome in forty days, on pain of incurring the highest censures of the church. Henry was now in the utmost perplexity; but, though extremely provoked with the pope, he yet thought proper to suppress his resentment; he would not, indeed, suffer the bull to be notified to him in form, but he told the legates that they were at full liberty to obey the pope's order. From this period we may justly date the commencement of Wolsey's fall; and, indeed, he had acted, during the whole course of this proceeding, with such a coldness and indifference as seemed to be altogether inconsistent with that zealous concern, which, on all other occasions, he ever manifested for the interest of his master: but we have already offered a conjecture to explain this ambiguity of conduct.

The case of this great minister was now very deplorable. The emperor and queen Catherine exerted their utmost efforts to ruin him in the king's opinion: they were at great pains to propagate reports, contrived on purpose to accomplish his destruction, and, by means of their agents, Henry received copies of letters condemning the divorce, which it was said the cardinal had sent privately to his holiness. The dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, with a strong party under their direction, laboured with all their influence to supplant him as the engrosser of the royal favour, and embraced all opportunities of misrepresenting his actions. But in all appearance neither their endeavours, nor those of the queen's faction, nor the envy and malignity of the world would have effected his disgrace without the support they received from Anne Boleyn's ascendancy over the mind of her royal lover. The cardinal had advised Henry not to marry her, wishing rather he would take to wife the duchess of Alençon, the princess Renée of France, or some other more suitable match; therefore she had declared herself an open and irreconcilable enemy, and used all her arts with Henry to compass his ruin. It was expected by every body, that Henry would have disgraced the cardinal immediately after the arrival of the bull of evocation from the court of Rome, but they were deceived; Henry had so much command of himself as not to take any manner of notice of his dislike to his proceedings; but, having given Campejo his audience of leave, in order to dispel the chagrin his disappointment had given him, and revive his spirits, he made a progress through some of the counties of England, but left Wolsey behind him, who from this time began to think he should not long continue in power, but still went on in his usual manner, and observing no alteration in the looks and behaviour of the courtiers towards him, did not imagine that his disgrace was so near as it proved. For his enemies, with Anne Boleyn at their head, who accompanied the king in his progress, had so effectually worked up that prince's mind, that, on his return from his journey, he resolved to gratify their revenge and his own resentment; and the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, Wolsey's foes, went by Henry's order to York Place, now Whitehall, and demanded of him the great-seal of England, which he at first refused to deliver, saying, he held it by patent during life; but next day they returned with their orders in writing under the king's hand, and required the cardinal at the same time to retire to Ashur, now Elsher, a house in Surry, on the banks of the Thames, which he held as bishop of Winchester. Wolsey, seeing Henry's hand to the paper, immediately delivered up the seal; and we shall leave him in his melancholy retreat, to take a view of the great affairs which were transacting during the course of this year on the continent.

The ill success of the French arms in Italy during the two last campaigns had disposed that court sincerely to peace; and on the other hand, the emperor, finding that he should reap little advantage from his conquests, so long as the pope continued the head of the Clementine League, resolved to make than pontiff his friend at all events, who, for the reasons we have already given, was no less desirous of being upon good terms with his Imperial majesty; in this mutual reconciliatory disposition they both went heartily to work by their plenipotentiaries, and, on the twenty-ninth of June this year, a treaty was signed at Barcelona, on the following terms:

“That the emperor should restore the family of the Medici to Florence, on the same foot as formerly: that he should cause Ravenna and Cervia to be delivered to the pope: that he should put him in possession of Modena and Reggio, saving the rights of the empire: that he should aid him to become master of Ferrara: that Francisco Sforza should be restored to Milan, if innocent, but if guilty, the emperor should not dispose of the duchy to any prince the pope should dislike: that the pope and emperor should employ their temporal and spiritual arms against the heretics of Germany: that Alexander de Medici should espouse Margaret, the emperor's natural daughter: that the pope should grant the emperor a fourth of the ecclesiastical revenues in his dominions, to wage war with the Turks: that he should absolve all that were any way concerned in the taking and sacking of Rome.”

Such were the terms of the treaty, which the emperor, notwithstanding his late success against the pope's allies, thought it his interest to accede to, and solemnly ratified them at Barcelona.

Mean while Francis I. seeing no other prospect of retrieving his children out of the hands of the emperor, resolved to effect an accommodation with him; but as they were not on such terms that either of them could make advances to, or treat with the other, Louisa, Francis's mother, and Margaret of Savoy, governante of the Netherlands, undertook the negociation, and Cambray was appointed to be the place of meeting; while Francis, in the interim, amused the Venetians, the Florentines, and the duke of Ferrara with the promise of marching into Italy at the head of a powerful army. However, Charles and Francis being both heartily inclined to a peace, the two ladies, who had undertaken the negociation for them, being joined by ambassadors from all the powers concerned in the Clementine League (those of England, which were bishop Tunstal and sir Thomas More, included), on the thirtieth day of August a treaty was concluded, upon the basis of the treaty of Madrid.

By the treaty of Cambray, the emperor agreed "to wave for the present his claim upon Burgundy: Francis, on his side engaged to pay two millions of gold crowns for the ransom of his children; to withdraw his troops from Italy; cede to Charles the sovereignty of Flanders and Artois; restore the county of Asti, with all that he still retained in the duchy of Milan; renounce all pretensions to the kingdom of Naples; espouse Eleanor, queen dowager of Portugal, the emperor's sister; and re-establish the heirs of the late duke of Bourbon in possession of all the estates of that family, which had been confiscated."

By this treaty Francis left all his allies to shift for themselves. The Florentines were obliged to make their peace with the emperor within four months after the ratification of the treaty; and the Venetians to give up all the sea-ports they had made themselves masters of, within the kingdom of Naples: as to the other allies of the French in Italy, no mention was made of them, and consequently they were left to the emperor's mercy.

It is not a little surprizing, that Henry having proclaimed war with the emperor by a herald, there was, however, no particular treaty between them, Henry on this occasion satisfying himself with a single article inserted in this treaty, whereby the king of France bound himself to pay the two hundred and ninety thousand crowns which the emperor owed him, and to redeem the rich fleur de lis which Maximilian had pawned to Henry VII. for fifty thousand crowns. He did yet more, he generously forgave Francis the first sum, and made a present to his godson Henry, the second son of the French king, of the other sum. This is a clear evidence, that in making this peace Francis I. had not dealt with Henry as he had done with the princes of Italy, but had convinced him of the necessity he was under of concluding it.

It is now time to return to that setting star, Wolsey, who still continued fluctuating between hope and despair, the only support he had to grasp at being the king's private affection, which he imagined would not suffer him to be given up now that his hair had grown grey in his service; but his enemies having gotten the king in the mind to chastize this overgrown favourite, omitted nothing that could keep him in that disposition. Anne Boleyn dreaded nothing so much as that Henry should admit him to a personal interview, in which case she was afraid he might reinstate himself in his former favour.

The great-seal had, upon Wolsey's dismissal from the office of chancellor, been given to sir Thomas More, a person universally esteemed on the score of his integrity. Soon after, viz. on the ninth of October, Christopher Hales, the attorney-general, presented an information in the King's Bench against the cardinal, accusing him of having violated the statute of Præmunire, "in that he had obtained certain bulls from Clement VII. (who in this bill is treated with no other title than that of the bishop of Rome), by which he exercised jurisdiction and authority legatine, to the deprivation of the king's power established in the courts of justice, to the contempt of the king and his crown, and contrary to the statutes of 16 Richard II. against provisions;" with other charges of the like import.

Wolsey, finding that he was totally abandoned by the king, thought proper not to set up any defence, which he might very justly have done, arising from the king's assent to his exercising his legatine power; but by his attorney he confessed the facts as laid in the indictment, but pleaded ignorance of the statutes of Provision. Upon which the court gave sentence, "that he was out of the king's protection, and his lands, goods, and chattels forfeited, and that his person might be seized upon." In consequence of this sentence, which was founded on several additional articles*, amazingly weak and absurd, sir William Gascoyne, the cardinal's treasurer, delivered the whole of Wolsey's effects to Henry's officers, and, according to the authority of Cavendish, who was an eye-witness, they amounted to an immense value.

Thus fell the ablest minister England ever had seen, the victim of his master's resentment, not of his justice; and by this stroke of severity he saw himself on a sudden reduced from a state of more than princely affluence to the absolute want, for some days, of the common necessities of life, which so affected him, that he became abjectly disconsolate, and at length sickened in consequence of such repeated mortifications. Henry's tenderness seemed to revive when he heard of the cardinal's wretched condition, and he did, as it were by stealth, give him several assurances and marks of his kindness. It is true, his passion for Anne Boleyn would not suffer him fully to follow the dictates of his own heart, which must have told him, that, of all men, Wolsey merited not such treatment from him: however, he sent him a ruby as a present by his physician, Dr. Butts, who assured him that his highness was not angry with him in his heart, and that he should, in a little time, be convinced of his affec-

* These articles were forty-four, in number, importing, "That he had abused his legatine power; acted tyrannically in the office of chancellor, expedited divers orders of the utmost importance, and executed treaties, without the king's knowledge and concurrence; behaved despotically on many occasions, more like an Eastern sovereign than an English minister; practised extortion, bribery, and all manner of corruption; sought to equal, and even to prefer himself to his majesty, by writing in orders and instructions "Ego & rex meus"—I and my king;" and endangering his sovereign's health by breathing upon him, and whispering in his ear, when he knew himself deeply infected with the venereal distemper."

Nothing could be more absurd, than to accuse a man of high-treason for using the words "Ego & rex meus," which manner of expression is fully justified by the idiom of the Latin language, which requires, that the first person, though applied to a peasant, should always be preferred to the second and third, though denoting people in the most exalted station.

tion. This kind message contributed in a great measure to the recovery of the cardinal, who supplicated and obtained the king's permission to live for the benefit of the air at Richmond-house, which he had formerly received in exchange for Hampton-court.

The adjournment of the legatine court, and the removal of Wolsey, made Henry resolve to push his divorce with double vigour. He had been advised by Thomas Cranmer, a doctor of divinity, with whom he accidentally fell in company in his late progress, and who was a man of acknowledged piety, learning, and moderation, and withal a secret friend of the doctrine of Luther, to consult all the universities of Europe, with regard to this controverted point; alleging, that if they agreed to approve the king's marriage with Catherine, his majesty's scruples would cease of course; if they condemned it, the pope, he said, could not resist the opinion of all the learned men, nor longer run the risque of rejecting the solicitations of so great a monarch. Henry was delighted at this proposal, which to him seemed the oracle of peace, and he forthwith dispatched his agents to collect the opinions of all the universities of Europe*, and they were enjoined to spare neither money nor solicitations for obtaining a favourable decision.

It afforded an extraordinary and curious spectacle (says Mr. de Voltaire, in his Essay on General History †), to behold the king of England, on one side soliciting the several universities of Europe to be favourable to his passion; and the emperor on the other, pressing them as warmly for their decision in favour of his aunt; and the king of France between both, standing up for the Levitical law against that of Deuteronomy, in order to make the breach irreparable between Henry of England and Charles V. The emperor lavished benefices upon those Italian doctors, who wrote for the validity of Catherine's marriage; and Henry paid those as bountifully as gave their opinion in his favour.

At length the universities of France, particularly the Sorbonne, came to a resolution, that the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine of Arragon was unlawful, and that Julius had not power to dispense with the Levitical law.

Henry's agents went so far as to call in to their assistance the opinions of the Jewish rabbins, who acknowledged, that by the Deuteronomical law a man was commanded to marry his brother's widow; but, said they, this law related only to the country of Palestine, and it is the Levitical law which ought to be observed in England. The universities and rabbins of the Austrian territories were of a quite different opinion; but these, however, were not consulted. In short, Henry had the pleasure to find that, before the end of the ensuing year, 1530, it was unanimously agreed by all the learned bodies he had sent to consult, "that the king's marriage with Catherine of Arragon, being contrary to all laws divine and human, could never be rendered valid by the dispensation of pope Julius II."

Whilst the king was applying to foreign universities, he did not neglect asking the opinion of those in England; and in the beginning of the year

1530, he wrote a letter with his own hand to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, which he sent by Longland, bishop of Lincoln, to the former, and by secretary Gardiner and Dr. Edward Fox to the latter, requesting them to satisfy him, whether the marriage of a brother's relict was forbidden or not by the law of God and nature? After a violent opposition from the masters of arts at Oxford, and a keen contest at Cambridge between those who were on each side of the question, both those learned bodies agreed in determining, "that marrying the wife of a brother deceased without issue, after the consummation of his marriage, was forbidden Christians by the law of God and nature;" and it was in congregation ordered by each respective university, that its common-seal should be put to this determination. The opposition which had been made in these two great seminaries, and to combat which Henry had recourse to threats of a most irreligious and tyrannical import, and such as in effect took away the freedom of debate, was owing to those who hated the Lutheran reformers, who, they were afraid, would find too much countenance and protection under the influence of Anne Boleyn and Cranmer, which latter was now growing very fast into favour with the king.

Henry having overcome these obstacles, and perceiving that the court of Rome still continued to turn a deaf ear to all his remonstrances, persuaded his chief prelates and nobility to write a sharp and spirited letter to the pope, in which, after mentioning the many good offices which the king had formerly done to his holiness, the judgment of so many learned universities, and the little regard he had paid to so many weighty considerations, they plainly told him, that should he continue to amuse and deceive them in the affair of the divorce, they would renounce their connection with the see of Rome, and do themselves that justice which, whatever right they had to expect, they had so long in vain demanded from his holiness ‡.

Lord Herbert says this letter was drawn up in parliament, but that must be a mistake, the letter being dated the thirteenth of July; it appears by the records there could be no session at that time, the houses being prorogued from the twenty-first of June to the first of October. The letter it seems was first sent about to the chief members for their hands; and Cavendish tells us, that cardinal Wolsey himself signed it with the greatest apparent cheerfulness. It was subscribed by the two archbishops, four bishops, two dukes, two marquises, thirteen earls, two viscounts, twenty-three barons, twenty-two abbots, and eleven commoners; most of them in immediate dependence on, or expectation of, the king's favour.

The answer which Clement returned to this letter was so far from being satisfactory to Henry, that he plainly perceived he had nothing to expect but from his own power, assisted by the affections of his people; and, in order to prevent any step which Clement might take in favour of Catherine, or of the disgraced cardinal, he published a proclamation, forbidding all persons whatever to procure or receive any thing from Rome, or elsewhere, that might be prejudicial to his majesty's prerogative, or to promulgate any thing of that nature, upon pain of incurring the penalties mentioned in the statute of Provisors and Præmunire. He then appointed several learned men to compare all that had been written on the subject of the divorce, and out of all the transcripts of fathers and councils, to collect whatsoever might strengthen his cause. All these, and many more, were summed up in a short book, and printed, first in Latin and then in English, with the determinations of the universities before it*; and a particular answer to a book which Fisher, bishop of Rochester, had composed in defence of the marriage.

* To Orleans and Thoulouse were sent sir Francis Brian, Fox, afterwards bishop of Hereford, and Mr. William Paget; to Paris, Reginald Pole, of the blood royal; in Italy the king's agents were Dr. Richard Crooke, at Padua; Hieronimo de Genucci, bishop of Worcester, and sir Gregory Cassali, at

The parliament, while it continued sitting, was as favourable to Henry as he could possibly wish, taking into their consideration a great number of ecclesiastical grievances, and providing means of redress for the same; and even went so far that the commons sent Audley, their speaker, with thirty of their most considerable members, to complain to the house of peers against the bishop of Rochester, for reflecting upon the representatives of the English commons, by an expression he made use of, in the upper house, importing, "that nothing would satisfy the commons but the total ruin of the church." The charge, however, not being properly supported, the bishop, by some concessional interpretations, extricated himself from this troublesome affair.

Nevertheless, the commons proceeded to pass several bills for the reformation of the clergy, which had the assent of the lords. The contents of these bills will be found under their proper heads, at the end of this centennial period.

While these things were in agitation, cardinal Wolsey remained at his country-house at Richmond, living betwixt hope and fear, without being able to form any probable conjecture of the king's behaviour towards him; for at the same time that the compassion which the king expressed for him somewhat revived his drooping spirits, it made his enemies apprehensive of his return to court; and therefore they never ceased to alienate the king's mind from him, and, thinking him too near the court at Richmond, they prevailed on Henry to send him an order for retiring to his archbishopric of York. The cardinal obeyed this command, though not without great reluctance, and retired, by slow journeys, to Cawood, a castle about twelve miles from York, attended by a retinue of one hundred and twenty horsemen. He had, during the sitting of the parliament, the mortification to see a bill pass, ratifying the forfeiture of his effects and estates to the king, and, among others, his college at Oxford, which he had nearly completed, the loss of which, as he himself declared, gave him more heart-felt concern than that of all his pomp and riches: however, Henry afterwards founded it in his own name.

Wolsey, notwithstanding the disgrace he laboured under, had not entirely laid aside the thoughts of worldly grandeur; he intended to be installed, according to the ancient custom, with great solemnity, in the cathedral of York, which ceremony was to be performed on the seventh of November, with a magnificence little suitable to his circumstances. The king, indeed, had, in the beginning of the year, reinstated him in the possession of the revenues of his archbishopric, and those of the see of Winchester, with about six thousand pounds in plate, money, and furniture, part of his former great effects; and these, with some other marks of the royal favour, bestowed on him, made it thought that Henry's intention was rather to mortify the pride, than totally ruin the fortune of his old minister.

But his enemies did not allow him to remain long unmolested in his new retreat. He had, after he came to his diocese, applied himself strictly to the duties of his charge: and his assiduity in the pastoral care, his charity to the poor, his hospitality and obliging reception of all persons, had gained him the love and esteem of all orders of men in the country, and now, for the first time in his life, he began to be popular, the people crowding to see him and ask his benediction, wheresoever he passed. This popularity, with the great concourse of gentry expected on occasion of his installment, were made use of by Anne Boleyn and her party as a pretence to charge him with treasonable designs, which the jealousy of Henry disposed him too readily to suspect; and, on the fourth of November, the earl of Northumberland was sent down, with sir Walter Walsh, to arrest him for high-treason; which was done on the Friday before the designed solemnity of his installation: but the earl not producing his warrant, Wolsey refused to obey the arrest, at the same time insisting upon his privilege as cardinal; till sir Walter coming into the room, he readily submitted to him, as being sufficiently authorized by his post of gentleman of the king's privy-chamber.

The cardinal, still trusting to the repeated promises of Henry, set out with some degree of cheerfulness with his keeper towards London, who had the king's express command to allow him as much time as he should demand. Upon the road sir William Kingston, constable of the Tower, met him, with a party of guards, and told him that he was ordered by Henry to attend him to London, where he was to take his trial. At the sight of Kingston, Wolsey gave himself up for lost, nor could all the assurances of that gentleman, or the other royal officers, of the king's being favourably inclined towards him, gave him the least comfort; he seemed now to abandon himself to despair. Cavendish will have it that he took poison; however that might be, it is certain that one day, as he sat at dinner, in Sheffield castle, he was seized with an extraordinary coldness in his stomach; yet, ill as he was, he proceeded by small journeys to Leicester abbey, where he expired of a violent dysentery, on Tuesday the twenty-ninth of November, 1530†.

Such

* Burnet, vol. i. p. 97. Three of these MSS. are in the Cotton Library.

† Finding his end draw near, he admitted Kingston into the bed-chamber, where he held with him his last conversation, which is too important not to be given in the very words of Cavendish, who took them from the cardinal's own mouth.

"Sir (said Wolsey), I watch but God's pleasure to render up my poor soul to him; I pray you, have me heartily commended unto his royal majesty, and beseech him, on my behalf, to call to his princely remembrance all matters that have been between us, from the beginning, and the progress; and especially between good queen Catharine and him; then shall his grace's conscience know whether I have offended him, or not. He is a prince of most royal carriage, and hath a princely heart;

Such was the fate of the wisest and ablest statesman that ever directed the affairs of England; but however great his talents were, his address was still more wonderful, in managing, for twenty years together, such a prince as Henry was; a province to which none of those who succeeded him in power were equal. His low birth did not hinder his having a greatness of mind, and, as we have already seen, he formed noble designs for the encouragement of learning, and the reformation of the affairs of the kingdom. His administration was such as raised his king and country to an envied pitch of greatness. With regard to foreign affairs, while he had the sole administration, it was sound, great, and successful. With regard to domestic, his conduct was firm, but unpopular; this was owing to his too great obsequiousness to the will of an imperious prince, who, seduced by the intrigues of an artful and beloved mistress, sacrificed this useful servant, in the most ungrateful manner, to the malice of his enemies; and when we consider, that the following part of Henry's reign was much more unfortunate and criminal than that which was directed by Wolsey's counsels, we shall be apt to conclude, that if he deserved not the great praises which his few friends have bestowed upon him, neither did he merit the virulent reproaches with which his numerous enemies have loaded his memory. Certain it is, that almost all ranks and degrees of Henry's subjects had motives, either of interest or conscience, for condemning Wolsey: the papists hated him for shaking the very foundations of that policy by which their church had so long become a mart of iniquity and a den of thieves: the reformed, or protestants, could not bear him, because he was an enthusiast for the absurdities of the papal religion. But let not the reader imagine that we offer here any defence for the goodness of Wolsey's heart: it is but too true that his virtues were the result of the most dangerous vices, namely, an unbounded ambition and an insupportable vanity, to gratify which he frequently exercised great acts of cruelty and injustice. Thus, by seeming to care only for himself while in power, he fell unlamented, and died despised; furnishing a dreadful instance, that the boldest offender will, sooner or later, find himself unable to elude the wholesome laws which are the bulwarks of this happy nation, or to escape the punishment which they decree for those who insolently attempt to remove the palladium of English liberty! Before we dismiss this extraordinary subject from this part of our history, we shall, for the entertainment of our readers, give a brief account of his birth and surprising rise, as we have them transmitted to us from the best authorities.

Thomas Wolsey was born in March, 1471. He was the son of a butcher at Ipswich, in the county of Suffolk: as he gave very early indications of uncommon talents and address, his parents taxed their substance to the highest to give him a liberal education; and he was sent so young to Oxford, that he commenced bachelor of arts at fourteen years of age, from whence he was called the Boy-bachelor. Soon after he was elected fellow of Magdalen college, and, when master of arts, had the care of the school adjoining to that college committed to him. Being charged with the education of the marquis of Dorset's three sons, his lordship presented him to the rectory of Lymington, in Somersetshire, on the tenth of October, 1500. He had not long resided at his living, before sir Amias Powlet, a justice of peace, put him in the stocks for being drunk (as is said), and raising disturbance, at a fair in the neighbourhood. By the recommendation of sir John Nanfan, he was made one of the king's chaplains. In 1506, he was instituted to the rectory of Bedgrave, in the diocese of Norwich; having then, besides the rectory of Lymington, the vicarage of Lyde, in Kent*. Whilst he was king's chaplain, he insinuated himself into the favour of Fox, bishop of Winchester, and sir Thomas Lovel, who recommended him to the king as a fit person to be employed in negotiating the marriage between Henry VII. and Margaret, duchess of Savoy. He was dispatched to the emperor her father, and returned with such speed, that the king seeing him, supposed he had not been gone. Having reported his embassy, he was made dean of Lincoln, February 8, 1508, and on the 20th of the same month, prebendary of Walton Brinhold, in that church. In these circumstances he was when he was introduced at court by bishop Fox, after Henry VII's death, where he soon found means to insinuate himself into the favour of his son and successor†.

It is now time to turn our eyes towards the continent, and remark the principal transactions there, during the course of this year, so far as they relate to this country.

The treaties of Barcelona and Cambray, already mentioned, having effected a peace between the king of France and the emperor, the latter took shipping at Barcelona, with nine thousand men, and arrived at Genoa, where the peace of Cambray being published, the Venetians, the Florentines, and the dukes of Milan and Ferrara, finding themselves abandoned by France, were glad to refer the discussion of their affairs to a conference between Charles and the pope, at Bologna, where all their different ambassadors attended. There the emperor decreed, that the Venetians should restore Ravenna and Cervia to the pope, and to himself some places which they still occupied in the kingdom of Naples; Francis Sforza was put in possession of his duchy of Milan: and then repaired to Rome to receive the Imperial crown from the hands of the pope, and to kiss the feet of him whom he had so lately detained a captive; and then, at the request of his holiness, he ordered his army to march against the Florentines, who continued to refuse their obedience to the family of Medici; but, after a gallant defence, in which the emperor's general, the prince of Orange, was killed, they heart; but rather than he will miss or want any part of his will, he will endanger the one half of his kingdom. I do assure you, I have often kneeled before him, sometimes three hours together, to persuade him from his will and appetite, but could not prevail: Mr. Kingston, had I but served God as diligently as I have served the king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs. But this is the just reward I must receive for my diligent pains and study, not regarding the service of my God, but only to my prince: therefore let me advise you, if you be one of the privy-council, as by your wisdom you are fit, take heed what you put in the king's head; for you can never put it out again." The rest of this speech earnestly recommends to Henry the suppression of Lutheranism, and all other heresies: and in a few minutes after he expired.

were forced to submit, and Charles established Alexander de Medicis, his son-in-law, on the same footing which his ancestors had gained, and rendered the sovereign power hereditary in his family.

On the first of June, this year, Francis retrieved his two sons, who were hostages in Spain, upon paying the emperor one million two hundred thousand crowns in hand, and giving security for the payment of the rest of the sum; after that he married Eleanor, the emperor's sister and queen dowager of Portugal, pursuant to the treaty of Cambray. Thus the king of France saw himself at length in profound tranquillity, though the late war had cost him immense sums, the loss of Genoa and Milan, the sovereignty of Flanders and Artois, a year's captivity, an infinite deal of vexation, and no small portion of his honour and reputation.

As for the emperor, since he had made peace with France, and that Italy had in a manner submitted to his yoke, he became master of Spain, Italy, and the Low Countries; his brother Ferdinand was actually king of Bohemia, and had been elected king Hungary. Possessed of these advantages, Charles began to form mighty projects, and flattered himself with the hopes of having it in his power to subdue the rest of Europe*; and Henry received information from Crook, one of his agents at Venice, that the emperor was even then tampering with the Scots for invading England, and that he had resolved to pay them a subsidy for that purpose.

By this time the Reformation had made a considerable progress in Germany, although Charles had expelled Luther and all his adherents from the empire, and Clement VII. had endeavoured to use rough measures to extirpate this heresy, as it was called. This proceeding had raised such an animosity among the princes of the empire who favoured the reformed, that seemed to threaten a civil war; but Charles, thinking his late peace with France enabled him to command obedience, convoked a diet this year at Spire, where it was decreed, that no innovation should be made in religion. This decree was conceived to derogate from that liberty of conscience which former general assemblies had granted; and the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg; Ernest and Francis, dukes of Lunenburg; Philip, landgrave of Hesse; and Wolfgang, prince of Anhalt, with fourteen of the most considerable cities of the empire, opposed this new decree by a solemn protestation, with an appeal to a future general council: hence, from this time the Lutheran party came to be distinguished by the name of Protestants. The pope, provoked at their presumption, and dreading the thoughts of a general council, for fear of being deposed, prevailed on Charles, in an interview with him at Bologna, to adopt his sentiments, which were to make use of arms for suppressing the Protestants; alleging, that force was the only way of bringing back to the church persons that could not be otherwise silenced; and the emperor concurring with him in opinion, summoned a diet of the empire to meet at Augsburg, on the eighth of April in the succeeding year, 1531, resolving to carry every thing therein with the highest hand, and to compel the Protestants to submit to the church of Rome, without waiting for the judgment of a council.

But, notwithstanding that the emperor seemed so ready to please the pope in all such requests as he thought might tend to his own interest, yet he, on other occasions, sensibly mortified the pontiff, and in particular by obliging him to restore Modena and Reggio to the duke of Ferrara, which his holiness pretended was contrary to the article of the treaty of Barcelona: besides he now began to entertain a violent jealousy of the house of Austria, insomuch that we find him proposing, in the month of September, to give Henry a dispensation for having two wives; but Henry, encouraged by the disposition of his people, and the decision of all the learned bodies in Europe, in his favour, was determined to have every thing or nothing from the pope, who had no more power for granting a dispensation for living with two wives, than he had for dispensing with the king's marrying his brother's widow; and, in case of refusal, to disclaim all papal jurisdiction in the affair of the divorce, and abide by the determination of his own parliament and clergy.

For this purpose, on the sixth of January, 1531, a new session of parliament was held, after having undergone various prorogations, and sir Thomas More, the chancellor, opened it with a speech, wherein he set forth, "that the king's desire of seeing the marriage annulled, did not proceed from carnal motives, as some malicious tongues had insinuated, but arose purely from scruples of his own conscience, and his zeal for the good of his kingdom, that the succession to the throne might not be disputed after his death:" then he produced a great number of books and treatises, composed by the most learned divines and casuists in Europe, on the subject of the divorce, with extracts of several authors, both ancient and modern, and the decisions of the universities of France, Italy, and England: those were left on the table, for the perusal of the members. And in the mean time the king communicated his design to the convocation of the clergy, who unanimously agreed that the marriage was contrary to the law of God†.

This instance of complaisance, however, did not free them from a prosecution which Henry had determined to commence against them. Cardinal Wolsey had been found guilty of exercising the legatine power in England without a special licence from the king, and of disposing in that capacity of several benefices, contrary to the statutes of Provisors and Præmunire, consequently those who owned his authority were guilty of the same crime. This was the case with the whole body of the clergy, who were accordingly charged with having violated the laws of the realm. This prosecution was certainly most infamous, if we consider with what a plenitude of power the king had invested Wolsey; in vain did they plead, "that they supposed it agreeable to the king's will, who employed the cardinal all the time as his first minister, so that it was in vain for them to oppose his jurisdiction, inasmuch as such an attempt would have been unavoidably their ruin." They were told, that the laws being in force, they were to take notice of them at their peril, and ignorance was no excuse." They were found guilty of the crime with which they were charged, and all their effects were forfeited, and their persons put out of the king's protection.

However,

However, the king shewed himself ready, upon their petition, to accept of one hundred thousand pounds from the province of Canterbury, and to grant them a pardon. As to the province of York, they compounded for nineteen thousand pounds*. But the chief advantage which Henry received on this occasion was with regard to his prerogative; for in the petition which the clergy presented for their pardon, they unanimously styled him Protector and Supreme Head of the Church and Clergy of England†. We shall see hereafter what use Henry made of his new title.

The whole of Henry's proceeding in this affair seems to have been dictated by a desire of squeezing a large sum of money from the clergy, as also to humble the pride of that body. He knew he was supported by the commons, who were ready to go all lengths to curb the ecclesiastics, nor did he apprehend being opposed by the temporal peers. The Protestant religion was at this time secretly favoured by many persons in England, where the writings and sermons of Wickliff and his disciples had long ago began to dispel the mist of ignorance and superstition from the minds of the people; who, besides, were oppressed by the pope's usurpations, and scandalized at the lewd and immoral lives of the late pontiffs who had filled St. Peter's chair; so that they eagerly wished for an opportunity to deliver themselves from such an intolerable and disgraceful yoke: add to this, that Henry wisely judged, that such a shew of resolution on his side would, if any thing could, bring the pope to do whatever he could desire in his "weighty matter," by which name he affected to call the affair of his divorce.

There were few of the commons who had not, in some manner or another, maintained causes in the legatine court, and therefore they were as liable to the penalties of the statutes of Præmunire, &c. as the clergy themselves; and the spirit Henry had shewn against that body, made the members of the house of commons so apprehensive for their own safety, that they petitioned Henry to be included in the pardon intended to be issued to the clergy, which request he granted them§. This condescension had a very good effect in Henry's favour, for soon after this the parliament was prorogued¶; and the members, going to their several counties, filled the minds of the people against the pope, and with an high opinion of the king's clemency. Henry, on his part, as soon as the parliament broke up, caused the decisions and writings in favour of the divorce to be printed and published, that his subjects might have time to consider the case before the next session.

The queen having, towards the latter end of the year, sent a petition to the court of Rome, setting forth that Henry seemed resolved to proceed to a second marriage, Clement had published a brief, citing the king to appear at Rome, and another, dated the fifth of January this year, 1531, decreeing any such marriage void, and its issue illegitimate; it likewise required the king to live with the queen as his wife, and pronounced the severest penalties against all who should be assisting or accessory to any second marriage. When the news of this brief came to England it gave Henry prodigious disquiet, notwithstanding all the assurances he had of support from his parliament and people; he therefore not only laid the decision of the universities before his parliament, in the manner already related, but also thought proper to consult foreign lawyers upon the subject. The university of Orleans, famous for its faculty of law, gave it as a decision, "that the citation of a king to Rome in a matrimonial cause, which ought generally to be examined and determined in the country of the parties abode, was a thing unsupported by any precedent, and therefore the said citation, and all other process carried on against the king on occasion of his absence, were null and invalid, and contrary to all the reasons and method of law and equity‡." Henry, who had still some religious qualms hanging about him, made use also of the good offices of the king of France, and even wrote himself to the pope, "to get the cause remitted to England, as the place where it had arisen, and where, according to the canon of the primitive church, it ought to be tried||." But the answer of the pope was calculated only to prevail on him to constitute a proxy, that the Roman consistory might be in possession of the cause, and promising him in that case to administer speedy and impartial justice. The king, knowing well the consequences of such a step, would appoint no proxy to appear for him at Rome; nor would the pope consent to have the cause, which he had evoked before himself and the college of cardinals, be examined by delegates in England, in which he was greatly upheld by the Imperial faction in the college.

While Henry was thus careful to satisfy all the world of the uprightness of his intention, and the reasonableness of his conduct, he ordered a committee of his council to wait on queen Catherine with the determination of the universities on the matter of the divorce and citation, and to lay before her the consequences of her obstinacy, both as to the pope, to the kingdom, to herself, and to her posterity, offering to refer the whole affair to the judgment of four spiritual and four temporal lords. Catherine still standing obstinately to her appeal, and declining all jurisdiction but that of the pope, the king, who had hitherto in all respects (except in the point of abstaining from her bed) treated her as his queen, and behaved towards her in the gentlest and kindest manner, so that there was no outward appearance of a disagreement, resolved now to proceed in another manner, being not only vexed at her obstinacy, but highly resenting the indignity she had offered him by getting him cited to Rome, and therefore another message was sent her, importing, that his majesty desired to have no farther intercourse with her, and that she might chuse any one of the royal manors, at a distance from the court, for the place of her residence. To this message the queen answered with a noble spirit, "that she should, in obedience to his majesty's orders, remove from his presence; but that to what place soever she was sent, nothing could remove her from being the king's wife." She took her leave of the king at Windsor, on the fourteenth of July, after which it does not appear that Henry ever saw her: she retired first to More, then to East Hampstead, and afterwards to Ampt-hill.

What had lately passed in the parliament and convocation, and the near prospect of Anne Boleyn's being raised to the royal dignity, did not a little encourage the friends of the reformed religion. They began now to dispute openly about the most difficult and abstruse points of religion; but, by the indiscreet overflowing of their zeal, subjected themselves to some disagreeable checks. Henry, afraid of the consequences with which such a spirit, if too far indulged, might possibly be attended, resolved to convince his people, that, though he was inclined to shake off the papal yoke, he did not mean to violate the fundamental truths of Christianity, as held by the church, and therefore ordered the laws against heretics to be strictly put in execution; in consequence of which three Protestants, namely, Bilney, Bayfield, and Baynard (the two first ecclesiastics, and the other a lawyer) were condemned to the flames, and executed in Smithfield*.

The conferences between the emperor and the Protestant princes of Germany, at Augsburg, breaking up with increased animosities on both sides, the reformed princes and cities met, either personally or by their deputies, at Smalcald†, where they protested against the coronation of the emperor's brother Ferdinand of Austria, as king of the Romans, and wrote a letter to Henry, setting forth their grievances, and requesting his assistance, who answered them in such favourable terms, that, full of spirits, they prepared to take arms against the emperor; and the Swiss cantons, who had declared against the corruptions of the Romish church, offered to enter into the league, but were refused by the duke of Saxony, on account of some religious differences. Soon after, the emperor having raised a great army to take the field against the Turks, who, at the instigation of Francis (become jealous of Charles's increasing greatness), had invaded the dominions of the house of Austria, under their warlike emperor Solymán; the princes of the reformation, looking upon this army as designed against them, solicited both Henry and Francis for speedy succours: those two monarchs concluded an agreement with the princes of the league, and Francis persuaded Henry to assist them with fifty thousand crowns, remitted by the hands of the French ambassador at the English court. The resolution taken by the two kings to support the Protestants in Germany arose not from religious motives, but in order to oppose the growing power of the Austrian family. But it is now time to attend the affairs of England.

The parliament meeting, according to adjournment, in the month of January, 1532, the commons were almost unanimously inclined to redress the grievances the people had so long complained of in vain with respect to the papal power and ecclesiastical privileges. Accordingly, soon after their meeting, they presented an address to the king, intreating his majesty to agree to the reformation of several abuses which had crept into the immunities granted to the clergy, and of which they had compiled a whole volume, which was presented to the king by their speaker. Though nothing could be a more seasonable request to Henry, he decently dissimulated his satisfaction, and said, "he would come to no resolution till he had heard both parties‡." By this answer he meant to shew the clergy how much they stood in need of the royal protection, hated as they were by the parliament, which were entirely at his devotion. Several acts were passed, which slightly touched upon some of the privileges of the clergy, which were all allowed of by Henry, that he might strengthen his own power against that formidable body, and strike the greater terror into the court of Rome. But no act made so great a noise as one brought into this parliament against any person paying of future annates to the pope. The act sets forth so fully the intolerable grievances of the subject on this head, that it claims a place here for the reader's information. Its substance is as follows:

"That the kingdom was impoverished by the great sums paid to the Roman pontiff: that, since the second year of the late reign, above one hundred and sixty thousand pounds have been sent to Rome, on account of annates or first-fruits, palls and bulls for bishoprics: that the annates had been originally designed as a contribution for supporting a war against the Infidels; but as they were not applied to that purpose, it was decreed, that they should not be paid for the future: that no more than five per cent. of the annual revenue should be given for the bulls of bishoprics; that, if the pope should refuse to grant them on these terms, the bishop elect should be presented by the king to the metropolitan of the province, in order to be consecrated; but should the metropolitan refuse consecration, on pretence of wanting palls and bulls, two prelates appointed by the king should perform the ceremony; and then the elect should be held as lawfully consecrated. Nevertheless, the parliament declared, that the king should be at liberty to annul or confirm this act within the limited time; and if, in that interval, he should compromise his difference with the court of Rome, it should obtain the force and authority of a law; but should the pope, on account of this act, pretend to disturb the kingdom with sentence of excommunication and interdict, these censures should be utterly disregarded: all ecclesiastics were forbid to receive or publish them; but were enjoined to celebrate divine service, as if they had never been issued||."

But though the parliament shewed itself heartily disposed to promote the king's measures for humbling the court of Rome, and assisting him to extend his own power over the clergy of his kingdom, yet they would not suffer the least attempt to be made against any of those privileges and emoluments which they had gained from the weakening the feudal system in England, during the late reign.

* During this session of parliament, one Richard Rouse, a cook, on the sixteenth of February, poisoned some soup in the bishop of Rochester's kitchen, with which seventeen persons were mortally infected; one of the gentlemen died of it, and some poor people, that were charitably fed with the remainder, were also infected, one woman dying. The person was apprehended, and by act of parliament (22 Hen. VIII.) poisoning was declared treason, and Rouse was attainted and sentenced to be broiled to death, which was to be the punishment of poisoning for all times to come; (but was repealed 1 Ed. VI. and 1 Mariae I.) The sentence was executed in Smithfield soon after, Burnet. Stow, p. 560. Hall, f. l. 199.

It was now grown a common practice for such of the commons who held lands of the crown, and the great lords, to make, by will or deeds, such settlements of their estates as deprived the king and the superior barons of all aids and emoluments arising from those dependencies: a bill therefore was brought into the house of lords this session, and by them passed, for preventing such practices; but being sent down to the commons, they would neither agree to the bill, nor provide any expedient in favour of the crown. This gave the king great offence, and he expostulated with them in pretty harsh terms about their refusal, saying, "that he had in that bill offered a great mitigation of what the law allowed him to claim; and that if they would not accept it, they should feel all the rigour of the law." The commons, however, continued obstinate, and the bill did not pass: the difference between the king and the parliament arose so high, that the latter, with a view to mortify him, permitted one Temse, a member, to make and speak to a motion, that an address should be presented to the king, entreating him to take back his queen, and prevent all the inconveniences which the illegitimation of the princess Mary must necessarily occasion. Henry was greatly enraged at the presumption of this commoner; but, as he was extremely cautious of giving the least unnecessary offence to the commons, we do not find that any censure was inflicted upon Temse. An epidemical distemper breaking out in London at this time, the parliament was prorogued on the fourteenth of May to the February of the following year.

The proceedings of the English parliament, which were intimated by Henry's ambassadors, Dr. Edward Karne and Dr. Bonner, to his holiness and the cardinals, threw the papal court into terrible alarms. The conclave was much divided in sentiments; the Imperial party pressed the pope to proceed against Henry with the utmost ecclesiastical rigour; but Clement thought it was his interest still to temporize, or at least to delay giving any definitive sentence: accordingly he wrote a cajoling letter to Henry, assuring him that his holiness was so much piqued with the emperor, and so entirely in the interest of Francis, Henry's ally, that Henry need lie under no apprehensions of trusting the whole cause to his determination.

In the mean time, intelligence being received that the emperor had proposed an interview with the pope, Henry and Francis were greatly alarmed thereat; the former, lest Charles should bring his holiness to do somewhat prejudicial to his suit of divorce; the latter, lest such a conference might defeat the designs he had formed of wresting the duchy of Milan from the Sforza family, and getting the pope to bestow it upon his second son, the duke of Orleans, who in that case was to marry the pope's niece, Catherine de Medicis, afterwards so famous in history. It was therefore mutually agreed, that a new treaty should be entered into between the courts of France and England. Accordingly, on the twenty-third of June this year, the following league was made, viz. "That the two kings should mutually assist each other; the former with five thousand archers, the latter with five hundred men at arms, in case the emperor invaded either of their territories by land; and with a fleet manned with fifteen thousand men, in case he attacked them by sea." This treaty was accompanied by a proposal of an interview between Henry and Francis, to be held in October following, which was agreed to.

It being apparent to the whole nation, that Henry's intention was to marry Anne Boleyn, who was looked upon to be a Protestant; and either to force the pope into his measures, or else to separate from his obedience; sir Thomas More, the lord-chancellor, who, though an excellent minister, and a man of great learning, was a perfect enthusiast in point of submission to the papal authority, disliking the person and proceedings of Anne Boleyn, and being apprehensive of the fatal consequences that might attend a total rupture with the court of Rome, resigned the great-seal, which was thereupon given by the king to sir Thomas Audley, who was first constituted keeper of the great-seal; and, on the seventh of January following, declared lord-chancellor.

On the twenty-third of August died Warham, archbishop of Canterbury; an event which gave Henry no small satisfaction, as thereby he thought he might safely get the affair of his divorce determined in his own dominions: for though the deceased prelate was in his judgment against the marriage with Catherine, yet he was too much devoted to the see of Rome to do any act, or exert his own authority, in contempt of the papal power; and he had some time before his death, made a private protest against all that the parliament had done, so far as it might encroach upon the rights of the church, or be "to the prejudice of the pope, or the see of Rome*:" therefore it could not well be supposed that he would take upon him to determine a cause which the pope had evoked, and reserved to his own cognizance. The king named for his successor Dr. Thomas Cranmer, who was at this time employed in soliciting the learned men and bodies abroad, in Germany especially, to favour the king's divorce, and was a person whom Henry had found, in sentiments of religion and politics, to be according to his own heart.

On the eleventh of October, the king went over to Calais with a royal retinue, in order to have an interview with the French monarch between that place and Boulogne. On this occasion he was accompanied by Anne Boleyn, whom he had lately created marchioness of Pembroke. The two princes entertained each other with great pomp and magnificence, but without transacting any business of importance, owing to the dissimulation of Francis, who, indeed, promised to procure Henry satisfaction in the affair of the divorce, or to break with the pope, though at this very time he was engaged in a secret treaty with Clement, about the marriage of his second son, the duke of Orleans, and Catherine de Medicis, as already mentioned.

Henry returned to England on the fourteenth of November; and in the month of January in the following year, 1533, was privately married to Anne Boleyn, by Dr. Rowland Lee, afterwards bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The ceremony was performed in the presence of Cranmer, now returned to England, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and Anne's father (lately created earl of Wiltshire), her mother and brothers.

* See Burnet, vol. iii. p. 36. in Collect.

The parliament meeting, agreeable to its prorogation, in the month of February, among other acts passed one against appeals to Rome in causes of matrimony, divorce, wills, rights of tythes, oblations, and obventions, declaring the same to be causes appropriated to the cognizance of the spiritual courts of this kingdom*. The preamble to this act, to be found in our statute-books, sufficiently shews the general sense of the nation with regard to the pope's power.

All this while the convocation as well as the parliament was sitting; and Cranmer, being installed in his archiepiscopal dignity on the thirtieth of March, he, on the third of April, took his seat in the upper house of convocation, when two questions were brought before it from the king, relating to his marriage with Catherine: "I. Whether or not the dispensation of pope Julius II. for the said marriage was sufficient to render it binding and valid? II. Whether or not the consummation of Arthur's nuptials with that princess had been fully demonstrated?"

There were seventy-five divines present in person, and one hundred and ninety-seven by proxy, in all two hundred and seventy-two; and after various arguments and debates, for several days, it was resolved, by the suffrages of two hundred and fifty-three,

"I. That such a marriage was contrary to the law of God, and indispensable by the pope." There were five bishops present at these debates, and five others appeared by their proxies; two of the former, viz. the bishops of Rochester and Llandaff, with as many abbots, three priors, and twelve other divines, nineteen in all, dissenting from the determination.

II. In regard to the second question, it was resolved, "That by the evidences laid before the convocation, prince Arthur's consummation was sufficiently proved." At the canvassing this point there were present forty-four lawyers and canonists, three of which were bishops: there were three others, who gave their proxies to Gardiner (lately made bishop of Winchester); and of the whole number, amounting to forty-seven, only the bishop of Bath and Wells, and five more dissented, from the resolution. The same answers were given by the convocation of York, only two dissenting out of upwards of an hundred divines and canonists.

It was next resolved at court, that Cranmer should take upon him to pronounce the sentence of divorce; a step which was now become absolutely necessary, as the king could no longer conceal his marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was now become pregnant. In the first place, however, the queen was once more applied to, to withdraw her appeal to the pope, and to submit; but she remained firm against both, and the marchioness of Pembroke was declared queen of England on the twelfth of April, being Easter-eve. Upon this, Cranmer, after making the proper citations to the queen, and going through a formal process, pronounced a sentence of divorce, on the twenty-third of May, which was intimated to the emperor by sir Thomas Wyatt, Henry's resident at the Imperial court: queen Anne was solemnly crowned at Westminster, on the first day of June; and it was ordered that Catherine, for the future, should be distinguished by no other title than that of princess dowager of Wales. However, Henry was persuaded to yield a little to her Spanish pride, by conniving at those about her, whom she insisted should continue to treat her in the quality of a queen.

In the mean time the news of the whole process and the sentence passed by the new archbishop of Canterbury, together with a copy of a book published by the king on this occasion, in which he treated the papal authority pretty cavalierly, reached Rome, and so exasperated Clement, that the Imperial faction found it no difficult matter to persuade his holiness to annul the archbishop's sentence; and he threatened Henry with excommunication, in case the latter did not condescend to have the sentence confirmed by the see of Rome by a certain day in September following, the pope not doubting but he should be able to reclaim this refractory son of the church by the means of the king of France, with whom he was about to have an interview at Marseilles on account of the marriage of Catherine de Medicis with the duke of Orleans.

Many arts were made use of, on this occasion, by the court of France to soften Henry; but he was so very sure of his parliament and clergy, that Langay, the French ambassador, found him extremely cold in the matter, and by no means disposed to have any farther intercourse with the pope: however, he was at length persuaded to order the duke of Norfolk, the lord Rochford, brother to the new queen, and several other gentlemen of distinction, to accompany Francis to Marseilles, to see whether there were any hopes of accommodating matters on an amicable footing: but the duke of Norfolk and the others, hearing of the proceedings of the consistory of Rome, were recalled at their own request; yet, after all, Francis prevailed upon Henry to send Gardiner, the new bishop of Winchester, sir Francis Bryan, a relation of the queen's, and sir John Wallop, with Edmund Bonner, a court priest, to be witnesses of what should pass at the interview.

The pope arrived at Marseilles on the fourteenth of October, with his niece Catherine de Medicis, and was received by Francis and the duke of Orleans with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. They immediately fell upon business; the marriage was celebrated, and an ample dowry (but all to be conquered by Francis) was given to the young bride.

It was at this interview that the French king prevailed with the pope to give Henry entire satisfaction, promising to exclude the cardinals of the emperor's faction, if the king of England would submit the cause of the divorce to be reheard and judged by himself in consistory; but Bonner, not being acquainted with this compromise, demanded an audience of the pope, and (agreeable to instructions he had received from Henry) acquainted his holiness with Henry's appeal to the next general council from the sentence given, or to be given, against him; and then, after he had been answered by Clement that such an appeal was unlawful, he lodged the like appeal in the name of the archbishop of Canterbury from the sentence which annulled his judgment for the divorce, which put the pope into such a rage, that he even proceeded

Thus all hopes of reconciliation between Henry and the pope were broken off for the present, and Clement departed from Marfeilles on the twelfth of November; but as it was Francis's interest to please Henry and the pope also, he dispatched John du Bellay, archbishop of Paris, to the court of London, who found means to persuade Henry to agree, that if the pope would put off the execution of his sentence until he had indifferent judges sent, who might hear the business, he would on his part defer what he was inclined to do in relation to withdrawing his obedience from the Roman see. The archbishop upon this, though in the depth of a severe winter, set out for Rome, where he got the pope's consent to try the cause at Cambray, by such judges as the king of England should have no reason to except against.

But when matters were brought to this crisis, the pope flew off, till he could have Henry's concession, signed by his own hand, and fixed a day for the return of the courier, which proved the providential means to bring the arts and politics of men to nought; for the courier not returning precisely within the limited time, the Imperial cardinals, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the archbishop of Paris for a delay of six days longer, prevailed with the pope to precipitate a sentence, by which Henry's marriage with Catherine was declared valid, he was commanded to live with her as his wife, and excommunication was pronounced against him if he refused. Within two days after this sentence was fulminated, the courier arrived from England with full powers for the archbishop of Paris, declaring that Henry accepted the proposed judgment, provided that the Imperialists and their faction, who were his declared enemies, did not interfere. But all was too late, and the archbishop of Paris, finding the pope immovable, returned to France, the English ambassadors leaving Rome at the same time.

From a review of what happened between the time of the archbishop of Paris's setting out from England, and the time of fulminating the sentence, it evidently appears that Henry never intended to part with his supremacy, and therefore he must be supposed to have acted in this case with great insincerity, only to obtain the pope's consent in the cause of the divorce, to quiet some people's consciences, that he might get rid of Catherine with more grace, and then to drop him there, and to withdraw his obedience; for immediately on the departure of the archbishop of Paris, viz. on the second of December, a council was called, in which several violent resolutions were taken against the papal authority, at a time when Henry's cause was actually in submission before the pope, and before he could possibly know the issue of that negotiation.

The parliament meeting on January 15, 1534, began the session with an act annulling the statute of Henry IV. against heretics: not that the parliament meant to exempt them from the penalty of the laws, for by the new act they were condemned to the flames; but, in order to abridge the power of the clergy, and hinder them from being sole judges in such cases, it was decreed that heretics should be tried according to the laws of the land, without any regard to the canon law.

By another statute it was enacted, that no synod or convocation of the clergy should be assembled without the king's permission; that his majesty should nominate sixteen persons from the parliament, and as many from the clergy, to examine the canons and constitutions of the church, with power to abolish such as were useless, and confirm those that were necessary. An act of attainder was likewise passed against Elizabeth Barton, commonly called the Holy Maid of Kent, a native of the parish of Aldington, who was employed by certain ecclesiastics as a fit instrument to raise disturbances in the kingdom.

This woman had been long subject to hysterical fits, during which her countenance and body underwent most violent contortions, and she frequently uttered many strange and incoherent expressions, from whence the ignorant and credulous people were induced to believe that she spoke by the inspiration of Heaven: even sir Thomas More and Fisher, bishop of Rochester, were weak enough to look upon her as something more than mortal. Finding, therefore, that she gained credit every day, the papists put her upon speaking and prophesying against the king's divorce, and his second marriage, which she did with great warmth; and at last she became so bold as to pretend that God had revealed to her, "that if the king went on in his divorce, and took another wife, he should not be king a month longer, and that he should die a villain's death." It is no less true than extraordinary, that Fisher and More, even after she came thus to speak treason, appear to have been weak enough to have talked to her, if not to have encouraged her; but More was soon convinced of the imposture, and gave an early account of it to Thomas Cromwell, now one of the secretaries of state. Henry at first neglected this woman; but finding that she was upheld not only by the regular clergy but the pope's agents in England, he resolved to proceed against her with the utmost severity: accordingly the Maid and her accomplices were examined in the Star Chamber, where they confessed all the particulars of the imposture; and appeared upon a scaffold in St. Paul's church, where the articles of their confession were read in their hearing; from thence they were conveyed to the Tower, where they remained till the parliament met, which having considered the case, pronounced it a conspiracy against the king's life and crown, and Elizabeth with her accomplices were attainted of high-treason. The bishop of Rochester, Thomas Gold, Thomas Lawrence, Edward Thwaites, John Addison, and Thomas Abise were adjudged guilty of misprision of treason, to forfeit their goods and chattels to the king, and to be imprisoned during his majesty's pleasure; and Elizabeth and her confederates were afterwards hung at Tyburn.

The parliament then proceeded to enact several laws for regulating affairs of an ecclesiastical nature. They confirmed the statutes against annates; they decreed, "that for the future the pope should have no share in the election or confirmation of bishops, but that, when a see became vacant, the king should send to the chapter a congé d'elire, or licence, to elect a new bishop; and if the election should not be made in twelve days after the date of the licence, the right of chusing should fall to the king: that the bishop elect should swear fealty to the king, who should present him to the archbishop, for consecration; and should the elect, or the archbishop, refuse to obey this order, they should be liable to the penalties of the act of Præmunire: that no person should presume to apply to the bishop of Rome for bulls, palls, or any other religious purpose: that Peter-pence, together with all procurations, delegations, bulls, and dispensations, issued by the court of Rome, should be entirely abolished: that the archbishop of Canterbury should be empowered to grant such dispensations as were consistent with the law of God, provided that part of the money thence arising should be paid into the king's Exchequer: that all religious houses, whether exempted or non-exempted, should be subject to the visitation of the archbishop: that the king's marriage with Catherine, should be deemed null and void; and that the succession should be settled upon the issue of his lawful wife Anne, whether male or female." The members having sworn to maintain the succession in this manner, the two houses were, on the thirtieth of March, prorogued till the third of November following.

Thus ended this memorable parliament, and thus the total disunion of the crown and people of England from the court, though not from the church, of Rome, was effected. Those who pretended, that no great kingdom could break with the pope without manifest danger, now saw that a single blow was sufficient to overthrow this venerable colossus: in fact, the taxes which the court of Rome had so long imposed on the English, were founded only on that people's willingness to be laid under contribution; but as soon as they resolved to be no longer so, it was found, that a power founded only in form is nothing in itself.

After the separation of the parliament, Henry sent commissioners through the whole kingdom to administer the oath of supremacy and allegiance to all his subjects, as also that concerning the succession; Henry looking upon this oath as the test, not only of his subjects loyalty, but of their attachment to the parliamentary proceedings: it imported, "that they would be faithful to the king, queen, their succession, and heirs and successors; that they held the king to be supreme head of the English church, and the pope to be no more than any other bishop; that they renounced all obedience to the pontiff of Rome; that they (such of them as were of the clergy) would preach the pure doctrines of the holy Scripture; and that they would pray for the king as the head of the English church, then for the queen, her issue, and lastly for the archbishop of Canterbury." Which oath was generally taken by the clergy as well as the laity, except John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and sir Thomas More, late lord-chancellor, who would not subscribe thereto, alleging, that they could not take such oaths, without endangering their souls of eternal damnation; upon which they were both committed to the Tower of London. In the mean time Henry tried, by the means of the archbishop of York, Edward Lee, and the bishop of Durham, Cuthbert Tunstall, to persuade Catherine once more to renounce the title of queen; to which she, with an unbroken spirit, declared she never would.

Charles V. Catherine's nephew, having undertaken to execute the pope's sentence of deposition against the king of England, Henry thought proper to endeavour to prevent his designs, or at least to put himself in a posture of defence against them. For this end he proposed a new treaty with Francis, king of France; but as Francis always acted with him purely on a principle of self interest, and being also unwilling to give any umbrage to the pope, whose relation he was now become, Henry was not able to bring him to a settled alliance that might render their union effectual for the common defence; on the contrary, Francis shuffled with him, and deceived him in an egregious manner, as we shall see in the sequel.

The king, though he had no reason to apprehend any danger from his own subjects, to whom the late acts were in general agreeable, still thought it proper to provide against all events, and to fortify himself by foreign alliances. The emperor had threatened to stir up an invasion from Scotland; therefore, to prevent any hostility from that quarter, Henry now made a peace with his nephew, James V. for their joint lives, and a year after the death of either. This peace, which was concluded at London on the eleventh of May this year, contained two articles never inserted in any former treaty, and which arose from the present circumstances of affairs: one was, that this treaty should not derogate from the old leagues subsisting between France and Scotland; the other, that it should not be infringed by any sentence or censure against either of the contracting parties, or his dominions. Henry also, on restoring the castle of Eddrington, which had been some time before surprized by the English, obtained liberty for Archibald, earl of Angus, his brother George and his uncle Archibald Douglas, with some other Scottish fugitives that had entered into his service, to reside in England, upon his undertaking that they should make no hostile attempt upon Scotland*. Henry was so well pleased to have his nephew his friend and ally, that the lord William Howard was sent to Scotland with the order of the Garter to James.

On the twenty-sixth of September this year, pope Clement VII. died, and was succeeded by cardinal Farnese, who was elected on the twelfth of October following, and assumed the name of Paul III. This event gave a great blow to the hopes and interests of Francis, it ruined all his mighty expectations of his new alliance with the house of Medici, and obliged him to be more than ever attentive to his engagements with England. Henry was sensible of all this, and resolved to avail himself of such a juncture by getting Francis to guaranty the late act of succession, which Francis did in a very ample manner, promising, "on the word and faith of a king, and under the forfeiture of his goods, and of all the goods of his subjects, in the form of a contract of guaranty, both for himself, his heirs and successors, that he, at all times and in all places, particularly in all synods and general councils, and before all persons, and against all men whatsoever, that should oppose it, of what rank or condition soever they might be, he would, both by himself and by his subjects, maintain and defend it, and (if need were) justify it by a strong hand, and with all his forces; nor would he ever, for the future, publicly or privately, directly or indirectly, go against it, or so much as attempt it, nor suffer it to be attempted by any other, as much as in him lay."

But the death of Clement VII. made no alteration in the measures taken by the court of England to shake off the papal yoke, especially as it had now little to fear from the emperor, who began to find work enough in Germany; besides, Henry had, by his negotiations, secured most of the northern powers, who were in general inclined to the reformed religion. Paget was sent to reside with the princes of the reformation in Germany; and, about the latter end of the summer, ambassadors came from the Lubeckers, with offers of entering into an offensive league against the pope, and bringing with them their confession of faith, which they presented to Henry.

The parliament meeting, according to prorogation, on the twenty-third of November, enacted several important laws to prevent all future connexion between the kingdom of England and the Roman pontiff. One of their first acts was to confirm the king's title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, and to entail the same on his successors. They declared all those who should speak, write, or imagine any thing prejudicial to the king or queen, guilty of high-treason, and debarred from all benefit of sanctuaries. They composed a form of oath, to be taken by the whole nation, with regard to the succession of the crown, and annulled all former oaths on the same subject†. They assigned to the king the annates or first-fruits (formerly paid to the pope), together with the tythes of all benefices. By another act provision was made for twenty-five suffragan bishops, who had power given them to exercise such jurisdiction as the bishop of the diocese should grant them‡: and Henry, after passing a general pardon, put an end to the session; but Fisher and More, who had been previously convicted of misprision of treason, were excepted out of the pardon. At the same time Henry issued a proclamation, ordering all the justices to inspect the behaviour of the bishops and clergy, particularly to observe whether they preached against the abuses of the church of Rome, and in support of the king's supremacy, and to give information against those whom they should deem cold and insincere in the discharge of their duty. Another proclamation was also issued, ordering that the name of Pope should be discontinued and be erased from all prayers, rubrics, canons, mass-books, &c. All the prelates renounced obedience to the bishop of Rome, and among the rest Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, though in his heart he was still bigotly addicted to all the absurdities of the Romish religion, and a deadly enemy to all reformers.

By this time the reformation had taken deep root in England as well as in Germany, notwithstanding the violent and cruel persecution to which its professors were subjected. The writings of Luther were generally read here, and even the New Testament was translated into the English language by one Tindal, who afterwards retired into the Low Countries: however, to the eternal reproach of Henry and his reforming government, this book, as soon as it made its appearance, was condemned to the flames, as were several persons who were so incautious as to declare their sentiments too freely in point of religion. These severities, however, instead of suppressing, served only to strengthen the spirit of religious opposition, which was still farther inflamed by the quarrel with the Roman pontiff.

Anne Boleyn, archbishop Cranmer, and secretary Cromwell were in their hearts staunch friends to the reformation, and encouragers of its promoters; while, on the other hand, the duke of Norfolk, with Gardiner and Longland, bishops of Winchester and Lincoln, and many other ecclesiastics who frequented the court, were still for preserving all the absurdities of the Romish religion, and for keeping the flames of persecution in full blaze against the reformers.

Henry himself, though he had renounced his subjection to the see of Rome, was in several respects a bigotted Catholic, and a strict adherer to the real presence in the sacrament; besides, he had written a book against Luther, who had answered him with great freedom, not to say scurrility. This had incensed Henry beyond a possibility of reconciliation: in fine, Henry wanted to be the pope's rival, but without being either a Lutheran or a Sacramentarian; he still preserved the invocation of saints, but under certain restrictions; it was with him equally a crime to believe in the authority of the pope, and to be a Protestant: and we shall see, in the course of this reign, where he alike condemned to the flames those who spoke in favour of the Roman pontiff, and those who declared for the reformed religion in Germany. In particular, he now ordered the prior of the Carthusian monks of the Charterhouse, London, the prior of Hexham, Benase a monk of Sion college, and John Haile vicar of Isleworth, together with three monks of the Charterhouse, to be hanged and quar-

† The new oath was conceived in the following terms: "Ye shall swear to bear faith, truth, and obedience alone to the king's majesty, and to the heirs of his body, of his most dear and entirely beloved lawful wife, queen Anne, begotten and to be begotten; and farther, to the heirs of the said sovereign lord, according to the limitation of the statute made for surety of his succession in the crown of this realm mentioned and contained, and not to any other within this realm, nor foreign authority or potentate: and in case any oath be made, or hath been made by you to any person or persons, that then ye do repute the same as vain and annihilate; and that, to your common wit and uttermost of your power, without guile, fraud, or other undue means, ye shall observe, keep, maintain, and defend the said act of succession, and all the whole effects and contents thereof, and all other acts and statutes made in confirmation or for execution of the same, or any thing therein contained: and this ye shall do against all manner of persons, of what estate, dignity, degree, or condition soever they be; and in no wise to do or attempt, directly or indirectly, any thing or things, privily or apart, to the let, hindrance, damage, or derogation thereof, or of any part of the same, by any manner of means, or for any manner of pretence. So help you God, and all saints, and the holy evangelists."

‡ By this act the towns of Thetford, Ipswich, Colchester, Dover, Guildford, Southampton, Taunton, Shaftesbury, Malton, Marlborough, Bedford, Leicester, Gloucester, Shrewsbury, Bristol, Penrith, Bridgewater, Nottingham, Grantham, Hull, Huntingdon, Cambridge, and the towns of Pereth and Berwick, St. German's, and the Isle of Wight, were to be taken and accepted for sees of bishops suffragan to be made in England and Wales. tered at Tyburn, on the eighteenth of July this year, for refusing to submit to the new laws: and a little before, orders were given for burning twenty-seven Protestants, viz. John Frith, a man of great learning, Andrew Hewet, and nineteen men and six women, born in Holland, to convince the world that his severity to the ecclesiastics was not actuated by any fondness he was charged with for the new religion.

At length this persecution reached bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More, who still continued prisoners in the Tower, and who were now singled out for a terror to the boldest opposers of the king's measures: Henry was determined they should renounce the pope, and acknowledge his marriage-act and succession, as established by parliament. Pope Paul III. who succeeded Clement VII. thought to save Fisher's life by sending him a cardinal's hat, while matters were preparing for his trial; but in this he only gave Henry the satisfaction of bringing a cardinal to the block; for Fisher refusing to take the oath of supremacy, a commission was made out for trying him by his peers, for misprision of treason in the case of the Maid of Kent, and also for denying the king's supremacy, and on the seventeenth of May he was tried before the lord-chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, with some other lords and all the judges, who found him guilty, and he received sentence of death accordingly. He received the notice of his execution with great composure of mind in the morning before he was beheaded; and when he came to the block, after a short prayer in favour of popery, and praying for the king, and that God would bless him with a good council, he calmly resigned his neck to the executioner, on the twenty-second of June, on Tower-hill. He had the character of a learned and devout man, but very weak and obstinate, and much addicted to the superstitions of his education.

The same oath of supremacy, for the refusing of which bishop Fisher lost his head, being also tendered to sir Thomas More, he refused to take it likewise, for which he was tried by the same court, and lost his head on first day of July; though Henry reaped nothing but reproach and infamy from the death of a man who was universally esteemed for his virtue, and admired for his wit and pleasantries, which did not forsake him even in his last moments; and he died with an unconcern that in others would have appeared to be levity, but in him was nature.

These executions were followed by fresh injunctions issued by Henry to all archbishops and bishops, for enforcing the doctrine of the king's supremacy; a declaration was also sent them by secretary Cromwell to the same effect, which they were ordered to read from their pulpits; and it does not appear that one prelate refused to comply with these orders, so much did they stand in awe of Henry's fiery and vindictive temper: and this seems to be the epocha from whence we may date Henry VIII's resolution to govern by force and absolute power.

At this very time sir Gregory Cassali was still at the court of Rome as Henry's agent, and had frequent conferences with pope Paul about some expedient to heal the breach which Clement VII. had made with England by his too great precipitation; but news arriving that bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More were executed for denying the king's supremacy, the pope broke off all intercourse with Cassali, and, by a thundering bull, passed ecclesiastical censures against the king of England, summoning him, and all his adherents, to appear at Rome within ninety days, to answer for their crimes; if they should fail, he laid them under the sentence of excommunication, deprived the king of his realm, subjected the kingdom to an interdict, declared Henry's issue by Anne Boleyn illegitimate, annulled all treaties which other powers had concluded with the king of England, bestowed his kingdom on the first person who chose to attempt the conquest of it, commanded the English nobility to take arms against him, absolved all his subjects from their allegiance, forbade all Christians to communicate with the English, and declared it lawful for any one to convert their effects to their own use*. This bull was passed on the thirtieth of August, this year; but it was not published at this time, the pope thinking it prudent to delay the publication, until it could be supported by the Imperial arms.

In the mean time the French king, in order to sound the inclinations of Henry, sent over Philip Chabot, admiral of France, to communicate some overtures of peace, which had been made by the emperor. That prince proposed a marriage between the third daughter of Francis and Philip prince of Spain, and another match between the dauphin and the princess Mary, daughter of Henry and Catherine. Henry received this embassy with some degree of contempt: he said, that the emperor's offer of the princess Mary was of itself ridiculous, since she was not at his disposal, and that he knew how to keep her from ever being so; and that as to some other proposals of the emperor, concerning the duchy of Milan, it was very plain that Charles intended only to divide France and England, that he might the better answer his ends upon both: however, Henry proposed, in his turn, that his new-born daughter Elizabeth should be married to the duke of Angoulême, third son to Francis, on condition that the French king, with the nobility, parliaments, and universities of France, should engage to procure those sentences which had been fulminated by the bishop of Rome, on account of the divorce, revoked. This proposal was embraced by Francis; and accordingly, in May this year, the duke of Norfolk, the bishop of Ely, sir William Fitz Williams, and Dr. Fox, were ordered to treat concerning the marriage with the commissioners of Francis. But the latter demanding that Henry should furnish him with succours for the war he had undertaken against Savoy, and release him entirely from the perpetual pension of one hundred thousand crowns, which he had obliged himself by treaty to pay to the king of England, Henry judged from this demand, that Francis meant only to shuffle with him, and therefore declared, that so far from renouncing the pension, he insisted upon the payment of the arrears within a limited time. This reply broke off the negotiation: and while the emperor carried his arms into Africa, where he restored Muley Hassen to his kingdom of Tunis, from which he had been expelled by the famous corsair Barbarossa, Francis attacked the duchy of Savoy, which he reduced in the very first campaign.

* Burnet's Collect. vol. i p. 166.

The bull lately signed by the pope was intended rather to terrify Henry, than to be put in force; however, it was so ordered as to be made known to all the courts of Europe: but it had the contrary effect, for, as soon as Henry was informed thereof, and that, amongst other schemes, the pope intended to give England to some of the German popish princes, he resolved to counterballance that project, and engaged Francis I. to concur with him in an embassy to the Protestant league of Smalcald: Henry sent Edward Fox and Dr. Heath, to whom Francis joined William de Bellay, lord of Langey.

But these monarchs proposed an union with the league only in a political view, to keep the emperor employed in that country by an intestine war, without any regard to the Protestant religion. The Protestant princes of Germany, on the other hand, were willing to live in all due subjection to the emperor, provided they could be secured in the free exercise of their religion; therefore, to cover their intentions, and to draw the Protestants into their interest, it was necessary for Henry and Francis to feign a conformity of sentiments with them in religious matters, and a desire to establish the reformation in their kingdoms. Had these sentiments been real, no doubt they would have been readily embraced; but the cruelty with which both kings treated the reformed in their respective dominions was a proof of their insincerity, and therefore, before the princes of the league would proceed in any alliance with them, the duke of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse communicated certain proposals to the English ambassadors, the purport of which appears from lord Herbert to have been as follows:

They demanded, "That Henry should approve and embrace the Augsburg Confession of Faith, and defend it with all his power in a free council; that he should approve of no place for holding a council without their consent; that if the pope should call a council at his own pleasure, Henry should join with them in protesting against it; that he should accept of the title of Protector of the League; that he should never return to the pope's obedience; that he should not assist their enemies; and lastly, that he should pay one hundred thousand crowns towards the defence of the league, and in case of a long war two hundred thousand crowns, upon condition that what was remaining should be restored when the war should be at an end*."

How disagreeable soever these articles were to Henry, the advantage he proposed to himself by gaining the German Protestants to his interest, made him seem to approve of their proposals in general; and, to gain their belief of his sincerity, Fox had instructions to assure the princes, that if commissioners were sent from them to Henry, there would be no manner of doubt of their perfectly agreeing in every thing. But the Germans were not to be so easily imposed upon: they gave in a paper, by which they evidently shewed that Henry had proceeded no farther in the reformation than abolishing the pope's supremacy and some religious houses; but that he still retained all the other most material and gross errors of the Romish church. Thus stood affairs at the close of the year 1535.

Huntingdonshire, after having suffered a long series of vexations. A little before she expired, she wrote a very affecting letter to the king, to whom she gave the appellation of "her most dear lord, king, and husband." Henry, it seems, was greatly touched at reading this letter, and even dropped some tears at the remembrance of a woman whose virtue deserved a better fate. Queen Anne, however, did not behave with even due decorum on this occasion; she rejoiced openly at the death of Catherine, and seemed to take pleasure in communicating her satisfaction to the public, little thinking that her own fate was so near at hand. The remains of this unfortunate queen were deposited in the abbey-church of Peterborough, which Henry afterwards converted into an episcopal cathedral.

On the fourth of February, this year, the parliament sat for the dispatch of business. The greatest matter which came under their consideration at this time, was to effect an entire union between England and Wales. It appears from the lord Herbert, who has, on this head, introduced into his history a curious dissertation, to which the reader is referred, that at that time, in several counties of Wales different forms of justice prevailed, and the laws were eluded by the greatest criminals, if they had but the good fortune to escape out of one county into another: to remedy these and other flagrant abuses, and to introduce an uniformity throughout all the country, the following act was passed.

"That albeit the dominion, principality, and country of Wales be as a member and part of the temporal crown of this realm, whereof therefore the king is head and ruler, yet, as it hath divers rights, usages, laws, and customs, different from the laws and customs of this realm; and because their language is different from that which is spoken here; and that many rude people hereupon have made distinction and diversity between his highness's other subjects and them, to the causing much discord and sedition; his highness therefore, out of his love and favour to his subjects of Wales, and for reducing them to his laws, doth, by advice and consent of his parliament, ordain and enact, that Wales should be united and incorporated henceforth to and within his realm of England; and that his subjects should enjoy and inherit all and singular freedoms, liberties, rights, privileges, and laws, which his highness's subjects elsewhere enjoy and inherit: and therefore, that inheritances should descend after the manner of England, without division or partition, and not after any tenure or form of Welsh laws and customs. And forasmuch as there are divers lordships-marchers within the said country and dominion of Wales, being no parcel of any other shires, where the laws and one correction is used and had, and that in them and the counties adjoining, manifold murders, robberies, felonies, and the like, have been done, contrary to all law and justice, because the offenders, making their refuge from one lordship-marcher to another, were continued without punishment and correction; therefore, it was enacted, that the said lordships marchers should be united, annexed, and joined to divers shires, specified in the said act."

And now Henry, who had been greatly affronted by the contumacious reports which the monkish

clergy had spread abroad with regard to his proceedings in the business of the reformation, resolved to take ample vengeance upon them for the same. With this view, after having deliberated with his council, a general visitation was ordered to be made of all the monasteries, and strict inquest to be taken of all their titles and revenues; and also of the morals of the friars and others, and the regulations observed in each order; and secretray Cromwell was, by a commission under the king's own hand, created vicar-general and general visitor of all the monasteries and other privileged places. Cromwell, thus appointed, nominated for his substitutes to examine the monasteries the doctors (in divinity) Leigh, Leighton, Patrick, and London, who drew up a set of heads of visitation, which they well knew would bring in most of the houses guilty. The visitation, the particulars of which will more properly fall into the ecclesiastical part of our history, was accordingly performed with great rigour, and, if we may credit the reports of the visitors themselves, they discovered such abominations and scenes of vice, debauchery, and imposture, as were not only disgraceful to religion, but even shocking to human nature.

The report of the visitors being read in parliament, a bill for the demolition of all the lesser monasteries was brought in, and passed. We cannot know the general reason for this bill better than by its preamble, which sets forth, "That small religious houses under the number of twelve persons, had been long and notoriously guilty of vicious and abominable living, and did much consume and waste their churches, lands, and other things belonging to them; and that, for above two hundred years, there had been many visitations for reforming these abuses, but with no success, their vicious living increasing daily, so that, except small houses were dissolved, and the religious put into greater monasteries, there could no reformation be expected in that matter: whereupon the king, having received full information of these abuses, both by his visitors and other credible ways, and considering that there were divers great monasteries, in which religion was well kept and observed, which had not the full number in them that they might and ought to receive, had made a full declaration of the premises in parliament, whereupon it was enacted, that all houses which might spend yearly two hundred pounds, or within it, should be suppressed, and their revenues converted to better uses, and they compelled to reform themselves."

Another act passed, by which all these houses, churches, lands, and estates were given to the king, with those of all houses already dissolved: and by these acts no fewer than three hundred and seventy-six abbeyes fell to the crown. By another act, it was declared, that no tenths should be exacted that year; and by another, a court of augmentation was erected, whereby order was taken concerning the religious houses that were surrendered or suppressed, and how the king's revenue should be increased thereby; and officers for this purpose were appointed.

But whatever Henry's pretence might be for setting on foot this scrutiny, it is certain that his principal motives were to wreak his vengeance upon the monks, whom he regarded as his mortal enemies, and to increase his revenues with the plunder of their houses. Soon after the dissolution of the abbeyes the king put an end to this parliament (which had been the most compliant that England had ever seen), on the fourteenth of April, after sitting six years.

The king's severe proceedings against the religious houses regained him, in some measure, the confidence of the German Protestant princes; and they wrote to Henry in terms of great complaisance from Smalcald, where they were now assembled to settle the famous Smalcaldic league for the preservation of those of the reformed persuasion. This produced an obliging message from Henry, with some explanation with regard to their former proposals; but still the princes declined giving any umbrage to the emperor. This was not insisted on by Henry. Another answer was sent by the princes, in which they promise to send an embassy into England; and some of their most learned men, among whom was the famous Melancthon, were nominated for that purpose: and there is the greatest reason to believe, in the present situation of Henry's affairs, that this negotiation would have succeeded to the advantage of the great work of reformation, had not the popish faction here found means to deprive the Protestants of the interest of queen Anne, whose death happened shortly after the arrival of these divines, which very much altered the face of affairs as well as the king's mind, in respect to the reformation, which she openly countenanced, and which was in effect the cause of her deplorable fate.

Henry's affection, which had been increased by opposition during the prosecution of the divorce, was now cooled by satiety, and he no longer looked on his lovely consort with the same fond regard as heretofore. It is true, she wanted none of the agreeable qualities, and had many of the valuable kind: she was lively, pleasant, and gay in conversation; and, though strictly virtuous in her conduct, she indulged her humour rather too far; and, having been bred in the freedoms of the court of France, was not so attentive as she ought to have been in her exalted and ticklish situation, and either took or permitted liberties which gave offence to an impetuous husband, who had pride enough to make him the most jealous of mortals, and the most furious in his jealousy.

The Austrian party about court, all who disliked the divorce from Catherine, and all that opposed the reformation, which she was supposed to favour, were her enemies, and taking notice of every little indiscretion she was guilty of, improved it to raise in the king a suspicion of her virtue. The viscountess Rochford in particular, who was wife to the queen's brother, but who lived on bad terms with her husband, and, as she was a woman of the most abandoned character, paid no regard either to truth or humanity in the calumnies which she invented, pretended that her own husband carried on a criminal correspondence with his sister; and not only so, but she insisted that she had likewise granted favours to Henry Norris, groom of the stole, Weston and Brereton, gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber, together with one Mark Smeton, a musician. This information roused all the rage in Henry's breast, who was also not a little chagrined at an accident which befel the queen some time before, of being brought to bed of a dead child.

Nothing however transpired till the first of May this year, when a tilting match was held at Greenwich, wich, in which the lord Rochford was chief challenger and Henry Norris the chief defendant. It is said, that during the diversions Henry observed the queen drop her handkerchief, which one of the suspected persons took up, and used it to wipe his face: to a mind prepared like Henry's, this accident, which though, in all probability, entirely casual, was a demonstration of his wife's infidelity: accordingly all on a sudden the diversions were broke up, and Henry, without taking any notice of the queen or her court, with no more than six persons in his retinue, abruptly departed to his palace of Westminster.

The queen following, was, upon her arrival, met by the duke of Norfolk, and some other lords of the council, who signified to her, that it was his majesty's pleasure she should be confined to her chamber. At the same time the lord Rochford and Norris were committed to the Tower, as were Brereton, Weston, and Smeton. Next day, being the second of May, the queen was conducted to the same prison by the duke of Norfolk and other lords, who resigned her into the custody of sir William Kingston, constable of the Tower; and a commission was made out for trying her on the twelfth of May in that place, the duke of Norfolk being appointed lord high-steward on that occasion, with twenty-six other peers. The charges brought against her were of the most detestable nature, viz. "That she had procured her brother, and the four other persons in custody, to lie with her, and that she had made each of them believe that he had the preference above all mankind in her heart; and that she had said to each of them, that the king never had her heart." Smeton had, by fair promises, been brought to confess, that he had thrice carnal knowledge of her; but it was not thought proper to confront him with her; nor, indeed, could he be an evidence, as he had been condemned three days before to suffer, notwithstanding his assurances of pardon upon confession. The only thing that appeared in relation to her brother, the lord Rochford, was his laying his hand on the queen's bed while he whispered to her one day; an action done before company, and warranted from the near relationship between them. In short, to the eternal infamy of her judges, she was condemned without its being ever known upon what evidence her sentence was grounded; and the nineteenth of May was the day appointed for her execution, which was that of being burnt or beheaded, at the king's pleasure.

Henry, not satisfied with this act of severity, would needs be divorced from her before her death, and archbishop Cranmer was sent to the Tower, and received her confession of precontract, or promise of marriage, between the lord Henry Percy (now earl of Northumberland) and herself, before that she had made with the king; upon which the archbishop pronounced, according to the rules of canon law, the sentence of divorce. It was probably a tenderness for her daughter, the young Elizabeth, that engaged her to make this confession, for the earl of Northumberland protested in the most solemn manner that no such contract had ever passed between them. It was, however, expected that she would have defended her innocency when about to die, but the same motives seem to have operated even then, as she feared every thing for her daughter from the savage temper of the king, should she expose him too much; accordingly, when she came on the scaffold, she made no reflections on the hardships she had sustained, nor said any thing touching the grounds on which sentence had passed upon her; she only desired "that every body would judge the best," acknowledged her obligations to the king, prayed for him, and entreated the spectators to do the same for her, and then submitting her neck to the fatal stroke, her head was severed from her body at one blow, by an executioner, who had been sent for from Calais, on account of his remarkable dexterity in his bloody profession.

The lord Rochford was tried and condemned at the same time with the queen his sister, and, together with the four other gentlemen, suffered death three days before her, all of them, Smeton excepted, declaring at their deaths the queen's and their own innocence of the facts for which they suffered.

The very day after the queen's execution Henry was married to Jane Seymour, the reigning beauty of the court, daughter to sir John Seymour, and one of the maids of honour to Anne, on whom the king had for some time cast an amorous eye: eager as he was to gratify his brutal appetites, he totally forgot all regard to decency and decorum, and his cruel and barbarous heart, more worthy of an infernal fiend than a human creature, was not in the least affected by the bloody catastrophe of a person who had so long been the object of his most tender affection.

In consequence of the sentence of divorce which Henry had procured from his late queen Anne before her death, the princess Elizabeth, his daughter by her, who was at this time about three years of age, and been styled princess of Wales, was now divested of that title; and the princess Mary, his other daughter by Catherine, whom he had treated with great severity on account of her attachment to her mother, and her refusal to assent to the statutes which had been lately enacted against the papal authority, was now persuaded by the popish faction to attempt a reconciliation with the king at this juncture; accordingly she subscribed to the act of supremacy, the renunciation of the bishop of Rome, and to the unlawfulness of her own mother's marriage, that she might the more effectually remove the lady Elizabeth from the king's presence and affections; but Henry, though he was reconciled to Mary, yet continued to educate the infant princess at court, with all the care and tenderness of a father.

On the eighth day of June a new parliament met at Westminster, as did also the convocation, and both those houses confirmed the sentence passed upon the late queen Anne; but, what is very remarkable in favour of the queen's innocency, the commons attainted the deceased for pride and the carnal desires of her body, and for confederating in divers treasons against the king's royal person, &c. The convocation alleged nothing against her but the pretended precontract with the earl of Northumberland when lord Percy, though that nobleman had sworn in the most solemn manner, that no such engagement had ever existed.

The parliament also enacted a statute, by which they repealed the former act of succession, declaring the children of the king's two first marriages illegitimate, and adjudging the crown, after his death, to his issue by his present queen Jane, or any wife he might marry after her decease; but at the same time they gave him full power to settle the mode of such succession either by will or letters patent under the great-seal, and pronounced all those who maintained the validity of his two first marriages guilty of high-treason.

Then the king informed them of some advances made to him from pope Paul III. who on hearing of the execution of queen Anne, and death of queen Catherine, hoped he might bring Henry to a good agreement with him; but Henry declaring in parliament that his separation from the bishop of Rome was so fixed, and had proceeded upon such solid grounds, that he never would listen to any accommodation, the two houses, servilely obsequious to the king's will, in order to convince his holiness that all hopes of re-uniting the English church to his jurisdiction were vain and groundless, passed an act, subjecting to the penalty of Præmunire all those who should endeavour to restore the papal power in England; and all magistrates who should neglect to put this law in execution were condemned to the same punishment: and by another act they annulled and abolished all dispensations, exemptions, and privileges procured from the court of Rome, saving however to the archbishop of Canterbury the right of confirming what should be deemed advantageous to the church and people.

By a third act it was prohibited any one to marry with the next degrees of royal blood, without permission from the king. This act passed upon the following occasion: the lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to Henry's sister, the queen dowager of Scotland, by the earl of Angus, her second husband, was now at the English court, where she was courted by the lord Thomas Howard, brother to the duke of Norfolk. This courtship, which had proceeded to the length of mutual promises, coming to Henry's ears, the lovers were committed to the Tower of London; and lord Thomas, upon circumstances brought against him of aspiring to the crown, was attainted of high-treason in parliament. The queen of Scotland hearing of her daughter's imprisonment, wrote strongly in her favour to Henry, but without effect; nor was she released till after the death of lord Thomas, which happened in the Tower. A fourth law was enacted, that all encroachments of parliament upon the king's prerogative, before he should have attained the age of twenty-four, might be annulled under the great-seal of England. These were the most material acts for our purpose in this session of parliament, which was finished on the eighteenth day of July, and which one would be tempted to think had assembled for no other purpose than that of bestowing upon Henry a more extensive authority than any of his predecessors had ever enjoyed.

Neither was the convocation less compliant with the crown than the parliament had been; for, besides ratifying the sentence of divorce between the king and Anne Boleyn, they also gave their sanction to a system of religion which Henry, who differed from all his subjects in point of belief, had been at the pains to digest; the contents of which will fall more properly into another part of our history. Before the convocation broke up, the king acquainted them that he was summoned to a council, which was, by agreement between the pope and the emperor, to be held at Mantua. As a general council carried with it a popular and plausible sound, it was necessary to guard against its consequences with respect to the steps which had been taken by Henry, who had reason to believe its members would be no way favourable to him: he was under some difficulty by the appeal he had made from the pope to a general council; but Cranmer, and some other prelates, made him easy on that head, and a decree passed in convocation, defining what a general council was, and shewing that no such could be called by the authority of the pope, or in the present juncture of affairs; and that no justice was to be expected where the bishop of Rome was to preside. Strengthened by this opinion, Henry published a flaming protestation against the approaching council.

About this time Reginald Pole began to distinguish himself by his taste and learning: he was son to Margaret, countess of Salisbury, the daughter and heiress of George, duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV. and consequently allied to the king, who determined to advance him to the highest dignities of the church, conferred upon him the deanry of Exeter, and sent him to finish his studies at the university of Paris. He refused to concur with Henry's agents in procuring the decision of the French universities, in favour of the divorce, which he disapproved. He afterwards returned to England, and agreed with the clergy in owning Henry supreme head of the church. Then he travelled into Italy, where he acquired a great character for his wit and eloquence; and Henry being informed that he openly condemned him for his separation from the Apostolic see, and that he had published a book intitled De unione ecclesiastica (or, Concerning Ecclesiastical Union), in which he treated the king with great severity, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar, and even exhorting the emperor and other European princes to attack him, with all their forces, he resolved, if possible, to get him in his power, and, dissembling his resentment, sent to desire him to come over to explain some passages in his book, which were somewhat dark and obscure; but finding him upon his guard, he now stripped him of his dignities, and wreaked his revenge on Pole's family and relations. The pope, however, took care to reward his attachment to the see of Rome, by presenting him with a cardinal's hat, which bound him closer than ever to the interest of his holiness.

The suppression of the small monasteries, though enacted in the first session of parliament, did not take place till the month of August this year, when it occasioned great clamours through the whole nation, as the visitors executed their commission with inhuman severity, and were guilty of the grossest embezzlements: and the pope having again excommunicated Henry, and declared him deposed, put the kingdom under an interdict, and forbidden his subjects to obey him, the monks everywhere insinuated into the minds of the country people, that it was their duty to take up arms against one who had trampled under foot all their civil and religious liberties. The people, who had sucked in with their milk the principles that were now at once to be abolished, eagerly listened to these insinuations; and the popish emissaries had been so successful, that in Lincolnshire, about the end of September, upwards of twenty thousand souls assembled under the command of one Mackerel, prior prior of Barlings, who took the name of Captain Cobler, and published their grievances by way of petition to the king, complaining of the suppression of the monasteries, the subversion of their ancient faith, the embracing new doctrines, &c. The king answered this petition in an ample manifesto, and sent the duke of Suffolk, with a few troops, to reduce the mutineers to obedience, who upon promise of pardon dispersed of themselves; but their leader being taken, with some of the principal ringleaders, they were executed for treason and rebellion.

This success was of the greatest consequence to the king's affairs, for at this time one Aske, a gentleman of fortune in Yorkshire, extremely well fitted to act at the head of a popular insurrection, had drawn the people of that county together, and they were joined by a little army of outed monks, who carried before them a banner, on which a crucifix and the five wounds, with a chalice, were painted. The same device was worn upon their sleeves, to animate them in favour of their endangered religion: they gave their march the title of the Pilgrimage of Grace, and all who joined them were obliged to take an oath, "that they entered into the Pilgrimage of Grace for the love of God, the preservation of the king's person and issue, the purifying the nobility and driving away all base-born counsellors, and for no particular profit of their own, nor to do displeasure to any, nor to kill any person for envy, but to take before them the cross of Christ, his faith, the restitution of the church, and the suppression of heretics and their opinions." These specious pretences so deluded the people, that the rebels were soon forty thousand strong; and meeting with no resistance, they sat suddenly down before Pontefract castle, which was looked upon as a place of strength, and which was then held by the archbishop of York and Thomas lord Darcy, who quickly surrendered to them: they next made themselves masters of York and Hull; and Aske, by persuasions and threats, obliged all the nobility of the county to join him, except Henry Clifford, earl of Cumberland, who held out his castle of Skipton against all the rebel forces, and sir Ralph Ewer, who defended his castle of Scarborough till he was relieved, though himself and men had nothing to subsist on for three weeks but bread and water.

The government not being able to muster above five thousand men, and finding that the rebels were not to be amused, a proclamation was published, ordering all the nobility to meet the king at Northampton on the seventh of November; in the mean time his little army, under the command of the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Shrewsbury, and the marquis of Exeter, encamped at Doncaster, must have been entirely routed by the rebels, who advanced to give them battle, had not the river Don, the only pass by which they could advance to the town, happily been rendered impassable by a heavy rain. This lucky accident gave the duke of Norfolk an opportunity to propose a conference with the chiefs of the mutineers, when the latter gave in the following demands:

"That a general pardon be granted; a parliament to be held at York, and courts of justice to be held there; that none on the north side of Trent might be brought to London upon any law-suit; they desired a repeal of some acts of parliament, those for the last subsidy, for uses, for making words misprision of treason, and for the clergy's paying first-fruits and tenths to the king: they desired the princess Mary might be restored to her right of succession, the pope to his wonted jurisdiction, and the monks to their houses again; that the Lutherans might be punished; that Audley, the lord-chancellor, and Cromwell, the lord privy-seal, might be excluded from the next parliament; and Leigh and Leighton, who had visited the monasteries, might be imprisoned for bribery and extortion."

Though the king was highly exasperated against the insurgents, yet the accounts he daily received of their strength obliged him, much against his will, to send down a general pardon, directed to the duke of Norfolk, but with orders not to publish it but in the last extremity. That very soon happened, for the rebels once more preparing to force the passage of the river, the duke was obliged to publish the pardon. This restored a short tranquility; but the priests renewing their practices for disturbing the public peace, and with too much success, the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Shrewsbury had orders to continue in the North all the winter. The duke using his power with great rigour, by putting the martial law in full force against every one who would not take the oath of supremacy, those proceedings gave rise to a fresh rebellion. Two gentlemen, called Musgrave and Treby, putting themselves at the head of eight thousand peasants, made an attempt upon Carlisle, from which however they were repulsed, and afterwards entirely defeated by the duke of Norfolk. Musgrave escaped, but Treby, with seventy of his followers, were taken and hanged upon the walls of Carlisle.

This happened in February, 1537, and the king now ordered to court such of the heads of the former insurrection whom he thought he had most reason to fear: Aske readily obeyed, and at first was well received at court; but the lords Darcy, Hussy, and other chiefs of the rebels, not following his example, were seized and sent prisoners to London. The two noblemen were arraigned at Westminster, found guilty, and beheaded on Tower-hill; those of inferior degree were hanged at Tyburn and other places; Aske himself, leaving the court shortly after without licence, was taken and hanged in chains at York, notwithstanding the general pardon which had been granted.

Fortunately for Henry, James V. was in France during these rebellions, so that the insurgents had no assistance from Scotland. James returned home with his young queen, Magdalen, daughter of Francis, whom he had lately espoused, about the beginning of the year; and she dying soon after her arrival in Scotland, cardinal Beaton and Robert Maxwell were sent over to France, to treat of another marriage between James and Mary of Guise, the duke of Longueville's widow, which soon after took place.

Henry was now so flushed with slaughter by the frequent executions carried on by his order and under his eye, that he seemed to take a delight in shedding blood: he ordered Thomas Fitz Gerald, son of the late earl of Kildare, twice lord-deputy of Ireland, and five of his uncles, after a long confinement in the Tower for an insurrection in Ireland, to be executed on the thirtieth of March,

for

for a terror to that people, who he feared would rise and join the emperor against his crown and authority in Ireland: but the earl of Kildare's youngest son, Gerald Fitz Gerald, had the good fortune to make his escape by a stratagem, and got over to France, and from thence to the Low Countries; but finding it unsafe to continue there, he went and offered his service to cardinal Pole, who afterwards made use of him in his designs against his king and country.

The king's next care was so to ruin the affairs of the monks, who had been the principal promoters of the late disturbances, that they might never more be able to give him trouble; and having employed secretary Cromwell to procure addresses from the two universities, setting forth, that the numbers of religious houses still remaining were unprofitable, nay pernicious, to the Christian religion, as tending only to harbour lazy drones and swarms of impostors, he gave orders for a total suppression of many of those houses, and to seize their revenues. The rich abbey of Furness, in Lincolnshire, surrendered on the ninth of April; the abbey of Bermondsey, in Surry, on the first of June: and that of Bisham, in Berkshire, on the fifth of July.

On the twelfth of October, this year, the queen was delivered of a young prince, at Hampton-court, to the inexpressible joy of all the nation, and of Henry in particular. The having a son and undoubted heir to all his dominions, was a blessing which had been the subject of his most ardent wishes; but his satisfaction on this occasion received a considerable check by the death of the queen soon after her delivery: she was the best beloved of all his wives, and highly celebrated for her humility, goodness, and affability. She was buried with great pomp at Windsor. Henry was so afflicted with the loss of her, that, for some days after her death, he shut himself up from all company.

The new-born prince was baptized by the name of Edward; and, three days after, he was declared prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester. To distinguish this happy event the more, sir Edward Seymour, brother to the queen, was created earl of Hertford and lord Beauchamp; sir William Fitz Williams, lord high admiral of England, was created earl of Southampton: some months after, sir William Paulet, treasurer of the household, was made lord St. John; and sir John Russel, comptroller, was created lord Russel.

But the birth of a son and heir did not free Henry from the terrors of an invasion which he saw threatening him from the emperor, who had concluded a truce with the king of France, that he might be more at liberty, with all the forces of Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries, to attack England. The king therefore came to a final resolution of suppressing all the religious houses in his dominions, considering them as seminaries for promoting disaffection to his government, and the monks as subjects to the pope rather than to himself, devoted wholly to the interest of the see of Rome, and using all their endeavours to alienate the minds of the people from their lawful sovereign, and seduce them to an implicit obedience to the papal authority, by continual pretences to false miracles, or other monastic jugglings; and at the same time were themselves ready, on every occasion, to promote and further the schemes of the pope and the emperor against his crown and dignity.

Fearful however, that this measure might occasion some clamours in the nation, he prudently began with removing the prejudices of the people, by exposing the enormities committed in those receptacles of vice and debauchery, and to disabuse them with regard to the supposed sanctity of relics, images, and all other trumpery of superstition: he ordered the commissioners to examine, and, if possible, discover the arts by which the monks imposed upon the ignorance of the vulgar. This second visitation produced a detection of an infinite number of holy cheats, and pretended relics, made use of to encourage superstition rather than devotion in the people, and to draw them into pilgrimages and offerings. The principal of these we have, to satisfy the curiosity of the reader, thrown into a note at the foot of the page*. The discoveries made on this occasion raised a general indignation in all ranks, to find how they had been abused: they detested the authors of such forgeries; the monasteries grew infamous, and thus was the English superstition, in point of images and relics, extinguished.

The multitude of those impositions gave Henry, who wanted to have the great houses dissolved,

* With regard to the implements of idolatry and superstition, Reading seems to have been the grand repository of the nation. There the visitors found an angel with one wing, that brought over the head of the spear that pierced the side of Jesus Christ, with such a catalogue of other relics as filled up four sheets of paper.

At St. Edmundsbury, they discovered some of the coals that roasted St. Laurence; the parings of St. Edmund's toes; the girdle of the Virgin Mary, and some of her milk; the head of St. Ursula; the penknife and boots of St. Thomas a Becket; part of the same saint's shirt, much revered by big-bellied women; and certain relics to prevent a head-ach, and the generation of weeds among corn.

There were likewise discovered in the monasteries, some impostures of a more artificial nature. At Hales, in the county of Gloucester, had been shewn, for several ages, the blood of Christ, pretended to be brought from Jerusalem; and it is natural to think, that this relic would be held in the highest estimation.

This relic was supposed to be attended with a very surprising circumstance: the sacred blood was not visible to any one in mortal sin, even when set before him; and, till he had performed good works sufficient for his absolution, it would not deign to discover itself to his longing eyes.

At the dissolution of the monastery, the whole contrivance was discovered. Two of the monks, who were entrusted with the secret, had taken the blood of a duck, which they renewed every week; they put it into a phial, one side of which was thin and transparent, and the other thick and obscure. When any rich pilgrim arrived, they were sure to shew him the dark side of the phial, till masses and offerings had expiated his crimes; and then, finding his money, or patience, or faith, exhausted, they blessed him with the happy sight, by turning the bright side of the phial.

There was a crucifix at Boxley in Kent, distinguished by the name of the Rood of Grace, which had been long held in the highest veneration, because it had been seen to bend and raise itself, shake the head, hands, and feet, roll the eyes, and move the lips. The puppet, being brought to London, was broke in pieces, in sight of the people, at St. Paul's cross, where with their own eyes, they beheld the springs and wheels by which it had been actuated.

A great wooden idol of Wales, called Darvel Gatheren, was brought up to London, and cut in pieces: and, by a cruel refinement of vengeance, it was employed as fuel to burn friar Forrest, who was condemned for denying the supremacy, and some heretical opinions.

A finger of St. Andrew, covered with a thin plate of silver, had been pawned by the convent of Westacre, for a debt of forty pounds; but as the king's commissioners refused to redeem the pledge, the people made merry with the poor creditor, on account of his security.

vast advantages, as it is natural to think that the religious of monasteries where they were carried on, would submit to any thing rather than be exposed, and might easily be brought to surrender their houses, to avoid the punishment they deserved. Such impurities and disorders were found in many as would surpass credibility, if not unexceptionably attested; and some were so notoriously guilty, that they signed concessions of the dissoluteness of their lives and conversation. A great number of monks, and even some abbots and friars, were found guilty of holding correspondence with the rebels, and executed as traitors; and the rest, as they had now no privileges to screen them from the civil judicature, were glad to compound for their offences by a surrender of their monasteries. On one or other of these accounts, no less than one hundred and fifty-nine monasteries were resigned in the course of the year 1538 into the king's hands; and the example continually gained ground, so that hardly a week passed without some new surrender.

Whilst Henry was thus employed in rooting out superstition and burning images the most in repute for peculiar virtues and wonder working properties, he could not well overlook the most famous and respected of all the instruments of popish idolatry, the shrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Becket was indebted for his sainthood to the vigorous efforts he had exerted in defence of the authority of the holy see, and therefore it may be readily conceived how obnoxious to Henry a saint of this character must appear, and how contrary to all his schemes of abolishing the power of the pontiff of Rome: he could not bear the thoughts that such a furious and obstinate rebel to his prince should be held in such veneration, and his tomb frequented by such numerous pilgrimages, and enriched with such superb presents. Processes were in those days carried on against the dead in the same manner as against the living: the like form was used towards Becket; his life and actions underwent a strict examination, and were generally condemned; the miracles pretended to be wrought at his tomb were proved to be forgeries; his name was ordered to be erased from the calendar, the office for his festival expunged from the breviary, his bones to be burnt, and his ashes dispersed. At the same time the riches of his shrine, which were inestimable, were converted to the king's use: among other things there was a very fine diamond, which Lewis VII. of France, who made a pilgrimage to this saint's remains, had deposited at his tomb, was by Henry's orders set in a ring, which he ever after wore on his thumb. Thus did Henry at once indulge his two darling passions, avarice and revenge, by enriching himself with the spoils, and uncanonizing a prelate whom the papal power had, for his insolence to his king, raised to be a saint.

The news of these proceedings no sooner reached Rome, than that city was filled with libels and satires against the person and conduct of Henry: he was represented as the most impious and sacrilegious tyrant that ever disgraced the royal title or dignity: he was compared to Belshazzar, Nero, Domitian, Dioclesian, and in particular to Julian the Apostate, whom he was said to resemble in his learning and apostacy, though greatly inferior in point of morals.

In these invectives, which were handed about all over Europe, cardinal Pole's style was easily distinguished. Henry, whose vanity and bloody disposition increased every day, resolved to avenge himself for these gross insults on all the friends of Pole in England, and the more especially as the emissaries he kept at the court of Rome informed him, that all the intelligence from England was addressed to the cardinal. He ordered Courtney, marquis of Exeter (who was son to Catherine, daughter to Edward IV.), Pole, lord Montague, sir Edward Neville, brother to lord Abergavenny, and sir Geoffrey Pole, to be arrested for corresponding with that prelate, who, being found guilty, were all beheaded except sir Geoffrey Pole, who, having turned evidence against the rest, had his pardon. These were shocking severities; but, indeed, if it was duly proved that the sufferers held a correspondence with Pole, Henry is not so blameable, since it is certain that at this time Pole was the pope's agent to stir up not only England, but all Europe, against Henry.

Pope Paul III. had hitherto suspended the bull of excommunication, which he had formerly passed against Henry, in hopes of being one day able to accommodate his difference with that monarch; but finding that the late proceedings in England had shut the door against all reconciliation, he, on the seventeenth of December this year, published the bull with great solemnity, and endeavoured to excite the neighbouring princes against the English monarch, and even offered his kingdom to James of Scotland, provided he was able and willing to subdue it: and his agents found means to affix this bull in several places, both in France, Scotland, and Ireland. Henry, terrified by this mock thunder, resolved to set his holiness at defiance: with this view he exacted of all bishops and abbots a new oath, by which they renounced the pope's authority: and a new translation of the Bible, which had been undertaken at the instance of Cranmer and Cromwell (who thought nothing could so effectually root out papal superstition as a free toleration of the scriptures in the vulgar tongue), being completed, he ordered copies thereof to be immediately printed, and set up in every church, at the joint expence of the incumbent and parishioners; and at the same time Cromwell obtained the royal warrant, enjoining the clergy to read the Lord's Prayer, the Confession of Faith, and the Ten Commandments in English: they were ordered to recommend good works, and to teach the people that relics, rosaries, and all other trumpery of the like nature, were unnecessary to salvation. All the images, to which devotees were accustomed to make offerings, were removed; all the tapers were taken away out of the churches, except those that burned before the images of Christ; and all the invocations of "Ora pro nobis" (Pray for us), added to the prayers addressed to saints, were entirely abolished.

Much about the same time, viz. the beginning of the year 1539, the king having understood that there was a learned man, named Lambert, who denied the real presence in the sacrament, to which Henry was blindly devoted, notwithstanding that it is, of all the absurdities of the Romish church, the most absurd and ridiculous; this vain monarch thought he had found a fine opportunity portunity where he could at once exercise his supremacy and display his learning, resolved to have the glory of disputing with this reformer, who had appealed from a sentence given against him by archbishop Cranmer. Public notice was accordingly given, that the king designed to enter the lists against this school-master, for he was of no higher degree, and scaffolds were erected in Westminster-hall for the accommodation of the audience, without any regard had to the injustice of thus mixing the disputant and the judge. The end of this disputation was, that Henry gave his antagonist his choice, either to recant his opinion, or to be burned: Lambert nobly made choice of the latter, and the king had the mean cruelty to order him to be executed, which was inflicted upon him with the greatest rigour.

But a parliamentary sanction was now required, as well to confirm what had been done, as to establish future measures: accordingly, on the twenty-eighth of April, the parliament sat, whom Henry found still complying in every thing; and, among many remarkable statutes, it was enacted,

“That the king, for the time being, with the advice of his council, or the more part of them, may set forth proclamations, under such penalties and pains as to him and them shall seem necessary, which shall be observed as though they were made by act of parliament: but this shall not be prejudicial to any person's inheritance, offices, liberties, goods, chattels, or life. And whosoever shall willingly offend any article contained in the said proclamation, shall pay such forfeiture, or be so long imprisoned, as shall be expressed in the said proclamation. And if any offending will depart the realm, to the intent he will not answer his said offence, he shall be adjudged a traitor.”

By another act, the king was empowered to nominate such a number of bishops, fees for bishops, cathedral churches, and endow them with such possessions as he will. By another act the order of the house of lords was regulated: Cromwell, as king's vicegerent in ecclesiastical matters, was to have the precedency of both archbishops. It was likewise enacted, “That all leases made of manors belonging to monasteries dissolved, or to be dissolved, and assured to the king, should take effect; wherein is expressed, that the king should possess and enjoy to him, his heirs, and successors, for ever, all monasteries, abbeys, priories, nunneries, colleges, hospitals, houses of friars, or other religious and ecclesiastical houses and places, which, since the fourth of February, 27 Henry VIII. have been dissolved, suppressed, renounced, relinquished, forfeited, given up, or by any other means come to his highness; or which shall be dissolved, &c. as also all manors, lordships, lands, tenements, rights, liberties, &c. belonging to them; all which (except such as came by attainder or treason) should be under survey and governance of the king's court of augmentation of the revenues of the crown; other mens titles yet saved.”

In this parliament a committee of religion was appointed, upon the lord-chancellor's motion, shewing it to be the king's desire to have all his subjects of one religion. The members of the committee were the lord vice gerent, Cromwell, the two archbishops, the bishops of Durham, Bath and Wells, Ely, Bangor, Carlisle, and Worcester. The archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of Ely and Worcester, and Cromwell, were on one side; and the debates were so violent, that on the sixteenth of May, the duke of Norfolk told the lords, that the committee had made no progress, and that therefore he would take the liberty to offer to the house certain articles to be debated on, and, if approved, to pass into the form of a perpetual law. These articles were as follow.

“First, If any person, by word, writing, printing, cyphering, or any otherwise, do preach, teach, dispute, or hold opinion, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under form of bread and wine (after the consecration thereof), there is not present really the natural body and blood of our saviour Jesus Christ, conceived of the Virgin Mary; or that, after the said consecration, there remaineth any substance of bread and wine, or any other substance but the substance of Christ, God and man; or that in the flesh under form of bread, is not the very blood of Christ; or that the blood, under form of wine, is not the very flesh of Christ as well apart as though they were both together, or affirm the said sacrament to be of other substance than is aforesaid, or deprave the said blessed sacrament, then he shall be adjudged an heretic, and suffer death by burning, and shall forfeit to the kings all lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods, and chattels, as in case of high-treason.

“Secondly, And if any person preach, in any sermon or collection openly made, or teach in any common school or congregation, or obstinately affirm or defend, that the communion of the blessed sacrament in both kinds is necessary for the health of man's soul, or ought, or should be administered in both kinds, or that it is necessary to be received by any person other than the priest, being at mass and consecrating the same:

“Fourthly, Or that any man or woman which advisedly hath vowed, or professed, or should avow or profess chastity or widowhood, may marry, or contract marriage:

“Fifthly, Or that private masses be not lawful, or not laudable, or should not be used, or be not agreeable to the laws of God:

“Sixthly, Or that auricular confession is not expedient and necessary to be used in the church of God; he shall be adjudged to suffer death, and forfeit lands and goods as a felon.”

These articles, before they passed into the form of a law, admitted of great debates. The third and fourth pointed directly at Cranmer, who spoke greatly against all but the first, he being himself a Lutheran. As to the other articles, they were matter of private speculation, but against Cranmer's sense. They were, however, carried into a most bloody and detestable law, and Henry himself took great pains in drawing up and correcting them into the form we see them here. At the same time the chancellor moved for a bill to be brought in, for punishing such as disputed against those articles: the archbishop of York, the bishops of Durham and Winchester, with Dr. Tregonwell, a master in chancery, had the drawing up of this bill, which was more to Henry's liking than one which had been presented by the other party. On the seventh of June it was brought into the house, and had a first reading; on the ninth it was read a second time;

time; on the tenth it was engrossed, and read a third time. Bishop Burnet, who was a great favourer of Cranmer, says, that when it passed the house of peers, Henry himself desired Cranmer to leave the house, as he could not in conscience vote for the bill, but that Cranmer replied "He could as little in conscience vote against it," and therefore staid for that purpose.

The title of this act was, "An act for abolishing diversity of opinions in certain articles concerning the Christian religion." It appears from the preamble to the act, in which the articles are rehearsed, that Henry himself was present at every day's debate, and made a great parade of his learning in the house of peers, so that the parliament gave him public thanks. After rehearsing the articles, which we have already seen, it is enacted, "that if any, after the twelfth of July, did speak, preach, or write, against the first article, they were to be judged heretics, and to be burned, without any abjuration, and to forfeit their real and personal estates to the king: and those who preached, or obstinately disputed against the other articles, were to be judged felons, and to suffer death as felons without benefit of the clergy: and those who, either in word or writing, spoke against them, were to be prisoners during the king's pleasure, and forfeit their goods and chattels to the king for the first time; and if they offend so the second time, they were to suffer as felons. All the marriages of priests are declared void; and if any priest did still keep any such woman, whom he had so married, and lived familiarly with her as his wife, he was to be judged a felon: and if a priest lived carnally with any other woman, he was, upon the first conviction, to forfeit his benefices, goods, and chattels, and to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure; and upon the second conviction, to suffer as a felon. The women so offending were also to be punished in the same manner as the priests. And those who contemned, or abstained from confession, or the sacrament, at the accustomed times, for the first offence were to forfeit their goods and chattels, and be imprisoned; and for the second, were to be adjudged of felony. And for the execution of this act, commissions were to be issued out to all archbishops and bishops, and the chancellors and commissaries, and such others in the several shires, as the king should name, to hold their sessions quarterly, or oftener; and they were to proceed upon presentments and by a jury. Those commissioners were to swear, that they should execute their commission indifferently, without favour, affection, corruption, or malice: all ecclesiastical incumbents were to read this act in their churches once a quarter. And in the end a proviso was added, concerning the vows of chastity, that they should not oblige any, except such as had taken them at or above the age of twenty-one years, or had not been compelled to take them."

Such were the detestable articles which opened in England the flood-gates of civil murder: and now the reader is to expect, during the remainder of this reign, to meet with barbarities committed under the forms of justice, as detestable as any to be met with in profane history, and under the most bloody tyrants. Cranmer alone had the good fortune to weather the storm of Henry's indignation, for his opposition to the articles; but he thought proper to send his wife, whom he had married in Germany, back for some time to her own country. The countess of Salisbury, cardinal Pole (her son), the marchioness of Exeter, sir Adrian Fortescue, and sir Thomas Dingley, were attainted of treason, as accomplices with the late marquis of Exeter: the countess of Salisbury, though seventy years of age, behaved with great spirit; but upon her trial a correspondence between her and her son was proved, some of the pope's bulls were found in her house, and she was convicted of not suffering any servant about her to comply with the alteration introduced by the king into religion. Fortescue and Dingley were executed, as the countess was two years after; but the marchioness died a natural death, and the cardinal kept out of Henry's reach. It appears that Cromwell drove on those prosecutions very furiously, and asked the judges for their opinions, whether a man might be attainted in parliament without being brought to make an answer? The judges answered, "That the parliament being the supreme judicature, whatever it did was law, and could not be questioned:" by this answer abolishing that sacred distinction between an absolute and arbitrary power.

All the religious houses throughout England, to the number of six hundred and forty-five, were by this time suppressed, either by surrender, purchase, or forfeiture, ninety colleges had been demolished, two thousand three hundred and seventy four chantries, and one hundred and ten hospitals*; but all this had been done without the authority of parliament, it was therefore necessary to have its concurrence and sanction, which was easily obtained; and Henry having formed a scheme for erecting several new bishoprics, and for endowing them with the lands of dissolved monasteries, an act passed for enabling him to execute this design. He proposed to found sixteen, but having disposed too lavishly of the lands destined at first for their endowment, he erected only six bishoprics, viz. of Westminster, Chester, Oxford, Bristol, Gloucester, and Peterborough. There were libraries well furnished with books in several of the abbeyes, and, out of the great regard he had for learning, he employed the famous antiquary John Leland to collect all the most valuable manuscripts and choicest monuments of antiquity that were left in those houses. He also proposed several other noble foundations, particularly of a college for the study of the civil law, the purity of the Latin and French languages, and the knowledge of foreign affairs, to serve as a seminary for ministers of state and ambassadors to foreign courts. There could not be a more favourable opportunity for effecting these useful schemes than what now offered, but Henry's own prodigality, and the rapaciousness of his courtiers, prevented this and others of his best designs.

The parliament having thus servilely complied with all that Henry could ask, and having sat to the twenty eighth of June, was then prorogued to the third of November, afterwards to the fourteenth of January, and again to the twelfth of April, in the ensuing year, when it sat again to do business; but in the interim there fell out several events which deserve to be related.

As soon as the parliament broke up, the six bloody articles were vigorously executed; commissioners were appointed in every county to detect any who should be hardy enough to disobey them. Shaxton, bishop of Salisbury, and Latimer, bishop of Worcester, resigned their sees rather than subscribe to them; but this expedient did not deliver them from the persecution now raised against all recusants: they were accused of having spoken against the articles, and therefore were immediately committed to the Tower, after they had resigned their instruments into the king's hands: the strong personal friendship which Henry had for Cranmer, preserved that prelate from the same treatment, though he had not only openly opposed them in the house, but even spoke and wrote against them.

The king's will was now become the sole measure of the law, because both the protestant and popish party cultivated his favour with the most abject complaisance: Bonner, lately made bishop of London, though in secret a zealous partizan of the pope's power, managed his interest with such dexterity, that he obtained letters patent adjudging to him the spiritualities as well as the temporalities of his bishopric during the king's pleasure: and Gardiner, a most bigotted son of the Romish church, maintained his influence by the most extravagant submission and profound dissimulation.

On the other hand, Cranmer and Cromwell, alarmed at the bloody statutes and several other proceedings of Henry, which seemed to denote his attachment to the catholic faith, and finding their credit begin to decline, thought there was no method so effectual to recover their influence as that of persuading the king to espouse another wife, upon whose protection they could depend. With this view they cast their eyes upon Anne, daughter to the duke of Cleves, and younger sister to the duchess of Saxony. Henry was so well pleased with this proposal, when made to him, that he employed Cromwell to negotiate the marriage: the famous Hans Holbein was ordered to draw the lady's picture, and did it so flatteringly, that Henry grew fond of her at distance; in short, the negotiation went so briskly on that the match was concluded in a few weeks; and the old duke of Cleves dying in the mean while, a counter-marriage was proposed between the princess Mary of England and the young duke of Cleves; but though this marriage did not take effect, the earl of Southampton (Fitz Williams) was ordered, in November, to go with a fleet of fifty ships to bring over the new queen, who about the end of December this year arrived in England.

While this matter was transacting, and some time before, Henry foreseeing a rupture between the emperor and the Protestants of Germany, sent new ambassadors to the league of Smalcald to encourage them in their opposition to the house of Austria, and to promise he would engage in their association; but they perceiving his only drift was to amuse them and intimidate the emperor by means of a negotiation with his enemies, they frankly gave the English monarch to understand that they would not unite with him on any other terms than that of his accepting the Augsburg Confession of Faith. They said, they had heard, with great mortification, of his persecuting their brethren in his kingdom, and in particular complained of the law of the six articles, the injustice of which Melancthon explained to him in a submissive letter. Henry was shocked at the freedom of their expostulation; and Gardiner, who dreaded, as a fatal blow to the catholic religion, an alliance between Henry and the protestant princes, by flattering his master's vanity effectually kept alive his resentment.

Towards the end of this year the inhabitants of Ghent mutinied, and offered to acknowledge the French king for their sovereign, if he would protect them from the resentment of the emperor. But Francis rejected their proposal, which he communicated to Charles, who had by this time amused him so effectually with the promise of restoring to him the duchy of Milan, that he ventured to pass through his dominions on the faith of a simple safe-conduct, and even visited him at Paris, where he was received with the same honours which the French paid to their own sovereign.

It was at this very period that Anne of Cleves arrived in England; and the union of this princess with Henry would, in all probability, have totally frustrated all the attempts of Gardiner and the rest of the popish party for the future, had she answered the beauty and great character given of her by her friends; but when Henry, all impatience to see his consort, of whom he had entertained so high an idea, beheld her on her arrival at Rochester, whither he went for that purpose, he was so disappointed, that he is said to have sworn in a rage, "that they had brought over a Flanders mare to him." However gross and indelicate his expressions might be, his behaviour was more decent, for next day he made her a private visit. This lady is allowed on all hands to have possessed a great sweetness of temper, but as her person was far from being delicate, as she had a masculine turn and floridness of features, could speak nothing but German, which Henry did not understand, and was extremely defective in all the winning graces of behaviour and conversation, he conceived an incurable aversion for her, and even then would abruptly have broken off the match, had not his affairs at home required the friendship and alliance of the German princes, her relations; these considerations, which were urged very home by Cranmer and Cromwell, made him at length consent to proceed in the marriage, but with so visible a reluctance, as made Cromwell and all his party tremble.

On the sixth of January, 1540, the marriage was celebrated, but it served only to encrease Henry's dislike into downright loathing: he told Cromwell next morning, that he suspected the queen was no maid, and that he could never conquer his aversion to so disagreeable a partner as she was; and there the matter rested for some time.

Henry still continuing to be alarmed at the close connection that appeared to subsist between the king of France and the emperor, immediately upon Charles's departure from the French court, sent over the duke of Norfolk with very great proposals to Francis, if he would break with the emperor: he offered him his assistance for recovering Milan, to discharge all the arrears of his pension, and to enter into a strict league with him, both against the pope and the house of Austria: but Francis, who still flattered himself that Charles would perform his promises to him, rejected all the duke's proposals. The French monarch, however, was the

the dupe of the dependence he placed on the emperor, for that prince no sooner got into his own dominions than he made several shuffling excuses in relation to bestowing on Francis the investiture of Milan; and at last, having suppressed the insurrection of Ghent, flatly denied his having made any such promise.

The parliament meeting on the twelfth of April, Cromwell opened the sessions with a speech, in which he informed the two houses, that the king, in order to terminate all disputes about religion, had appointed commissioners to examine the contested articles, that a standard of faith might be established upon the word of God alone; and that after the truth should be thus made known to his people, he was resolved to punish with the utmost severity all those who should presume to prefer their own opinions to the established articles of belief. Those commissioners, being approved by the parliament, received orders to begin their enquiry without delay: and in the mean time the king created Cromwell earl of Essex, upon the death of Bourchier by a fall from his horse, and all the estate of that ancient and noble family went along with the title*.

But he did not long enjoy these smiles of fortune and of his prince's favour; for on the parliament's breaking up, which was prorogued to the twenty-fifth of May, the duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, and the rest of the popish party, resolved to work his ruin, hoping that his fall would facilitate a reconciliation with the pope, which Cromwell always opposed. They did not, however, chuse to make this attack abruptly, but contrived to throw Catherine Howard (daughter to the lord Edmund Howard, the duke's brother), a beautiful young lady, in the king's way, who was still fretting at his disappointment with Anne of Cleves, knowing very well, that if the young lady could gain his affections, there would be no hazard in the attempt upon the obnoxious minister. Gardiner, at once the priest and the pander, took upon him the management of this affair. Catherine was brought to court; the king liked her, and the bishop made frequent entertainments at his own house for the royal lover and his mistress; and Henry was so pleased with her company, that she won his consent to marry her.

This new affection in Henry consequently raised the duke of Norfolk's and Gardiner's credit high in the cabinet; and the king, thinking himself in no necessity to continue his negotiations with the German protestant powers, in which Cromwell served him chiefly, grew more and more cool towards that minister, and seemed pleased to hear any thing to his disadvantage: the duke and the bishop, eagerly bent upon his destruction, let slip no opportunity of blackening him in Henry's opinion. They represented to him, that the kingdom in general was dissatisfied with his minister, who, they believed, had abused his majesty's confidence; that as these complaints and murmurings were chiefly about religion, under the direction of the vicegerent, it would be prudent to satisfy the people by examining his conduct strictly, and even to sacrifice him, in order to ensure tranquility. In short, these and the like insinuations had such an effect on Henry, that he resolved the ruin of this too faithful servant, that he might make a merit of offering a sacrifice to the public resentment. This resolution, however, was kept so secret, that, unsuspecting any thing, the destined victim came to the council-board on the thirteenth of June, where the duke of Norfolk, by Henry's order, arrested him for high-treason; and he was sent prisoner to the Tower, where he experienced the common fate of all degraded ministers. He was no sooner seized, but forsaken by all but his friend Cranmer, who alone ventured to write to the king in his favour, though to no purpose; for the unfortunate Cromwell, without being heard in his own defence, was, by a bill of attainder, found guilty of divers heresies and treasons, and condemned to suffer the pains of death, as the king should think proper to direct.

The fall of Cromwell was immediately followed by the dissolution of the marriage of Henry and his new wife; a dissolution which he had almost from her first arrival wished for, not only on account of his aversion to her person, but because he was by this time become enamoured of Catherine Howard, as already mentioned. The whole house of lords, with a committee of the commons, waited upon the king with an address, desiring he would order trial to be made of the validity of his marriage; and Henry complying with their request (which he himself, indeed, put them upon making), a commission was granted for trying it in convocation. They forthwith proceeded to the examination of witnesses, including the depositions of the king, the members of the privy-council, a declaration under the hand of Cromwell, signed in the Tower, the evidence of the earl of Southampton, sir Anthony Denny, Dr. Chambers and Dr. Butts the queen's physicians, and some of the ladies of the bed-chamber. The substance of the whole amounted to these particulars: that there had been a precontract between the queen and the marquis of Lorraine; that it did not appear whether these espousals were made by the parties themselves, or in words of the present tense; that the king, having married her against his will, had not given a pure, inward, and complete consent; and that he had never consummated the marriage.

These frivolous objections were strongly insisted on by the popish party; and Cranmer, being influenced by the fear of irrecoverably losing the king's favour, yielded his assent, so that the convocation unanimously adjudged the marriage null; and on the ninth day of July sentence was given for its dissolution. On the tenth this sentence was notified to both houses, by whom it was approved. Then the king sent the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Southampton, and the bishop of Winchester, to intimate the transaction to Anne of Cleves, who expressed no sort of dissatisfaction at the divorce. They told her, the king would, by letters patent, declare her his adopted sister, and give her precedence before all the ladies of England, except his own wife and daughters; that an estate of three thousand pounds per annum should be allotted for her maintenance; and that she might either live in England, or return to her own country. She chose

* In this session the order of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem was suppressed, on account of their dependence upon the pope and the emperor, and all their effects in England and Ireland confiscated for the use of the king, who allotted three thousand pounds yearly for their maintenance. About this time also Henry put three hospitals, those of St. George, St. Bartholomew, and St. Thomas, together with a new abbey on Tower-hill, into the hands of the city of London.

the former, and was even prevailed upon to write a letter to her brother, the duke of Cleves, the purport of which was, to acquaint him, that she had been most tenderly and generously treated by the king, whom she could not justly have as her husband; and conjuring him not to suffer any thing that had happened to her, to break the good understanding that subsisted between the two courts. Every thing being thus settled, a bill was brought the next day, being the twelfth of July, into parliament, where it passed both houses, for annulling the king's marriage with the queen: by this act the marriage was declared void, and it was made high-treason to judge or believe otherwise*. And here we must observe, that no one could have had the impudence to make use of such reasons as Henry did to bring about the divorce, without being very sure that those to whom they were offered, would be mean enough to allow their validity. The bands of justice and shame had been long broken through, and both clergy and parliament made no scruple of complying with every thing he thought proper to enjoin.

The parliament then proceeded to pass some other acts, viz. for the attainder of the lord Hungerford and several other persons, accused of plotting against the government and being sacramentarians; for the regulating sanctuaries, and reducing their number; for repealing the penalty of death denounced by the statute of the Six Articles against incontinent priests and their women; for confirming what should be declared to be Christian doctrine by the bishops and divines, empowered by the king's commission to draw up a book intitled the Erudition of a Christian man; for erecting a court of wards, and another of the first-fruits and tenths; with others of too special a nature to have a place here.

But we cannot avoid taking particular notice of an act passed at this time, which declared that all marriages should be firm and good, notwithstanding any precontract, not actually carried into consummation. This was a very extraordinary act at this time, after two of Henry's own marriages had been dissolved under the pretence of an unconsummated contract, so that it obliquely condemned the proceedings in both divorces: but we are to remember, that he had a daughter living by Anne Boleyn, whose legitimacy this act justified. The same act mentions, "that all marriages shall be lawful when not within the degrees of kindred mentioned by the law of God." This, no doubt, was made with a view to make way for Henry's marriage with Catherine Howard, who was within the degree of relation prohibited by the canon-law, being cousin-german to Anne Boleyn. The last act of this parliament was a general free pardon of all heresies, treasons, felonies, and offences, but with some exceptions, of which number were Cromwell, the countess of Salisbury, mother to cardinal Pole, and others then in prison†.

As Cromwell's execution had been deferred, he was in some hopes of obtaining his pardon, and the more, as having written the king a very submissive letter: his majesty was so moved therewith, that he caused it to be thrice read over to him; but the solicitations of Norfolk and Gardiner, seconded by those of Catherine Howard, who acted in their favour, rendered the endeavours of the prisoner or his friends fruitless: a minister in disgrace finds few persons generous enough to intercede in his behalf; Cranmer was the only one who discharged the part of a true friend. On this occasion he wrote a very pathetic letter to Henry, interceding for the unhappy Cromwell, declaring his firm belief of his innocence from any disloyal meaning, and even went so far as to wish that Henry might find another counsellor equal to him in capacity, diligence, and fidelity: but the fallen favourite's ruin being resolved on, the king signed a warrant for beheading him on the twenty-eighth of July.

When he was brought to the scaffold on Tower-hill, his regard for his son hindered him from expatiating upon his own innocence: he thanked God for bringing him to that death for his transgressions: he acknowledged his offences against God and his prince, who had raised him from a low degree; confessed that he had been seduced, but that now he died in the catholic faith: then he desired the bystanders to pray for the king, the prince, and for himself: and having spent a little time at his own private devotion, submitted his neck to the executioner, who mangled him in a most shocking manner. However, the care he had taken in his last moments to say nothing that might offend the king, turned to the advantage of his son Gregory, who was, a few months afterwards, created a peer, by the title of lord Cromwell: the office of vicar-general died with Cromwell, no one desiring a post so obnoxious to envy, and so fatal to the first possessor. It now remains to say somewhat concerning the rise and character of this great minister.

Thomas Cromwell was born at Putney, in Surry, about five miles from London; his father was no better than a country blacksmith; but he being blessed with a sprightly genius and a ready capacity to learn languages, acquired so great reputation in the art of war under the duke of Bourbon, whom he accompanied at the sacking of Rome in 1527, and skill in the modern tongues, and interests of the states through which he travelled, as, upon his return, recommended him to the favour and service of cardinal Wolsey. He was retained in the cardinal's service in quality of a solicitor, and discharged that office with so much integrity, resolution, and gratitude to his patron, that, after the cardinal's disgrace and death, the king, notwithstanding he had opposed him, by defending his matter in the house of commons against the articles of impeachment, esteemed him a proper agent for himself in more important affairs, and voluntary retained him in his service. Mr. Cromwell soon improved the royal favour to his own advantage, for the king, who took a pleasure in raising men of low birth to great honours, being highly satisfied with the management of the affairs committed to him, declared him a privy-counsellor and master of the jewel-house, in 1531; and next year raised him to be clerk of the hanaper and chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1534, he was appointed principal secretary of state and master of the Rolls; and in 1535, he was created visitor general, to inspect the estates and abuses of the monks, friars, and nuns, in order to the suppression of their houses; he was afterwards nominated the king's vicar-general over all the spiritualities under his majesty as supreme head of the church; in virtue of which commission he had the superintendency of all the bishops and secular as well as regular clergy in the kingdom. On the second of July, 1536, he was sworn in lord-keeper of the privy-seal; and on the ninth of the same month was advanced to the dignity of a baron of England, with the style and title of lord Cromwell, baron of Oakham, in the county of Rutland. In 1537, he accepted of the office of chief-justice itinerant of all the forests beyond Trent; and the twenty-sixth of August, in the same year, he was honoured with the Garter. In 1538 he obtained the constableness of Carisbroke castle, in the Isle of Wight, besides many other grants from the crown, and a grant of the castle and lordship of Oakham. In 1540, on the seventeenth of April, he was created earl of Essex, and soon after he was made lord high-chamberlain of England.

Cromwell's chief fault was an excess of obsequiousness to the king's pleasure, the effect of an inordinate zeal for his master's service: in other respects he is scarce sufficiently to be admired for his prodigious parts, excellent judgment, infinite application to business, wonderful dexterity in managing affairs, great moderation in the exercise of his authority, calmness of temper in his dealings with all persons, and under provocations sufficient to ruffle the sedatest persons, an uncommon generosity and nobleness of mind, notwithstanding the meanness of his extraction, and for an unexampled condescension in the height of his pomp, vouchsafing to take notice of his old acquaintance, and shew his gratitude for favours received.

Some few days after Cromwell's death, Henry gave a terrible instance of that cruelty which seemed to have taken possession of his soul: papists and reformers were alike the objects of this infernal passion, and suffered in the same flames. Dr. Barnes, who had made a figure in an embassy to the German princes, Thomas Gerard, a reforming minister, and a favourite with the late queen Anne, and William Jerom, vicar of Stepney, who had been, unheard, attainted of heresy by the parliament, and were now condemned to the stake; but when they came there, neither they nor the sheriff knew for what they suffered. Along with them were executed Gregory Buttolph, Adam Damp-lip, Edmund Brinholme, and Clement Philpot (all bigotted papists), for denying the king's supremacy.

On the eighth of August Catherine Howard was declared queen of England, having been for some time privately married to Henry. By this marriage the popish interest was strengthened, and that party made a strong push at Cranmer; but Henry's affection for him was so unmoveable that the plot miscarried: though it is highly probable, that, had not the queen's interest been broken by her incontinency, Cranmer would have followed Cromwell.

All this time Henry was intent upon the reformation he proposed in religion; the commissioners appointed to draw up a declaration of the Christian doctrine, under the title of the Necessary Erudition of a Christian Man, presented their book to the king, who ordered it to be immediately published, and it was, by the royal authority, recommended to all persons as a rule for directing their belief and practice. Of the contents of this book, we shall have occasion to speak in another place.

About the end of this year there were some beginnings of a misunderstanding between Francis and Henry, which at length terminated in a war. Francis had ordered a fortress to be built at Ardres, and a bridge to be made over to the English pale. But the lord Maltravers, governor of Calais, not suffering this encroachment, sent a detachment of his garrison, and beat down the bridge. The French rebuilt it, and the English demolished it a second time: whereupon Francis ordering the marshal de Biez to raise troops in Picardy in order to support the operations of his people, Henry sent a reinforcement to the garrison of Calais, under the command of Henry Howard, earl of Surry, William FitzWilliams, earl of Southampton, and John, lord Ruffel, who also took with them fifteen hundred workmen, to repair the walls and fortification of Guisnes. But the two kings, willing to avoid a rupture on so slight an occasion, it was agreed to name commissioners for ending all differences: the earl of Hertford and sir Edward Karne were appointed by Henry; but, after repeated meetings with the French commissioners, neither party receiving any satisfaction, each provided for their defence in case of an attack.

Francis was much on the same terms with the emperor, who, after refusing to perform his promise in regard to his giving up to Francis the Milanese, had offered his eldest daughter in marriage to the duke of Orleans, with Flanders to her fortune; with the title of king; but Francis, who followed his humour or resentment rather than the maxims of good policy, was resolved to accept of no equivalent for the Milanese, which he considered as his lawful inheritance: this revived the animosity between those princes to a higher degree than ever; and Francis soon had new provocation given him, for having sent ambassadors to the courts of Constantinople and Venice, as they sailed down the Po in a boat, they were assassinated by the orders of the marquis del Vasco, governor of Milan. The French king complained loudly of this outrage, for which, however, Charles refused to give him satisfaction. A war now appeared unavoidable, and both sides prepared for it, fortifying themselves with new alliances; but Francis not being ready, and the emperor engaged in an expedition against Algiers, it did not break out for some time. Such was the general state of things at the end of the year 1540.

But, before we proceed to the transactions which mark the succeeding year, it will be necessary to take notice, that the reformation intended in England, had, by Henry's orders, been carried over to Ireland, where it met with strong opposition from the papists; but in a parliament held at Dublin, in December, 1537, under the lord Grey, who was appointed by Henry his lieutenant in that kingdom, the king's supremacy was there established in the same manner as in England, and the bishop of Rome's authority abolished: but the efforts which the government made for this purpose were so generally disgustful to the people, that it appears, by a letter from Brown, archbishop of Dublin, to secretary Cromwell, that there was a very dangerous correspondence carried on betwixt the native Irish and the Romish powers on the continent. This broke out, in the year 1539, into a general insurrection, tered at Tyburn, on the eighteenth of July this year, for refusing to submit to the new laws: and a little before, orders were given for burning twenty-seven Protestants, viz. John Frith, a man of great learning, Andrew Hewet, and nineteen men and six women, born in Holland, to convince the world that his severity to the ecclesiastics was not actuated by any fondness he was charged with for the new religion.

At length this persecution reached bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More, who still continued prisoners in the Tower, and who were now singled out for a terror to the boldest opposers of the king's measures: Henry was determined they should renounce the pope, and acknowledge his marriage-act and succession, as established by parliament. Pope Paul III. who succeeded Clement VII. thought to save Fisher's life by sending him a cardinal's hat, while matters were preparing for his trial; but in this he only gave Henry the satisfaction of bringing a cardinal to the block; for Fisher refusing to take the oath of supremacy, a commission was made out for trying him by his peers, for misprision of treason in the case of the Maid of Kent, and also for denying the king's supremacy, and on the seventeenth of May he was tried before the lord-chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, with some other lords and all the judges, who found him guilty, and he received sentence of death accordingly. He received the notice of his execution with great composure of mind in the morning before he was beheaded; and when he came to the block, after a short prayer in favour of popery, and praying for the king, and that God would bless him with a good council, he calmly resigned his neck to the executioner, on the twenty-second of June, on Tower-hill. He had the character of a learned and devout man, but very weak and obstinate, and much addicted to the superstitions of his education.

The same oath of supremacy, for the refusing of which bishop Fisher lost his head, being also tendered to sir Thomas More, he refused to take it likewise, for which he was tried by the same court, and lost his head on first day of July; though Henry reaped nothing but reproach and infamy from the death of a man who was universally esteemed for his virtue, and admired for his wit and pleasantries, which did not forsake him even in his last moments; and he died with an unconcern that in others would have appeared to be levity, but in him was nature.

These executions were followed by fresh injunctions issued by Henry to all archbishops and bishops, for enforcing the doctrine of the king's supremacy; a declaration was also sent them by secretary Cromwell to the same effect, which they were ordered to read from their pulpits; and it does not appear that one prelate refused to comply with these orders, so much did they stand in awe of Henry's fiery and vindictive temper: and this seems to be the epocha from whence we may date Henry VIII's resolution to govern by force and absolute power.

At this very time sir Gregory Cassali was still at the court of Rome as Henry's agent, and had frequent conferences with pope Paul about some expedient to heal the breach which Clement VII. had made with England by his too great precipitation; but news arriving that bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More were executed for denying the king's supremacy, the pope broke off all intercourse with Cassali, and, by a thundering bull, passed ecclesiastical censures against the king of England, summoning him, and all his adherents, to appear at Rome within ninety days, to answer for their crimes; if they should fail, he laid them under the sentence of excommunication, deprived the king of his realm, subjected the kingdom to an interdict, declared Henry's issue by Anne Boleyn illegitimate, annulled all treaties which other powers had concluded with the king of England, bestowed his kingdom on the first person who chose to attempt the conquest of it, commanded the English nobility to take arms against him, absolved all his subjects from their allegiance, forbade all Christians to communicate with the English, and declared it lawful for any one to convert their effects to their own use*. This bull was passed on the thirtieth of August, this year; but it was not published at this time, the pope thinking it prudent to delay the publication, until it could be supported by the Imperial arms.

In the mean time the French king, in order to sound the inclinations of Henry, sent over Philip Chabot, admiral of France, to communicate some overtures of peace, which had been made by the emperor. That prince proposed a marriage between the third daughter of Francis and Philip prince of Spain, and another match between the dauphin and the princess Mary, daughter of Henry and Catherine. Henry received this embassy with some degree of contempt: he said, that the emperor's offer of the princess Mary was of itself ridiculous, since she was not at his disposal, and that he knew how to keep her from ever being so; and that as to some other proposals of the emperor, concerning the duchy of Milan, it was very plain that Charles intended only to divide France and England, that he might the better answer his ends upon both: however, Henry proposed, in his turn, that his new-born daughter Elizabeth should be married to the duke of Angoulesme, third son to Francis, on condition that the French king, with the nobility, parliaments, and universities of France, should engage to procure those sentences which had been fulminated by the bishop of Rome, on account of the divorce, revoked. This proposal was embraced by Francis; and accordingly, in May this year, the duke of Norfolk, the bishop of Ely, sir William Fitz Williams, and Dr. Fox, were ordered to treat concerning the marriage with the commissioners of Francis. But the latter demanding that Henry should furnish him with succours for the war he had undertaken against Savoy, and release him entirely from the perpetual pension of one hundred thousand crowns, which he had obliged himself by treaty to pay to the king of England, Henry judged from this demand, that Francis meant only to shuffle with him, and therefore declared, that so far from renouncing the pension, he insisted upon the payment of the arrears within a limited time. This reply broke off the negotiation: and while the emperor carried his arms into Africa, where he restored Muley Hassien to his kingdom of Tunis, from which he had been expelled by the famous corsair Barbarossa, Francis attacked the duchy of Savoy, which he reduced in the very first campaign.

The bull lately signed by the pope was intended rather to terrify Henry, than to be put in force; however, it was so ordered as to be made known to all the courts of Europe: but it had the contrary effect, for, as soon as Henry was informed thereof, and that, amongst other schemes, the pope intended to give England to some of the German popish princes, he resolved to counterballance that project, and engaged Francis I. to concur with him in an embassy to the Protestant league of Smalcald: Henry sent Edward Fox and Dr. Heath, to whom Francis joined William de Bellay, lord of Langey.

But these monarchs proposed an union with the league only in a political view, to keep the emperor employed in that country by an intestine war, without any regard to the Protestant religion. The Protestant princes of Germany, on the other hand, were willing to live in all due subjection to the emperor, provided they could be secured in the free exercise of their religion; therefore, to cover their intentions, and to draw the Protestants into their interest, it was necessary for Henry and Francis to feign a conformity of sentiments with them in religious matters, and a desire to establish the reformation in their kingdoms. Had these sentiments been real, no doubt they would have been readily embraced; but the cruelty with which both kings treated the reformed in their respective dominions was a proof of their insincerity, and therefore, before the princes of the league would proceed in any alliance with them, the duke of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse communicated certain proposals to the English ambassadors, the purport of which appears from lord Herbert to have been as follows:

They demanded, "That Henry should approve and embrace the Augsburg Confession of Faith, and defend it with all his power in a free council; that he should approve of no place for holding a council without their consent; that if the pope should call a council at his own pleasure, Henry should join with them in protesting against it; that he should accept of the title of Protector of the League; that he should never return to the pope's obedience; that he should not assist their enemies; and lastly, that he should pay one hundred thousand crowns towards the defence of the league, and in case of a long war two hundred thousand crowns, upon condition that what was remaining should be restored when the war should be at an end*."

How disagreeable soever these articles were to Henry, the advantage he proposed to himself by gaining the German Protestants to his interest, made him seem to approve of their proposals in general; and, to gain their belief of his sincerity, Fox had instructions to assure the princes, that if commissioners were sent from them to Henry, there would be no manner of doubt of their perfectly agreeing in every thing. But the Germans were not to be so easily imposed upon: they gave in a paper, by which they evidently shewed that Henry had proceeded no farther in the reformation than abolishing the pope's supremacy and some religious houses; but that he still retained all the other most material and gross errors of the Romish church. Thus stood affairs at the close of the year 1535.

On the twenty-ninth of January, 1536, the unhappy queen Catherine died at Kimbolton, in Huntingdonshire, after having suffered a long series of vexations. A little before she expired, she wrote a very affecting letter to the king, to whom she gave the appellation of "her most dear lord, king, and husband." Henry, it seems, was greatly touched at reading this letter, and even dropped some tears at the remembrance of a woman whose virtue deserved a better fate. Queen Anne, however, did not behave with even due decorum on this occasion; she rejoiced openly at the death of Catherine, and seemed to take pleasure in communicating her satisfaction to the public, little thinking that her own fate was so near at hand. The remains of this unfortunate queen were deposited in the abbey-church of Peterborough, which Henry afterwards converted into an episcopal cathedral.

On the fourth of February, this year, the parliament sat for the dispatch of business. The greatest matter which came under their consideration at this time, was to effect an entire union between England and Wales. It appears from the lord Herbert, who has, on this head, introduced into his history a curious dissertation, to which the reader is referred, that at that time, in several counties of Wales different forms of justice prevailed, and the laws were eluded by the greatest criminals, if they had but the good fortune to escape out of one county into another: to remedy these and other flagrant abuses, and to introduce an uniformity throughout all the country, the following act was passed.

"That albeit the dominion, principality, and country of Wales be as a member and part of the temporal crown of this realm, whereof therefore the king is head and ruler, yet, as it hath divers rights, usages, laws, and customs, different from the laws and customs of this realm; and because their language is different from that which is spoken here; and that many rude people hereupon have made distinction and diversity between his highness's other subjects and them, to the causing much discord and sedition; his highness therefore, out of his love and favour to his subjects of Wales, and for reducing them to his laws, doth, by advice and consent of his parliament, ordain and enact, that Wales should be united and incorporated henceforth to and within his realm of England; and that his subjects should enjoy and inherit all and singular freedoms, liberties, rights, privileges, and laws, which his highness's subjects elsewhere enjoy and inherit: and therefore, that inheritances should descend after the manner of England, without division or partition, and not after any tenure or form of Welsh laws and customs. And forasmuch as there are divers lordships-marchers within the said country and dominion of Wales, being no parcel of any other shires, where the laws and one correction is used and had, and that in them and the counties adjoining, manifold murders, robberies, felonies, and the like, have been done, contrary to all law and justice, because the offenders, making their refuge from one lordship-marcher to another, were continued without punishment and correction; therefore, it was enacted, that the said lordships marchers should be united, annexed, and joined to divers shires, specified in the said act."

And now Henry, who had been greatly affronted by the contumacious reports which the monkish

* Seckendorff Hist. of Lutheran. lib. iii.

clergy had spread abroad with regard to his proceedings in the business of the reformation, resolved to take ample vengeance upon them for the same. With this view, after having deliberated with his council, a general visitation was ordered to be made of all the monasteries, and strict inquest to be taken of all their titles and revenues; and also of the morals of the friars and others, and the regulations observed in each order; and secretray Cromwell was, by a commission under the king's own hand, created vicar-general and general visitor of all the monasteries and other privileged places. Cromwell, thus appointed, nominated for his substitutes to examine the monasteries the doctors (in divinity) Leigh, Leighton, Patrick, and London, who drew up a set of heads of visitation, which they well knew would bring in most of the houses guilty. The visitation, the particulars of which will more properly fall into the ecclesiastical part of our history, was accordingly performed with great rigour, and, if we may credit the reports of the visitors themselves, they discovered such abominations and scenes of vice, debauchery, and imposture, as were not only disgraceful to religion, but even shocking to human nature.

The report of the visitors being read in parliament, a bill for the demolition of all the lesser monasteries was brought in, and passed. We cannot know the general reason for this bill better than by its preamble, which sets forth, "That small religious houses under the number of twelve persons, had been long and notoriously guilty of vicious and abominable living, and did much consume and waste their churches, lands, and other things belonging to them; and that, for above two hundred years, there had been many visitations for reforming these abuses, but with no success, their vicious living increasing daily, so that, except small houses were dissolved, and the religious put into greater monasteries, there could no reformation be expected in that matter: whereupon the king, having received full information of these abuses, both by his visitors and other credible ways, and considering that there were divers great monasteries, in which religion was well kept and observed, which had not the full number in them that they might and ought to receive, had made a full declaration of the premises in parliament, whereupon it was enacted, that all houses which might spend yearly two hundred pounds, or within it, should be suppressed, and their revenues converted to better uses, and they compelled to reform themselves."

Another act passed, by which all these houses, churches, lands, and estates were given to the king, with those of all houses already dissolved: and by these acts no fewer than three hundred and seventy-six abbeyes fell to the crown. By another act, it was declared, that no tenths should be exacted that year; and by another, a court of augmentation was erected, whereby order was taken concerning the religious houses that were surrendered or suppressed, and how the king's revenue should be increased thereby; and officers for this purpose were appointed.

But whatever Henry's pretence might be for setting on foot this scrutiny, it is certain that his principal motives were to wreak his vengeance upon the monks, whom he regarded as his mortal enemies, and to increase his revenues with the plunder of their houses. Soon after the dissolution of the abbeyes the king put an end to this parliament (which had been the most compliant that England had ever seen), on the fourteenth of April, after sitting six years.

The king's severe proceedings against the religious houses regained him, in some measure, the confidence of the German Protestant princes; and they wrote to Henry in terms of great complaisance from Smalcald, where they were now assembled to settle the famous Smalcaldic league for the preservation of those of the reformed persuasion. This produced an obliging message from Henry, with some explanation with regard to their former proposals; but still the princes declined giving any umbrage to the emperor. This was not insisted on by Henry. Another answer was sent by the princes, in which they promise to send an embassy into England; and some of their most learned men, among whom was the famous Melancthon, were nominated for that purpose: and there is the greatest reason to believe, in the present situation of Henry's affairs, that this negotiation would have succeeded to the advantage of the great work of reformation, had not the popish faction here found means to deprive the Protestants of the interest of queen Anne, whose death happened shortly after the arrival of these divines, which very much altered the face of affairs as well as the king's mind, in respect to the reformation, which she openly countenanced, and which was in effect the cause of her deplorable fate.

Henry's affection, which had been increased by opposition during the prosecution of the divorce, was now cooled by satiety, and he no longer looked on his lovely consort with the same fond regard as heretofore. It is true, she wanted none of the agreeable qualities, and had many of the valuable kind: she was lively, pleasant, and gay in conversation; and, though strictly virtuous in her conduct, she indulged her humour rather too far; and, having been bred in the freedoms of the court of France, was not so attentive as she ought to have been in her exalted and ticklish situation, and either took or permitted liberties which gave offence to an impetuous husband, who had pride enough to make him the most jealous of mortals, and the most furious in his jealousy.

The Austrian party about court, all who disliked the divorce from Catherine, and all that opposed the reformation, which she was supposed to favour, were her enemies, and taking notice of every little indiscretion she was guilty of, improved it to raise in the king a suspicion of her virtue. The viscountess Rochford in particular, who was wife to the queen's brother, but who lived on bad terms with her husband, and, as she was a woman of the most abandoned character, paid no regard either to truth or humanity in the calumnies which she invented, pretended that her own husband carried on a criminal correspondence with his sister; and not only so, but she insisted that she had likewise granted favours to Henry Norris, groom of the stole, Weston and Brereton, gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber, together with one Mark Smeton, a musician. This information roused all the rage in Henry's breast, who was also not a little chagrined at an accident which befel the queen some time before, of being brought to bed of a dead child.

Nothing however transpired till the first of May this year, when a tilting match was held at Greenwich, wich, in which the lord Rochford was chief challenger and Henry Norris the chief defendant. It is said, that during the diversions Henry observed the queen drop her handkerchief, which one of the suspected persons took up, and used it to wipe his face: to a mind prepared like Henry's, this accident, which though, in all probability, entirely casual, was a demonstration of his wife's infidelity: accordingly all on a sudden the diversions were broke up, and Henry, without taking any notice of the queen or her court, with no more than six persons in his retinue, abruptly departed to his palace of Westminster.

The queen following, was, upon her arrival, met by the duke of Norfolk, and some other lords of the council, who signified to her, that it was his majesty's pleasure she should be confined to her chamber. At the same time the lord Rochford and Norris were committed to the Tower, as were Brereton, Weston, and Smeton. Next day, being the second of May, the queen was conducted to the same prison by the duke of Norfolk and other lords, who resigned her into the custody of sir William Kingston, constable of the Tower; and a commission was made out for trying her on the twelfth of May in that place, the duke of Norfolk being appointed lord high-steward on that occasion, with twenty-six other peers. The charges brought against her were of the most detestable nature, viz. "That she had procured her brother, and the four other persons in custody, to lie with her, and that she had made each of them believe that he had the preference above all mankind in her heart; and that she had said to each of them, that the king never had her heart." Smeton had, by fair promises, been brought to confess, that he had thrice carnal knowledge of her; but it was not thought proper to confront him with her; nor, indeed, could he be an evidence, as he had been condemned three days before to suffer, notwithstanding his assurances of pardon upon confession. The only thing that appeared in relation to her brother, the lord Rochford, was his laying his hand on the queen's bed while he whispered to her one day; an action done before company, and warranted from the near relationship between them. In short, to the eternal infamy of her judges, she was condemned without its being ever known upon what evidence her sentence was grounded; and the nineteenth of May was the day appointed for her execution, which was that of being burnt or beheaded, at the king's pleasure.

Henry, not satisfied with this act of severity, would needs be divorced from her before her death, and archbishop Cranmer was sent to the Tower, and received her confession of precontract, or promise of marriage, between the lord Henry Percy (now earl of Northumberland) and herself; before that she had made with the king; upon which the archbishop pronounced, according to the rules of canon law, the sentence of divorce. It was probably a tenderness for her daughter, the young Elizabeth, that engaged her to make this confession, for the earl of Northumberland protested in the most solemn manner that no such contract had ever passed between them. It was, however, expected that she would have defended her innocency when about to die, but the same motives seem to have operated even then, as she feared every thing for her daughter from the savage temper of the king, should she expose him too much; accordingly, when she came on the scaffold, she made no reflections on the hardships she had sustained, nor said any thing touching the grounds on which sentence had passed upon her; she only desired "that every body would judge the best," acknowledged her obligations to the king, prayed for him, and entreated the spectators to do the same for her, and then submitting her neck to the fatal stroke, her head was severed from her body at one blow, by an executioner, who had been sent for from Calais, on account of his remarkable dexterity in his bloody profession.

The lord Rochford was tried and condemned at the same time with the queen his sister, and, together with the four other gentlemen, suffered death three days before her, all of them, Smeton excepted, declaring at their deaths the queen's and their own innocence of the facts for which they suffered.

The very day after the queen's execution Henry was married to Jane Seymour, the reigning beauty of the court, daughter to sir John Seymour, and one of the maids of honour to Anne, on whom the king had for some time cast an amorous eye: eager as he was to gratify his brutal appetites, he totally forgot all regard to decency and decorum, and his cruel and barbarous heart, more worthy of an infernal fiend than a human creature, was not in the least affected by the bloody catastrophe of a person who had so long been the object of his most tender affection.

In consequence of the sentence of divorce which Henry had procured from his late queen Anne before her death, the princess Elizabeth, his daughter by her, who was at this time about three years of age, and been styled princess of Wales, was now divested of that title; and the princess Mary, his other daughter by Catherine, whom he had treated with great severity on account of her attachment to her mother, and her refusal to assent to the statutes which had been lately enacted against the papal authority, was now persuaded by the popish faction to attempt a reconciliation with the king at this juncture; accordingly she subscribed to the act of supremacy, the renunciation of the bishop of Rome, and to the unlawfulness of her own mother's marriage, that she might the more effectually remove the lady Elizabeth from the king's presence and affections; but Henry, though he was reconciled to Mary, yet continued to educate the infant princess at court, with all the care and tenderness of a father.

On the eighth day of June a new parliament met at Westminster, as did also the convocation, and both those houses confirmed the sentence passed upon the late queen Anne; but, what is very remarkable in favour of the queen's innocency, the commons attainted the deceased for pride and the carnal desires of her body, and for confederating in divers treasons against the king's royal person, &c. The convocation alleged nothing against her but the pretended precontract with the earl of Northumberland when lord Percy, though that nobleman had sworn in the most solemn manner, that no such engagement had ever existed.

The parliament also enacted a statute, by which they repealed the former act of succession, declaring the children of the king's two first marriages illegitimate, and adjudging the crown, after his death, to his issue by his present queen Jane, or any wife he might marry after her decease; but at the same time they gave him full power to settle the mode of such succession either by will or letters patent under the great-seal, and pronounced all those who maintained the validity of his two first marriages guilty of high-treason.

Then the king informed them of some advances made to him from pope Paul III. who on hearing of the execution of queen Anne, and death of queen Catherine, hoped he might bring Henry to a good agreement with him; but Henry declaring in parliament that his separation from the bishop of Rome was so fixed, and had proceeded upon such solid grounds, that he never would listen to any accommodation, the two houses, servilely obsequious to the king's will, in order to convince his holiness that all hopes of re-uniting the English church to his jurisdiction were vain and groundless, passed an act, subjecting to the penalty of Præmunire all those who should endeavour to restore the papal power in England; and all magistrates who should neglect to put this law in execution were condemned to the same punishment: and by another act they annulled and abolished all dispensations, exemptions, and privileges procured from the court of Rome, saving however to the archbishop of Canterbury the right of confirming what should be deemed advantageous to the church and people.

By a third act it was prohibited any one to marry with the next degrees of royal blood, without permission from the king. This act passed upon the following occasion: the lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to Henry's sister, the queen dowager of Scotland, by the earl of Angus, her second husband, was now at the English court, where she was courted by the lord Thomas Howard, brother to the duke of Norfolk. This courtship, which had proceeded to the length of mutual promises, coming to Henry's ears, the lovers were committed to the Tower of London; and lord Thomas, upon circumstances brought against him of aspiring to the crown, was attainted of high-treason in parliament. The queen of Scotland hearing of her daughter's imprisonment, wrote strongly in her favour to Henry, but without effect; nor was she released till after the death of lord Thomas, which happened in the Tower. A fourth law was enacted, that all encroachments of parliament upon the king's prerogative, before he should have attained the age of twenty-four, might be annulled under the great-seal of England. These were the most material acts for our purpose in this session of parliament, which was finished on the eighteenth day of July, and which one would be tempted to think had assembled for no other purpose than that of bestowing upon Henry a more extensive authority than any of his predecessors had ever enjoyed.

Neither was the convocation less compliant with the crown than the parliament had been; for, besides ratifying the sentence of divorce between the king and Anne Boleyn, they also gave their sanction to a system of religion which Henry, who differed from all his subjects in point of belief, had been at the pains to digest; the contents of which will fall more properly into another part of our history. Before the convocation broke up, the king acquainted them that he was summoned to a council, which was, by agreement between the pope and the emperor, to be held at Mantua. As a general council carried with it a popular and plausible sound, it was necessary to guard against its consequences with respect to the steps which had been taken by Henry, who had reason to believe its members would be no way favourable to him: he was under some difficulty by the appeal he had made from the pope to a general council; but Cranmer, and some other prelates, made him easy on that head, and a decree passed in convocation, defining what a general council was, and shewing that no such could be called by the authority of the pope, or in the present juncture of affairs; and that no justice was to be expected where the bishop of Rome was to preside. Strengthened by this opinion, Henry published a flaming protestation against the approaching council.

About this time Reginald Pole began to distinguish himself by his taste and learning: he was son to Margaret, countess of Salisbury, the daughter and heiress of George, duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV. and consequently allied to the king, who determined to advance him to the highest dignities of the church, conferred upon him the deanry of Exeter, and sent him to finish his studies at the university of Paris. He refused to concur with Henry's agents in procuring the decision of the French universities, in favour of the divorce, which he disapproved. He afterwards returned to England, and agreed with the clergy in owning Henry supreme head of the church. Then he travelled into Italy, where he acquired a great character for his wit and eloquence; and Henry being informed that he openly condemned him for his separation from the Apostolic see, and that he had published a book intitled De unione ecclesiastica (or, Concerning Ecclesiastical Union), in which he treated the king with great severity, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar, and even exhorting the emperor and other European princes to attack him, with all their forces, he resolved, if possible, to get him in his power, and, dissembling his resentment, sent to desire him to come over to explain some passages in his book, which were somewhat dark and obscure; but finding him upon his guard, he now stripped him of his dignities, and wreaked his revenge on Pole's family and relations. The pope, however, took care to reward his attachment to the see of Rome, by presenting him with a cardinal's hat, which bound him closer than ever to the interest of his holiness.

The suppression of the small monasteries, though enacted in the first session of parliament, did not take place till the month of August this year, when it occasioned great clamours through the whole nation, as the visitors executed their commission with inhuman severity, and were guilty of the grossest embezzlements: and the pope having again excommunicated Henry, and declared him deposed, put the kingdom under an interdict, and forbidden his subjects to obey him, the monks everywhere insinuated into the minds of the country people, that it was their duty to take up arms against one who had trampled under foot all their civil and religious liberties. The people, who had sucked in with their milk the principles that were now at once to be abolished, eagerly listened to these insinuations; and the popish emissaries had been so successful, that in Lincolnshire, about the end of September, upwards of twenty thousand souls assembled under the command of one Mackerel, prior prior of Barlings, who took the name of Captain Cocker, and published their grievances by way of petition to the king, complaining of the suppression of the monasteries, the subversion of their ancient faith, the embracing new doctrines, &c. The king answered this petition in an ample manifesto, and sent the duke of Suffolk, with a few troops, to reduce the mutineers to obedience, who upon promise of pardon dispersed of themselves; but their leader being taken, with some of the principal ringleaders, they were executed for treason and rebellion.

This success was of the greatest consequence to the king's affairs, for at this time one Aske, a gentleman of fortune in Yorkshire, extremely well fitted to act at the head of a popular insurrection, had drawn the people of that county together, and they were joined by a little army of outed monks, who carried before them a banner, on which a crucifix and the five wounds, with a chalice, were painted. The same device was worn upon their sleeves, to animate them in favour of their endangered religion: they gave their march the title of the Pilgrimage of Grace, and all who joined them were obliged to take an oath, "that they entered into the Pilgrimage of Grace for the love of God, the preservation of the king's person and issue, the purifying the nobility and driving away all base-born counsellors, and for no particular profit of their own, nor to do displeasure to any, nor to kill any person for envy, but to take before them the cross of Christ, his faith, the restitution of the church, and the suppression of heretics and their opinions." These specious pretences so deluded the people, that the rebels were soon forty thousand strong; and meeting with no resistance, they sat suddenly down before Pontefract castle, which was looked upon as a place of strength, and which was then held by the archbishop of York and Thomas lord Darcy, who quickly surrendered to them: they next made themselves masters of York and Hull; and Aske, by persuasions and threats, obliged all the nobility of the county to join him, except Henry Clifford, earl of Cumberland, who held out his castle of Skipton against all the rebel forces, and sir Ralph Ewer, who defended his castle of Scarborough till he was relieved, though himself and men had nothing to subsist on for three weeks but bread and water.

The government not being able to muster above five thousand men, and finding that the rebels were not to be amused, a proclamation was published, ordering all the nobility to meet the king at Northampton on the seventh of November; in the mean time his little army, under the command of the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Shrewsbury, and the marquis of Exeter, encamped at Doncaster, must have been entirely routed by the rebels, who advanced to give them battle, had not the river Don, the only pass by which they could advance to the town, happily been rendered impassable by a heavy rain. This lucky accident gave the duke of Norfolk an opportunity to propose a conference with the chiefs of the mutineers, when the latter gave in the following demands:

"That a general pardon be granted; a parliament to be held at York, and courts of justice to be held there; that none on the north side of Trent might be brought to London upon any law-suit; they desired a repeal of some acts of parliament, those for the last subsidy, for uses, for making words misprision of treason, and for the clergy's paying first-fruits and tenths to the king: they desired the princess Mary might be restored to her right of succession, the pope to his wonted jurisdiction, and the monks to their houses again; that the Lutherans might be punished; that Audley, the lord-chancellor, and Cromwell, the lord privy-seal, might be excluded from the next parliament; and Leigh and Leighton, who had visited the monasteries, might be imprisoned for bribery and extortion."

Though the king was highly exasperated against the insurgents, yet the accounts he daily received of their strength obliged him, much against his will, to send down a general pardon, directed to the duke of Norfolk, but with orders not to publish it but in the last extremity. That very soon happened, for the rebels once more preparing to force the passage of the river, the duke was obliged to publish the pardon. This restored a short tranquility; but the priests renewing their practices for disturbing the public peace, and with too much success, the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Shrewsbury had orders to continue in the North all the winter. The duke using his power with great rigour, by putting the martial law in full force against every one who would not take the oath of supremacy, those proceedings gave rise to a fresh rebellion. Two gentlemen, called Musgrave and Treby, putting themselves at the head of eight thousand peasants, made an attempt upon Carlisle, from which however they were repulsed, and afterwards entirely defeated by the duke of Norfolk. Musgrave escaped, but Treby, with seventy of his followers, were taken and hanged upon the walls of Carlisle.

This happened in February, 1537, and the king now ordered to court such of the heads of the former insurrection whom he thought he had most reason to fear: Aske readily obeyed, and at first was well received at court; but the lords Darcy, Hussy, and other chiefs of the rebels, not following his example, were seized and sent prisoners to London. The two noblemen were arraigned at Westminster, found guilty, and beheaded on Tower-hill; those of inferior degree were hanged at Tyburn and other places; Aske himself, leaving the court shortly after without licence, was taken and hanged in chains at York, notwithstanding the general pardon which had been granted.

Fortunately for Henry, James V. was in France during these rebellions, so that the insurgents had no assistance from Scotland. James returned home with his young queen, Magdalen, daughter of Francis, whom he had lately espoused, about the beginning of the year; and she dying soon after her arrival in Scotland, cardinal Beaton and Robert Maxwell were sent over to France, to treat of another marriage between James and Mary of Guise, the duke of Longueville's widow, which soon after took place.

Henry was now so flushed with slaughter by the frequent executions carried on by his order and under his eye, that he seemed to take a delight in shedding blood: he ordered Thomas Fitz Gerald, son of the late earl of Kildare, twice lord-deputy of Ireland, and five of his uncles, after a long confinement in the Tower for an insurrection in Ireland, to be executed on the thirtieth of March,

for

for a terror to that people, who he feared would rise and join the emperor against his crown and authority in Ireland: but the earl of Kildare's youngest son, Gerald Fitz Gerald, had the good fortune to make his escape by a stratagem, and got over to France, and from thence to the Low Countries; but finding it unsafe to continue there, he went and offered his service to cardinal Pole, who afterwards made use of him in his designs against his king and country.

The king's next care was so to ruin the affairs of the monks, who had been the principal promoters of the late disturbances, that they might never more be able to give him trouble; and having employed secretary Cromwell to procure addresses from the two universities, setting forth, that the numbers of religious houses still remaining were unprofitable, nay pernicious, to the Christian religion, as tending only to harbour lazy drones and swarms of impostors, he gave orders for a total suppression of many of those houses, and to seize their revenues. The rich abbey of Furness, in Lincolnshire, surrendered on the ninth of April; the abbey of Bermondsey, in Surry, on the first of June: and that of Bisham, in Berkshire, on the fifth of July.

On the twelfth of October, this year, the queen was delivered of a young prince, at Hampton-court, to the inexpressible joy of all the nation, and of Henry in particular. The having a son and undoubted heir to all his dominions, was a blessing which had been the subject of his most ardent wishes; but his satisfaction on this occasion received a considerable check by the death of the queen soon after her delivery: she was the best beloved of all his wives, and highly celebrated for her humility, goodness, and affability. She was buried with great pomp at Windsor. Henry was so afflicted with the loss of her, that, for some days after her death, he shut himself up from all company.

The new-born prince was baptized by the name of Edward; and, three days after, he was declared prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester. To distinguish this happy event the more, sir Edward Seymour, brother to the queen, was created earl of Hertford and lord Beauchamp; sir William Fitz Williams, lord high admiral of England, was created earl of Southampton: some months after, sir William Paulet, treasurer of the household, was made lord St. John; and sir John Ruffel, comptroller, was created lord Ruffel.

But the birth of a son and heir did not free Henry from the terrors of an invasion which he saw threatening him from the emperor, who had concluded a truce with the king of France, that he might be more at liberty, with all the forces of Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries, to attack England. The king therefore came to a final resolution of suppressing all the religious houses in his dominions, considering them as seminaries for promoting disaffection to his government, and the monks as subjects to the pope rather than to himself, devoted wholly to the interest of the see of Rome, and using all their endeavours to alienate the minds of the people from their lawful sovereign, and seduce them to an implicit obedience to the papal authority, by continual pretences to false miracles, or other monastic jugglings; and at the same time were themselves ready, on every occasion, to promote and further the schemes of the pope and the emperor against his crown and dignity.

Fearful however, that this measure might occasion some clamours in the nation, he prudently began with removing the prejudices of the people, by exposing the enormities committed in those receptacles of vice and debauchery, and to disabuse them with regard to the supposed sanctity of relics, images, and all other trumpery of superstition: he ordered the commissioners to examine, and, if possible, discover the arts by which the monks imposed upon the ignorance of the vulgar. This second visitation produced a detection of an infinite number of holy cheats, and pretended relics, made use of to encourage superstition rather than devotion in the people, and to draw them into pilgrimages and offerings. The principal of these we have, to satisfy the curiosity of the reader, thrown into a note at the foot of the page*. The discoveries made on this occasion raised a general indignation in all ranks, to find how they had been abused: they detested the authors of such forgeries; the monasteries grew infamous, and thus was the English superstition, in point of images and relics, extinguished.

The multitude of those impositions gave Henry, who wanted to have the great houses dissolved,

* With regard to the implements of idolatry and superstition, Reading seems to have been the grand repository of the nation. There the visitors found an angel with one wing, that brought over the head of the spear that pierced the side of Jesus Christ, with such a catalogue of other relics as filled up four sheets of paper.

At St. Edmundsbury, they discovered some of the coals that roasted St. Laurence; the parings of St. Edmund's toes; the girdle of the Virgin Mary, and some of her milk; the head of St. Ursula; the penknife and boots of St. Thomas a Becket; part of the same saint's shirt, much revered by big-bellied women; and certain relics to prevent a head-ach, and the generation of weeds among corn.

There were likewise discovered in the monasteries, some impostures of a more artificial nature. At Hales, in the county of Gloucester, had been shewn, for several ages, the blood of Christ, pretended to be brought from Jerusalem; and it is natural to think, that this relic would be held in the highest estimation.

This relic was supposed to be attended with a very surprising circumstance: the sacred blood was not visible to any one in mortal sin, even when set before him; and, till he had performed good works sufficient for his absolution, it would not deign to discover itself to his longing eyes.

At the dissolution of the monastery, the whole contrivance was discovered. Two of the monks, who were entrusted with the secret, had taken the blood of a duck, which they renewed every week; they put it into a phial, one side of which was thin and transparent, and the other thick and obscure. When any rich pilgrim arrived, they were sure to shew him the dark side of the phial, till masses and offerings had expiated his crimes; and then, finding his money, or patience, or faith, exhausted, they blessed him with the happy sight, by turning the bright side of the phial.

There was a crucifix at Boxley in Kent, distinguished by the name of the Rood of Grace, which had been long held in the highest veneration, because it had been seen to bend and raise itself, shake the head, hands, and feet, roll the eyes, and move the lips. The puppet, being brought to London, was broke in pieces, in sight of the people, at St. Paul's cross, where with their own eyes, they beheld the springs and wheels by which it had been actuated.

A great wooden idol of Wales, called Daryel Gatheren, was brought up to London, and cut in pieces: and, by a cruel refinement of vengeance, it was employed as fuel to burn friar Forrest, who was condemned for denying the supremacy, and some heretical opinions.

A finger of St. Andrew, covered with a thin plate of silver, had been pawned by the convent of Westacre, for a debt of forty pounds; but as the king's commissioners refused to redeem the pledge, the people made merry with the poor creditor, on account of his security.

vast advantages, as it is natural to think that the religious of monasteries where they were carried on, would submit to any thing rather than be exposed, and might easily be brought to surrender their houses, to avoid the punishment they deserved. Such impurities and disorders were found in many as would surpass credibility, if not unexceptionably attested; and some were so notoriously guilty, that they signed concessions of the dissoluteness of their lives and conversation. A great number of monks, and even some abbots and friars, were found guilty of holding correspondence with the rebels, and executed as traitors; and the rest, as they had now no privileges to screen them from the civil judicature, were glad to compound for their offences by a surrender of their monasteries. On one or other of these accounts, no less than one hundred and fifty-nine monasteries were resigned in the course of the year 1538 into the king's hands; and the example continually gained ground, so that hardly a week passed without some new surrender.

Whilst Henry was thus employed in rooting out superstition and burning images the most in repute for peculiar virtues and wonder working properties, he could not well overlook the most famous and respected of all the instruments of popish idolatry, the shrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Becket was indebted for his saintship to the vigorous efforts he had exerted in defence of the authority of the holy see, and therefore it may be readily conceived how obnoxious to Henry a saint of this character must appear, and how contrary to all his schemes of abolishing the power of the pontiff of Rome: he could not bear the thoughts that such a furious and obstinate rebel to his prince should be held in such veneration, and his tomb frequented by such numerous pilgrimages, and enriched with such superb presents. Processions were in those days carried on against the dead in the same manner as against the living: the like form was used towards Becket; his life and actions underwent a strict examination, and were generally condemned; the miracles pretended to be wrought at his tomb were proved to be forgeries; his name was ordered to be erased from the calendar, the office for his festival expunged from the breviary, his bones to be burnt, and his ashes dispersed. At the same time the riches of his shrine, which were inestimable, were converted to the king's use: among other things there was a very fine diamond, which Lewis VII. of France, who made a pilgrimage to this saint's remains, had deposited at his tomb, was by Henry's orders set in a ring, which he ever after wore on his thumb. Thus did Henry at once indulge his two darling passions, avarice and revenge, by enriching himself with the spoils, and uncanonizing a prelate whom the papal power had, for his insolence to his king, raised to be a saint.

The news of these proceedings no sooner reached Rome, than that city was filled with libels and satires against the person and conduct of Henry: he was represented as the most impious and sacrilegious tyrant that ever disgraced the royal title or dignity: he was compared to Belshazzar, Nero, Domitian, Dioclesian, and in particular to Julian the Apostate, whom he was said to resemble in his learning and apostacy, though greatly inferior in point of morals.

In these invectives, which were handed about all over Europe, cardinal Pole's style was easily distinguished. Henry, whose vanity and bloody disposition increased every day, resolved to avenge himself for these gross insults on all the friends of Pole in England, and the more especially as the emissaries he kept at the court of Rome informed him, that all the intelligence from England was addressed to the cardinal. He ordered Courtney, marquis of Exeter (who was son to Catherine, daughter to Edward IV.), Pole, lord Montague, sir Edward Neville, brother to lord Abergavenny, and sir Geoffrey Pole, to be arrested for corresponding with that prelate, who, being found guilty, were all beheaded except sir Geoffrey Pole, who, having turned evidence against the rest, had his pardon. These were shocking severities; but, indeed, if it was duly proved that the sufferers held a correspondence with Pole, Henry is not so blameable, since it is certain that at this time Pole was the pope's agent to stir up not only England, but all Europe, against Henry.

Pope Paul III. had hitherto suspended the bull of excommunication, which he had formerly passed against Henry, in hopes of being one day able to accommodate his difference with that monarch; but finding that the late proceedings in England had shut the door against all reconciliation, he, on the seventeenth of December this year, published the bull with great solemnity, and endeavoured to excite the neighbouring princes against the English monarch, and even offered his kingdom to James of Scotland, provided he was able and willing to subdue it: and his agents found means to affix this bull in several places, both in France, Scotland, and Ireland. Henry, unterrified by this mock thunder, resolved to set his holiness at defiance: with this view he exacted of all bishops and abbots a new oath, by which they renounced the pope's authority: and a new translation of the Bible, which had been undertaken at the instance of Cranmer and Cromwell (who thought nothing could so effectually root out papal superstition as a free toleration of the scriptures in the vulgar tongue), being completed, he ordered copies thereof to be immediately printed, and set up in every church, at the joint expence of the incumbent and parishioners; and at the same time Cromwell obtained the royal warrant, enjoining the clergy to read the Lord's Prayer, the Confession of Faith, and the Ten Commandments in English: they were ordered to recommend good works, and to teach the people that relics, rosaries, and all other trumpery of the like nature, were unnecessary to salvation. All the images, to which devotees were accustomed to make offerings, were removed; all the tapers were taken away out of the churches, except those that burned before the images of Christ; and all the invocations of "Ora pro nobis" (Pray for us), added to the prayers addressed to saints, were entirely abolished.

Much about the same time, viz. the beginning of the year 1539, the king having understood that there was a learned man, named Lambert, who denied the real presence in the sacrament, to which Henry was blindly devoted, notwithstanding that it is, of all the absurdities of the Romish church, the most absurd and ridiculous; this vain monarch thought he had found a fine opportunity portunity where he could at once exercise his supremacy and display his learning, resolved to have the glory of disputing with this reformer, who had appealed from a sentence given against him by archbishop Cranmer. Public notice was accordingly given, that the king designed to enter the lists against this school-master, for he was of no higher degree, and scaffolds were erected in Westminster-hall for the accommodation of the audience, without any regard had to the injustice of thus mixing the disputant and the judge. The end of this disputation was, that Henry gave his antagonist his choice, either to recant his opinion, or to be burned: Lambert nobly made choice of the latter, and the king had the mean cruelty to order him to be executed, which was inflicted upon him with the greatest rigour.

But a parliamentary sanction was now required, as well to confirm what had been done, as to establish future measures: accordingly, on the twenty-eighth of April, the parliament sat, whom Henry found still complying in every thing; and, among many remarkable statutes, it was enacted,

“That the king, for the time being, with the advice of his council, or the more part of them, may set forth proclamations, under such penalties and pains as to him and them shall seem necessary, which shall be observed as though they were made by act of parliament: but this shall not be prejudicial to any person's inheritance, offices, liberties, goods, chattels, or life. And whosoever shall willingly offend any article contained in the said proclamation, shall pay such forfeiture, or be so long imprisoned, as shall be expressed in the said proclamation. And if any offending will depart the realm, to the intent he will not answer his said offence, he shall be adjudged a traitor.”

By another act, the king was empowered to nominate such a number of bishops, fees for bishops, cathedral churches, and endow them with such possessions as he will. By another act the order of the house of lords was regulated: Cromwell, as king's vicegerent in ecclesiastical matters, was to have the precedency of both archbishops. It was likewise enacted, “That all leases made of manors belonging to monasteries dissolved, or to be dissolved, and assured to the king, should take effect; wherein is expressed, that the king should possess and enjoy to him, his heirs, and successors, for ever, all monasteries, abbeys, priories, nunneries, colleges, hospitals, houses of friars, or other religious and ecclesiastical houses and places, which, since the fourth of February, 27 Henry VIII. have been dissolved, suppressed, renounced, relinquished, forfeited, given up, or by any other means come to his highness; or which shall be dissolved, &c. as also all manors, lordships, lands, tenements, rights, liberties, &c. belonging to them; all which (except such as came by attainder or treason) should be under survey and governance of the king's court of augmentation of the revenues of the crown; other mens titles yet saved.”

In this parliament a committee of religion was appointed, upon the lord-chancellor's motion, shewing it to be the king's desire to have all his subjects of one religion. The members of the committee were the lord vice gerent, Cromwell, the two archbishops, the bishops of Durham, Bath and Wells, Ely, Bangor, Carlisle, and Worcester. The archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of Ely and Worcester, and Cromwell, were on one side; and the debates were so violent, that on the sixteenth of May, the duke of Norfolk told the lords, that the committee had made no progress, and that therefore he would take the liberty to offer to the house certain articles to be debated on, and, if approved, to pass into the form of a perpetual law. These articles were as follow.

“First, If any person, by word, writing, printing, cyphering, or any otherwise, do preach, teach, dispute, or hold opinion, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under form of bread and wine (after the consecration thereof), there is not present really the natural body and blood of our saviour Jesus Christ, conceived of the Virgin Mary; or that, after the said consecration, there remaineth any substance of bread and wine, or any other substance but the substance of Christ, God and man, or that in the flesh under form of bread, is not the very blood of Christ; or that the blood, under form of wine, is not the very flesh of Christ as well apart as though they were both together, or affirm the said sacrament to be of other substance than is aforesaid, or deprave the said blessed sacrament, then he shall be adjudged an heretic, and suffer death by burning, and shall forfeit to the kings all lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods, and chattels, as in case of high-treason.

“Secondly, And if any person preach, in any sermon or collection openly made, or teach in any common school or congregation, or obstinately affirm or defend, that the communion of the blessed sacrament in both kinds is necessary for the health of man's soul, or ought, or should be administered in both kinds, or that it is necessary to be received by any person other than the priest, being at mass and consecrating the same:

“Fourthly, Or that any man or woman which advisedly hath vowed, or professed, or should avow or profess chastity or widowhood, may marry, or contract marriage:

“Fifthly, Or that private masses be not lawful, or not laudable, or should not be used, or be not agreeable to the laws of God:

“Sixthly, Or that auricular confession is not expedient and necessary to be used in the church of God; he shall be adjudged to suffer death, and forfeit lands and goods as a felon.”

These articles, before they passed into the form of a law, admitted of great debates. The third and fourth pointed directly at Cranmer, who spoke greatly against all but the first, he being himself a Lutheran. As to the other articles, they were matter of private speculation, but against Cranmer's sense. They were, however, carried into a most bloody and detestable law, and Henry himself took great pains in drawing up and correcting them into the form we see them here. At the same time the chancellor moved for a bill to be brought in, for punishing such as disputed against those articles: the archbishop of York, the bishops of Durham and Winchester, with Dr. Tregonwell, a master in chancery, had the drawing up of this bill, which was more to Henry's liking than one which had been presented by the other party. On the seventh of June it was brought into the house, and had a first reading; on the ninth it was read a second time;

time; on the tenth it was engrossed, and read a third time. Bishop Burnet, who was a great favourer of Cranmer, says, that when it passed the house of peers, Henry himself desired Cranmer to leave the house, as he could not in conscience vote for the bill, but that Cranmer replied "He could as little in conscience vote against it," and therefore staid for that purpose.

The title of this act was, "An act for abolishing diversity of opinions in certain articles concerning the Christian religion." It appears from the preamble to the act, in which the articles are rehearsed, that Henry himself was present at every day's debate, and made a great parade of his learning in the house of peers, so that the parliament gave him public thanks. After rehearsing the articles, which we have already seen, it is enacted, "that if any, after the twelfth of July, did speak, preach, or write, against the first article, they were to be judged heretics, and to be burned, without any abjuration, and to forfeit their real and personal estates to the king: and those who preached, or obstinately disputed against the other articles, were to be judged felons, and to suffer death as felons without benefit of the clergy: and those who, either in word or writing, spoke against them, were to be prisoners during the king's pleasure, and forfeit their goods and chattels to the king for the first time; and if they offend so the second time, they were to suffer as felons. All the marriages of priests are declared void; and if any priest did still keep any such woman, whom he had so married, and lived familiarly with her as his wife, he was to be judged a felon: and if a priest lived carnally with any other woman, he was, upon the first conviction, to forfeit his benefices, goods, and chattels, and to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure; and upon the second conviction, to suffer as a felon. The women so offending were also to be punished in the same manner as the priests. And those who contemned, or abstained from confession, or the sacrament, at the accustomed times, for the first offence were to forfeit their goods and chattels, and be imprisoned; and for the second, were to be adjudged of felony. And for the execution of this act, commissions were to be issued out to all archbishops and bishops, and the chancellors and commissaries, and such others in the several shires, as the king should name, to hold their sessions quarterly, or oftener; and they were to proceed upon presentments and by a jury. Those commissioners were to swear, that they should execute their commission indifferently, without favour, affection, corruption, or malice: all ecclesiastical incumbents were to read this act in their churches once a quarter. And in the end a proviso was added, concerning the vows of chastity, that they should not oblige any, except such as had taken them at or above the age of twenty-one years, or had not been compelled to take them."

Such were the detestable articles which opened in England the flood-gates of civil murder: and now the reader is to expect, during the remainder of this reign, to meet with barbarities committed under the forms of justice, as detestable as any to be met with in profane history, and under the most bloody tyrants. Cranmer alone had the good fortune to weather the storm of Henry's indignation, for his opposition to the articles; but he thought proper to send his wife, whom he had married in Germany, back for some time to her own country. The countess of Salisbury, cardinal Pole (her son), the marchioness of Exeter, sir Adrian Fortescue, and sir Thomas Dingley, were attainted of treason, as accomplices with the late marquis of Exeter: the countess of Salisbury, though seventy years of age, behaved with great spirit; but upon her trial a correspondence between her and her son was proved, some of the pope's bulls were found in her house, and she was convicted of not suffering any servant about her to comply with the alteration introduced by the king into religion. Fortescue and Dingley were executed, as the countess was two years after; but the marchioness died a natural death, and the cardinal kept out of Henry's reach. It appears that Cromwell drove on those prosecutions very furiously, and asked the judges for their opinions, whether a man might be attainted in parliament without being brought to make an answer? The judges answered, "That the parliament being the supreme judicature, whatever it did was law, and could not be questioned:" by this answer abolishing that sacred distinction between an absolute and arbitrary power.

All the religious houses throughout England, to the number of six hundred and forty-five, were by this time suppressed, either by surrender, purchase, or forfeiture, ninety colleges had been demolished, two thousand three hundred and seventy four chantries, and one hundred and ten hospitals*; but all this had been done without the authority of parliament, it was therefore necessary to have its concurrence and sanction, which was easily obtained; and Henry having formed a scheme for erecting several new bishoprics, and for endowing them with the lands of dissolved monasteries, an act passed for enabling him to execute this design. He proposed to found sixteen, but having disposed too lavishly of the lands destined at first for their endowment, he erected only six bishoprics, viz. of Westminster, Chester, Oxford, Bristol, Gloucester, and Peterborough. There were libraries well furnished with books in several of the abbeys, and, out of the great regard he had for learning, he employed the famous antiquary John Leland to collect all the most valuable manuscripts and choicest monuments of antiquity that were left in those houses. He also proposed several other noble foundations, particularly of a college for the study of the civil law, the purity of the Latin and French languages, and the knowledge of foreign affairs, to serve as a seminary for ministers of state and ambassadors to foreign courts. There could not be a more favourable opportunity for effecting these useful schemes than what now offered, but Henry's own prodigality, and the rapaciousness of his courtiers, prevented this and others of his best designs.

The parliament having thus servilely complied with all that Henry could ask, and having sat to the twenty eighth of June, was then prorogued to the third of November, afterwards to the fourteenth of January, and again to the twelfth of April, in the ensuing year, when it sat again to do business; but in the interim there fell out several events which deserve to be related.

* The yearly value of all the suppressed houses amounted to one hundred and sixty-one thousand one hundred pounds, besides the money which arose from the materials of the houses, from plate, jewels, and church-ornaments.

As soon as the parliament broke up, the six bloody articles were vigorously executed; commissioners were appointed in every county to detect any who should be hardy enough to disobey them. Shaxton, bishop of Salisbury, and Latimer, bishop of Worcester, resigned their sees rather than subscribe to them; but this expedient did not deliver them from the persecution now raised against all recusants: they were accused of having spoken against the articles, and therefore were immediately committed to the Tower, after they had resigned their instruments into the king's hands: the strong personal friendship which Henry had for Cranmer, preserved that prelate from the same treatment, though he had not only openly opposed them in the house, but even spoke and wrote against them.

The king's will was now become the sole measure of the law, because both the protestant and popish party cultivated his favour with the most abject complaisance: Bonner, lately made bishop of London, though in secret a zealous partizan of the pope's power, managed his interest with such dexterity, that he obtained letters patent adjudging to him the spiritualities as well as the temporalities of his bishopric during the king's pleasure: and Gardiner, a most bigotted son of the Romish church, maintained his influence by the most extravagant submission and profound dissimulation.

On the other hand, Cranmer and Cromwell, alarmed at the bloody statutes and several other proceedings of Henry, which seemed to denote his attachment to the catholic faith, and finding their credit begin to decline, thought there was no method so effectual to recover their influence as that of persuading the king to espouse another wife, upon whose protection they could depend. With this view they cast their eyes upon Anne, daughter to the duke of Cleves, and younger sister to the duchess of Saxony. Henry was so well pleased with this proposal, when made to him, that he employed Cromwell to negotiate the marriage: the famous Hans Holbein was ordered to draw the lady's picture, and did it so flatteringly, that Henry grew fond of her at distance; in short, the negotiation went so briskly on that the match was concluded in a few weeks; and the old duke of Cleves dying in the mean while, a counter-marriage was proposed between the princess Mary of England and the young duke of Cleves; but though this marriage did not take effect, the earl of Southampton (Fitz Williams) was ordered, in November, to go with a fleet of fifty ships to bring over the new queen, who about the end of December this year arrived in England.

While this matter was transacting, and some time before, Henry foreseeing a rupture between the emperor and the Protestants of Germany, sent new ambassadors to the league of Smalcald to encourage them in their opposition to the house of Austria, and to promise he would engage in their association; but they perceiving his only drift was to amuse them and intimidate the emperor by means of a negotiation with his enemies, they frankly gave the English monarch to understand that they would not unite with him on any other terms than that of his accepting the Augsburg Confession of Faith. They said, they had heard, with great mortification, of his persecuting their brethren in his kingdom, and in particular complained of the law of the six articles, the injustice of which Melancthon explained to him in a submissive letter. Henry was shocked at the freedom of their expostulation; and Gardiner, who dreaded, as a fatal blow to the catholic religion, an alliance between Henry and the protestant princes, by flattering his master's vanity effectually kept alive his resentment.

Towards the end of this year the inhabitants of Ghent mutinied, and offered to acknowledge the French king for their sovereign, if he would protect them from the resentment of the emperor. But Francis rejected their proposal, which he communicated to Charles, who had by this time amused him so effectually with the promise of restoring to him the duchy of Milan, that he ventured to pass through his dominions on the faith of a simple safe-conduct, and even visited him at Paris, where he was received with the same honours which the French paid to their own sovereign.

It was at this very period that Anne of Cleves arrived in England; and the union of this princess with Henry would, in all probability, have totally frustrated all the attempts of Gardiner and the rest of the popish party for the future, had she answered the beauty and great character given of her by her friends; but when Henry, all impatience to see his consort, of whom he had entertained so high an idea, beheld her on her arrival at Rochester, whither he went for that purpose, he was so disappointed, that he is said to have sworn in a rage, "that they had brought over a Flanders mare to him." However gross and indelicate his expressions might be, his behaviour was more decent, for next day he made her a private visit. This lady is allowed on all hands to have possessed a great sweetness of temper, but as her person was far from being delicate, as she had a masculine turn and floridness of features, could speak nothing but German, which Henry did not understand, and was extremely defective in all the winning graces of behaviour and conversation, he conceived an incurable aversion for her, and even then would abruptly have broken off the match, had not his affairs at home required the friendship and alliance of the German princes, her relations; these considerations, which were urged very home by Cranmer and Cromwell, made him at length consent to proceed in the marriage, but with so visible a reluctance, as made Cromwell and all his party tremble.

On the sixth of January, 1540, the marriage was celebrated, but it served only to encrease Henry's dislike into downright loathing: he told Cromwell next morning, that he suspected the queen was no maid, and that he could never conquer his aversion to so disagreeable a partner as she was; and there the matter rested for some time.

Henry still continuing to be alarmed at the close connection that appeared to subsist between the king of France and the emperor, immediately upon Charles's departure from the French court, sent over the duke of Norfolk with very great proposals to Francis, if he would break with the emperor: he offered him his assistance for recovering Milan, to discharge all the arrears of his pension, and to enter into a strict league with him, both against the pope and the house of Austria: but Francis, who still flattered himself that Charles would perform his promises to him, rejected all the duke's proposals. The French monarch, however, was the

the dupe of the dependence he placed on the emperor, for that prince no sooner got into his own dominions than he made several shuffling excuses in relation to bestowing on Francis the investiture of Milan; and at last, having suppressed the insurrection of Ghent, flatly denied his having made any such promise.

The parliament meeting on the twelfth of April, Cromwell opened the sessions with a speech, in which he informed the two houses, that the king, in order to terminate all disputes about religion, had appointed commissioners to examine the contested articles, that a standard of faith might be established upon the word of God alone; and that after the truth should be thus made known to his people, he was resolved to punish with the utmost severity all those who should presume to prefer their own opinions to the established articles of belief. Those commissioners, being approved by the parliament, received orders to begin their enquiry without delay: and in the mean time the king created Cromwell earl of Essex, upon the death of Bouchier by a fall from his horse, and all the estate of that ancient and noble family went along with the title*.

But he did not long enjoy these smiles of fortune and of his prince's favour; for on the parliament's breaking up, which was prorogued to the twenty-fifth of May, the duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, and the rest of the popish party, resolved to work his ruin, hoping that his fall would facilitate a reconciliation with the pope, which Cromwell always opposed. They did not, however, chuse to make this attack abruptly, but contrived to throw Catherine Howard (daughter to the lord Edmund Howard, the duke's brother), a beautiful young lady, in the king's way, who was still fretting at his disappointment with Anne of Cleves, knowing very well, that if the young lady could gain his affections, there would be no hazard in the attempt upon the obnoxious minister. Gardiner, at once the priest and the pander, took upon him the management of this affair. Catherine was brought to court; the king liked her, and the bishop made frequent entertainments at his own house for the royal lover and his mistress; and Henry was so pleased with her company, that she won his consent to marry her.

This new affection in Henry consequently raised the duke of Norfolk's and Gardiner's credit high in the cabinet; and the king, thinking himself in no necessity to continue his negotiations with the German protestant powers, in which Cromwell served him chiefly, grew more and more cool towards that minister, and seemed pleased to hear any thing to his disadvantage: the duke and the bishop, eagerly bent upon his destruction, let slip no opportunity of blackening him in Henry's opinion. They represented to him, that the kingdom in general was dissatisfied with his minister, who, they believed, had abused his majesty's confidence; that as these complaints and murmurings were chiefly about religion, under the direction of the vicegerent, it would be prudent to satisfy the people by examining his conduct strictly, and even to sacrifice him, in order to ensure tranquility. In short, these and the like insinuations had such an effect on Henry, that he resolved the ruin of this too faithful servant, that he might make a merit of offering a sacrifice to the public resentment. This resolution, however, was kept so secret, that, unsuspecting any thing, the destined victim came to the council-board on the thirteenth of June, where the duke of Norfolk, by Henry's order, arrested him for high-treason; and he was sent prisoner to the Tower, where he experienced the common fate of all degraded ministers. He was no sooner seized, but forsaken by all but his friend Cranmer, who alone ventured to write to the king in his favour, though to no purpose; for the unfortunate Cromwell, without being heard in his own defence, was, by a bill of attainder, found guilty of divers heresies and treasons, and condemned to suffer the pains of death, as the king should think proper to direct.

The fall of Cromwell was immediately followed by the dissolution of the marriage of Henry and his new wife; a dissolution which he had almost from her first arrival wished for, not only on account of his aversion to her person, but because he was by this time become enamoured of Catherine Howard, as already mentioned. The whole house of lords, with a committee of the commons, waited upon the king with an address, desiring he would order trial to be made of the validity of his marriage; and Henry complying with their request (which he himself, indeed, put them upon making), a commission was granted for trying it in convocation. They forthwith proceeded to the examination of witnesses, including the depositions of the king, the members of the privy-council, a declaration under the hand of Cromwell, signed in the Tower, the evidence of the earl of Southampton, sir Anthony Denny, Dr. Chambers and Dr. Butts the queen's physicians, and some of the ladies of the bed-chamber. The substance of the whole amounted to these particulars: that there had been a precontract between the queen and the marquis of Lorraine; that it did not appear whether these espousals were made by the parties themselves, or in words of the present tense; that the king, having married her against his will, had not given a pure, inward, and complete consent; and that he had never consummated the marriage.

These frivolous objections were strongly insisted on by the popish party; and Cranmer, being influenced by the fear of irrecoverably losing the king's favour, yielded his assent, so that the convocation unanimously adjudged the marriage null; and on the ninth day of July sentence was given for its dissolution. On the tenth this sentence was notified to both houses, by whom it was approved. Then the king sent the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Southampton, and the bishop of Winchester, to intimate the transaction to Anne of Cleves, who expressed no sort of dissatisfaction at the divorce. They told her, the king would, by letters patent, declare her his adopted sister, and give her precedence before all the ladies of England, except his own wife and daughters; that an estate of three thousand pounds per annum should be allotted for her maintenance; and that she might either live in England, or return to her own country. She chose thousand pounds yearly for their maintenance. About this time also Henry put three hospitals, those of St. George, St. Bartholomew, and St. Thomas, together with a new abbey on Tower-hill, into the hands of the city of London.

* In this session the order of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem was suppressed, on account of their dependence upon the pope and the emperor, and all their effects in England and Ireland confiscated for the use of the king, who allotted three

the former, and was even prevailed upon to write a letter to her brother, the duke of Cleves, the purport of which was, to acquaint him, that she had been most tenderly and generously treated by the king, whom she could not justly have as her husband; and conjuring him not to suffer any thing that had happened to her, to break the good understanding that subsisted between the two courts. Every thing being thus settled, a bill was brought the next day, being the twelfth of July, into parliament, where it passed both houses, for annulling the king's marriage with the queen: by this act the marriage was declared void, and it was made high-treason to judge or believe otherwise*. And here we must observe, that no one could have had the impudence to make use of such reasons as Henry did to bring about the divorce, without being very sure that those to whom they were offered, would be mean enough to allow their validity. The bands of justice and shame had been long broken through, and both clergy and parliament made no scruple of complying with every thing he thought proper to enjoin.

The parliament then proceeded to pass some other acts, viz. for the attainder of the lord Hungerford and several other persons, accused of plotting against the government and being sacramentarians; for the regulating sanctuaries, and reducing their number; for repealing the penalty of death denounced by the statute of the Six Articles against incontinent priests and their women; for confirming what should be declared to be Christian doctrine by the bishops and divines, empowered by the king's commission to draw up a book intituled the Erudition of a Christian man; for erecting a court of wards, and another of the first-fruits and tenths; with others of too special a nature to have a place here.

But we cannot avoid taking particular notice of an act passed at this time, which declared that all marriages should be firm and good, notwithstanding any precontract, not actually carried into consummation. This was a very extraordinary act at this time, after two of Henry's own marriages had been dissolved under the pretence of an unconsummated contract, so that it obliquely condemned the proceedings in both divorces: but we are to remember, that he had a daughter living by Anne Boleyn, whose legitimacy this act justified. The same act mentions, "that all marriages shall be lawful when not within the degrees of kindred mentioned by the law of God." This, no doubt, was made with a view to make way for Henry's marriage with Catherine Howard, who was within the degree of relation prohibited by the canon-law, being cousin-german to Anne Boleyn. The last act of this parliament was a general free pardon of all heresies, treasons, felonies, and offences, but with some exceptions, of which number were Cromwell, the countess of Salisbury, mother to cardinal Pole, and others then in prison†.

As Cromwell's execution had been deferred, he was in some hopes of obtaining his pardon, and the more, as having written the king a very submissive letter: his majesty was so moved therewith, that he caused it to be thrice read over to him; but the solicitations of Norfolk and Gardiner, seconded by those of Catherine Howard, who acted in their favour, rendered the endeavours of the prisoner or his friends fruitless: a minister in disgrace finds few persons generous enough to intercede in his behalf; Cranmer was the only one who discharged the part of a true friend. On this occasion he wrote a very pathetic letter to Henry, interceding for the unhappy Cromwell, declaring his firm belief of his innocence from any disloyal meaning, and even went so far as to wish that Henry might find another counsellor equal to him in capacity, diligence, and fidelity: but the fallen favourite's ruin being resolved on, the king signed a warrant for beheading him on the twenty-eighth of July.

When he was brought to the scaffold on Tower-hill, his regard for his son hindered him from expatiating upon his own innocence: he thanked God for bringing him to that death for his transgressions: he acknowledged his offences against God and his prince, who had raised him from a low degree; confessed that he had been seduced, but that now he died in the catholic faith: then he desired the bystanders to pray for the king, the prince, and for himself: and having spent a little time at his own private devotion, submitted his neck to the executioner, who mangled him in a most shocking manner. However, the care he had taken in his last moments to say nothing that might offend the king, turned to the advantage of his son Gregory, who was, a few months afterwards, created a peer, by the title of lord Cromwell: the office of vicar-general died with Cromwell, no one desiring a post so obnoxious to envy, and so fatal to the first possessor. It now remains to say somewhat concerning the rise and character of this great minister.

Thomas Cromwell was born at Putney, in Surry, about five miles from London; his father was no better than a country blacksmith; but he being blessed with a sprightly genius and a ready capacity to learn languages, acquired so great reputation in the art of war under the duke of Bourbon, whom he accompanied at the sacking of Rome in 1527, and skill in the modern tongues, and interests of the states through which he travelled, as, upon his return, recommended him to the favour and service of cardinal Wolsey. He was retained in the cardinal's service in quality of a solicitor, and discharged that office with so much integrity, resolution, and gratitude to his patron, that, after the cardinal's disgrace and death, the king, notwithstanding he had opposed him, by defending his matter in the house of commons against the articles of impeachment, esteemed him a proper agent for himself in more important affairs, and voluntarily retained him in his service. Mr. Cromwell soon improved the royal favour to his own advantage, for the king, who took a pleasure in raising men of low birth to great honours, being highly satisfied with the management of the affairs committed to him, declared him a privy-counsellor and master of the jewel-house, in 1531; and next year raised him to be clerk of the hanaper and chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1534, he was appointed principal secretary of state and master of the Rolls; and in 1535, he was created visitor general, to inspect the estates and abuses of the monks, friars, and nuns, in order to the suppression of their houses; he was afterwards nominated the king's vicar-general over all the spiritualities under his majesty as supreme head of the church; in virtue of which commission he had the superintendency of all the bishops and secular as well as regular clergy in the kingdom. On the second of July, 1536, he was sworn in lord-keeper of the privy-seal; and on the ninth of the same month was advanced to the dignity of a baron of England, with the style and title of lord Cromwell, baron of Oakham, in the county of Rutland. In 1537, he accepted of the office of chief-justice itinerant of all the forests beyond Trent; and the twenty-sixth of August, in the same year, he was honoured with the Garter. In 1538 he obtained the constablership of Carisbroke castle, in the Isle of Wight, besides many other grants from the crown, and a grant of the castle and lordship of Oakham. In 1540, on the seventeenth of April, he was created earl of Essex, and soon after he was made lord high-chamberlain of England.

Cromwell's chief fault was an excess of obsequiousness to the king's pleasure, the effect of an inordinate zeal for his master's service: in other respects he is scarce sufficiently to be admired for his prodigious parts, excellent judgment, infinite application to business, wonderful dexterity in managing affairs, great moderation in the exercise of his authority, calmness of temper in his dealings with all persons, and under provocations sufficient to ruffle the sedatest persons, an uncommon generosity and nobleness of mind, notwithstanding the meanness of his extraction, and for an unexampled condescension in the height of his pomp, vouchsafing to take notice of his old acquaintance, and shew his gratitude for favours received.

Some few days after Cromwell's death, Henry gave a terrible instance of that cruelty which seemed to have taken possession of his soul: papists and reformers were alike the objects of this infernal passion, and suffered in the same flames. Dr. Barnes, who had made a figure in an embassy to the German princes, Thomas Gerard, a reforming minister, and a favourite with the late queen Anne, and William Jerom, vicar of Stepney, who had been, unheard, attainted of heresy by the parliament, and were now condemned to the stake; but when they came there, neither they nor the sheriff knew for what they suffered. Along with them were executed Gregory Buttolph, Adam Damp-lip, Edmund Brinholme, and Clement Philpot (all bigotted papists), for denying the king's supremacy.

On the eighth of August Catherine Howard was declared queen of England, having been for some time privately married to Henry. By this marriage the popish interest was strengthened, and that party made a strong push at Cranmer; but Henry's affection for him was so unmoveable that the plot miscarried: though it is highly probable, that, had not the queen's interest been broken by her incontinency, Cranmer would have followed Cromwell.

All this time Henry was intent upon the reformation he proposed in religion; the commissioners appointed to draw up a declaration of the Christian doctrine, under the title of the Necessary Erudition of a Christian Man, presented their book to the king, who ordered it to be immediately published, and it was, by the royal authority, recommended to all persons as a rule for directing their belief and practice. Of the contents of this book, we shall have occasion to speak in another place.

About the end of this year there were some beginnings of a misunderstanding between Francis and Henry, which at length terminated in a war. Francis had ordered a fortress to be built at Ardres, and a bridge to be made over to the English pale. But the lord Maltravers, governor of Calais, not suffering this encroachment, sent a detachment of his garrison, and beat down the bridge. The French rebuilt it, and the English demolished it a second time: whereupon Francis ordering the marshal de Biez to raise troops in Picardy in order to support the operations of his people, Henry sent a reinforcement to the garrison of Calais, under the command of Henry Howard, earl of Surry, William FitzWilliams, earl of Southampton, and John, lord Ruffel, who also took with them fifteen hundred workmen, to repair the walls and fortification of Guisnes. But the two kings, willing to avoid a rupture on so slight an occasion, it was agreed to name commissioners for ending all differences: the earl of Hertford and sir Edward Karne were appointed by Henry; but, after repeated meetings with the French commissioners, neither party receiving any satisfaction, each provided for their defence in case of an attack.

Francis was much on the same terms with the emperor, who, after refusing to perform his promise in regard to his giving up to Francis the Milanese, had offered his eldest daughter in marriage to the duke of Orleans, with Flanders to her fortune; with the title of king; but Francis, who followed his humour or resentment rather than the maxims of good policy, was resolved to accept of no equivalent for the Milanese, which he considered as his lawful inheritance: this revived the animosity between those princes to a higher degree than ever; and Francis soon had new provocation given him, for having sent ambassadors to the courts of Constantinople and Venice, as they sailed down the Po in a boat, they were assassinated by the orders of the marquis del Vasco, governor of Milan. The French king complained loudly of this outrage, for which, however, Charles refused to give him satisfaction. A war now appeared unavoidable, and both sides prepared for it, fortifying themselves with new alliances; but Francis not being ready, and the emperor engaged in an expedition against Algiers, it did not break out for some time. Such was the general state of things at the end of the year 1540.

But, before we proceed to the transactions which mark the succeeding year, it will be necessary to take notice, that the reformation intended in England, had, by Henry's orders, been carried over to Ireland, where it met with strong opposition from the papists; but in a parliament held at Dublin, in December, 1537, under the lord Grey, who was appointed by Henry his lieutenant in that kingdom, the king's supremacy was there established in the same manner as in England, and the bishop of Rome's authority abolished: but the efforts which the government made for this purpose were so generally disgustful to the people, that it appears, by a letter from Brown, archbishop of Dublin, to secretary Cromwell, that there was a very dangerous correspondence carried on betwixt the native Irish and the Romish powers on the continent. This broke out, in the year 1539, into a general insurrection, rection under O Neil, who professed himself a champion for the old religion; but the deputy (lord Grey) being assisted by some English forces, sent from Cheshire, defeated the rebels in a pitched battle, which restored the peace of the country for some time. The lord Grey's enemies, however, prevailed on Henry, this year (1540), to send him to the Tower, on a charge of malversation and treasonable correspondence, and he suffered death in the beginning of the ensuing year.

We now return to the affairs of England, where Henry, being alarmed by frequent insurrections from the popish faction, especially in the North, resolved to strike a terror into their minds, by making them a bloody visit in person: he accordingly, in the beginning of the year 1541, gave orders for a progress into Yorkshire. But, before his setting out, the old countess of Salisbury, then upwards of seventy, was, without the least regard to her sex, high rank, or years, brought to the scaffold, on the twenty-seventh of May, for holding a correspondence with her son, cardinal Pole. The fate of this unhappy princess, who underwent her sentence with unparalleled magnanimity, drew tears from every eye but those of the obdurate Henry.

This execution, or rather barbarous murder being over, Henry set out on his progress for the North, where the terror of his presence struck all opposition dead at his feet. The people of Lincolnshire, who had been lately unruly, sought to appease his anger by a sum of money, which they offered as a propitiation for their misdemeanors; and the Yorkshiremen imitated their example: Henry accepted of the commutation, and, after a few executions of those who had been most active in raising disturbances, took the rest into his favour. And now reflecting, that by his late proceedings he had exposed himself to the resentment of all the catholic princes of Europe, who would not fail to take the first opportunity of making him feel the effect of their vengeance, he resolved, if possible, to strengthen his alliance with his nephew, James V. of Scotland, that, in case of a rupture with any other potentate, he might at least be secure from any attempts on his dominions from so near a neighbour.

With this view he sent sir Ralph Sadler to Edinburgh, to propose to James an interview at York; but cardinal Beaton, and the rest of the Scottish prelates, took care to prevent a meeting, which they imagined would prove fatal to the clergy of Scotland: they were apprehensive that Henry might, in a personal conference, prevail upon his nephew to take the same steps with himself, by seizing the monasteries and other ecclesiastical emoluments into his own hands; and therefore they used not only all the credit which they had with their master, as being his ministers, and employed by him in all his affairs, but also made him the largest promises, to divert him from entering into an engagement with Henry. James, tempted by the assurance of thirty thousand crowns a year to be duly paid him by the clergy, who were ready in any difficulty to assist him with all their fortunes, and by the prospect of upwards of one hundred thousand crowns a year which they undertook to raise for him, by the forfeitures of heretics, refused to come to the interview, which was considered as a plain declaration of a hostile disposition, and that he intended to break with his uncle. Henry, disappointed, deluded, and full of resentment, quitted York about the latter end of September, and, continuing his progress through several counties, returned to London, where he met with a cause of still greater uneasiness.

Henry had left the lord-chancellor Audley and the earl of Hertford to manage his affairs in London during his progress. While he was at York, one Lascelles gave the archbishop information, that the queen, in the former part of her life, had been little better than a common strumpet: to confirm this, Lascelles offered to produce the evidence of his sister, who had been a servant in the old duchess of Norfolk's house, where the queen had been educated, and had continued a criminal intrigue with two servants at the same house, Derham and Mannock. Cranmer was naturally roused by this information, especially as it regarded a person whom he knew to be the professed foe to his principles and person; but the point was extremely delicate, and the smallest trip might ruin him; he therefore laid the matter before the lord-chancellor and the earl of Hertford, and they were of opinion that he should acquaint the king with it. As the matter was of such a delicate nature that he could not well express it by word of mouth, he drew up the account in writing, and, on the second of November, presented it to his majesty, the court being by this time returned to London.

Henry, who had pretended a wonderful sagacity on this subject in the case of Anne of Cleves, had not discovered any want of virginity in Catherine Howard, and was still so much in love with her, that he had even put up a prayer in his chapel, returning thanks to God for the felicity he enjoyed in the conjugal state; and even ordered the bishop of Lincoln, his confessor, to compose a form of thanksgiving for that purpose. No words can express his surprize and trouble when he received the archbishop's relation of the queen's infamy, and was so fully convinced of his consort's fidelity, that he at first gave no credit to the information, and said to the lord privy-seal, the lord-admiral, sir Anthony Brown, and sir Thomas Wriothesley, that he looked upon the whole to be a malicious forgery; but as he could not rest till he knew the certainty of the matter, he would have it enquired into, with such precautions as might preserve the queen from any scandal if she were innocent: it was therefore resolved that the lord privy-seal should examine Lascelles, which he did, and found him steady in his information. The same nobleman next, by Henry's orders, found means to examine the sister of Lascelles, and arrest Derham and Mannock. All this being done, the probability of the charge grew stronger every day; the woman confirmed her testimony by undeniable evidence and circumstances: Derham confessed repeated acts of impurity with the queen before her marriage; Mannock did the same; and it was proved, that even since her marriage she had passed a whole night in her bed-chamber with one Culpepper, to whom she had made some presents.

It was with an inconceivable grief, and such an agonizing distraction of mind as, barring all utterance of speech, found vent only in a torrent of tears, that Henry received the report of the examinations. Archbishop Cranmer, the lord-chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Suffex, and the bishop of Winchester, being appointed to interrogate interrogate the queen on the subject, she at first denied all; but finding them fully apprized of her practices, she confessed the whole to the archbishop, and the confession being put into writing, she signed it with her own hand. The lady Rochford particularly, the same who had been so instrumental in the death of queen Anne Boleyn, was found to have been an instrument in the queen's abominable lewdness, and both of them were at the same time sent to the Tower, and the rest of their accomplices to different prisons. Agnes, the old duchess of Norfolk, was sent to prison as being privy to the queen's crimes; the countess of Bridgewater, the lord William Howard (then Henry's ambassador in France, but recalled on this occasion) and his lady*, four other men, and five women, were all committed to prison likewise; and it was resolved to proceed against them for misprision of treason.

Any other person but Henry would have been weary of continually exposing the real or pretended infamy of his family; but he, on the contrary, determined to make it as public as possible; and being sensible that the best and readiest method to take vengeance on those who had offended him, would be to convoke a parliament, the usual instrument of his tyranny, orders were issued for it to assemble on the sixteenth of January of the following year, 1542.

The parliament being sat down, the lord-chancellor made a motion in the house of lords, to take into consideration Henry's case through his queen's lewdness: this produced an act, in form of a petition, in which, after desiring the king not to be grieved at this misfortune, they requested that the queen and her accomplices, with her procuress the lady Rochford, might be attainted of high-treason; and that all those who knew of the queen's vicious life before her marriage, and had concealed it, as the duchess dowager of Norfolk, and the other noble and common personages above-mentioned, who were already imprisoned, might be attainted of misprision of treason.

It was also enacted, "That whoever should know any thing of the incontinence of the queen (for the time being), should reveal it with all possible speed, under the pains of treason. And if the king, or his successors, should incline to marry any woman whom they took to be a pure and clean maid, if she, not being so, did not declare the same to the king, it should be high-treason; and all who knew it, and did not reveal it, should be guilty of misprision of treason. And that if the queen, or the prince's wife, should procure any person, by messages or words, to have criminal conversation with her, or any other by words or messages should solicit them, they, their counsellors and abettors, should be adjudged traitors."

In consequence of this remarkable act, the queen and lady Rochford were beheaded on Tower-hill, on the twelfth of February, about seven months after she had been married to the king. The queen confessed the misconduct of her former life, but endeavoured to persuade the world that she had always been faithful since her marriage, with regard to the king. As for lady Rochford, every one looked upon her execution as a judgment of Heaven for her having been the principal instrument of the death of Anne Boleyn, her sister-in-law, and of her own husband; and this notorious instance of her profligate life tended much to clear their characters in the opinion of the world. As to the duchess dowager of Norfolk and the others attainted of misprision of treason, the king was pleased to pardon them, and by degrees discharge them from their confinements. Derham was hanged; Man-nock got off by giving up his estate, which was very considerable; and the other criminals were sentenced to perpetual imprisonment.

Those examples being made, the parliament proceeded to other regulations, which will be found under the head of Laws, at the end of this period. But the most distinguished act of this parliament was that which passed on the twenty-third of January, declaring Henry to be King instead of Lord of Ireland; and the proclamation notifying this alteration of his style was read in the house of peers. This seems in its effects to have been a very politic step; for whether the Irish chieftains had been much weakened before, or thought it more suitable to their notions of honour to yield obedience and own a subordination to the royal dignity, James, earl of Desmond, coming over in the summer to England, made his submission; and his example was soon followed by the heads of several septs, or tribes, who were content to take titles of honour after the English manner. Thus William de Burgh, or Bourk, was created baron of Dunkellyn and earl of Clanricard; Mawer O'Brien, earl of Thomond; and his son, Conat O'Brien, lord of Ibrackain; Connac O'Neil was made earl of Tyrone; and his son Matthew, lord of Dunganon.

This parliament, before it separated, willing to approve itself as pliant to the king's will as we have shewn the last to have been, passed an act to annul all the local statutes of colleges and hospitals, and to absolve all the governors, presidents, and fellows of them from their oath of obedience to the same, because the king wanted to seize upon them, as he had done the abbeys: accordingly some of them were surrendered into his hands; but a more expeditious method was taken in the sequel. The parliament, having now answered all the king's purposes, was prorogued on the first day of April to the third of November following.

* Rapin, by mistake, supposes these to be her father and mother, whereas they were her uncle and aunt: her father was the lord Edmund Howard. As the family of the Howards spread themselves into several branches, in order to prevent confusion, it will be proper to insert here a short genealogical account of that family, which shall be carried on in due time. Sir Robert Howard (temp. Hen. VI.) married Margaret, daughter and coheir to Thomas de Mowbray, duke of Norfolk) by whom he had John, created duke of Norfolk the twenty-eighth of June, 1 Ric. III. (and slain afterwards, at Bosworth fight, who married first, Catherine, daughter of William, lord Mollins; by whom he had Thomas, created earl of Surry 1 Rich. III. and restored to the same title 4 Hen. VII. and to that of duke of Norfolk 5 Hen. VIII. secondly, Margaret, daughter of sir John Chedworth. The said Thomas married first Elizabeth, daughter and sole heir of sir Frederick Tilney; by whom he had Thomas, the third duke of Norfolk; sir Edward, knight of the Garter, and high admiral; and Edmund, father to this queen Catherine. His second wife was Agnes, sister and heir of sir Philip Tilney; by whom he had William, created Baron of Effingham, the eleventh day of March, (1 Mary); and Thomas, who died in the Tower, 1527, where he was confined on account of Margaret Douglas, daughter of the queen of Scotland. Dugdale's Baron. vol. II. p. 265, 278.

During these transactions Henry was meditating vengeance on the king of Scotland for the affront which he had received from that monarch in the affair of the interview, and finding he was in a condition to make himself respected, by the subsidies and privileges granted in the last parliament, he resolved to lose no time to carry his designs into execution; but first of all he endeavoured to tie up the hands of the king of France, by proposing the renewal of the treaty of perpetual peace with England, that Francis might not be able to assist the king of Scotland as usual. For this purpose Paget, an able minister, was sent over to the court of France with very flattering offers; but Francis soon dived into the design of this negotiation, and, without mentioning the king of Scotland, whom he was resolved not to abandon in time of need, embarrassed Henry with a reciprocal demand of his assistance to recover the Milanese, pursuant to former treaties: to which Henry replied, that he was ready so to do whensoever Francis should fulfil his engagement of abolishing the papal authority in France. In short, this embassy, instead of strengthening former treaties, seemed only to open the breach; and, from the numerous altercations, it is plain there could be no friendship between the two courts. In the mean time the emperor, having lost his fleet and army before Algiers, Francis resolved to take advantage of his distress, and this year he invaded, by four different places, the territories of Charles; but the success of the campaign fell far short, upon the whole, of what he expected from it.

As for Henry, finding that the king of France was not to be lured over to his purpose, he resolved to act of himself; and, concealing his real motives, which were to oblige Scotland to renounce the pope's authority, he revived the old pretensions of the kings of England to the sovereignty of Scotland; he also pretended a violation of the truce by king James's denial of some lands of small value on the frontier, and his having given an asylum to some English rebels. These particulars were pompously set forth in a manifesto, but not published till his army was just ready to enter Scotland, in order that he might take the Scots unprepared: however, James soon got notice of the levies making in England; and his resentment against Henry's proceedings was kept alive and heightened by the French ambassador, who brought with him supplies of men and money, and was extremely lavish in the promises he made in his master's name.

About the beginning of October, and not before, Henry having raised an army of thirty thousand men, gave the command of them to the duke of Norfolk as his lieutenant-general, who rendezvoused his forces at Newcastle. The earl of Southampton (Fitz Williams) was appointed to command the van; but he died at Newcastle, universally regretted for his great abilities as a statesman, and his approved courage and skill as an admiral and general. On the twenty-first of October the English entered Scotland, when they were met by an herald from James, who expostulated upon the injustice of such an invasion, before any war was proclaimed; but the duke, regardless of these remonstrances, ravaged all the country bordering on the Tweed, and retired to Berwick, on account of the severity of the season. George Gordon, earl of Huntley, had been sent by James, with a body of ten thousand men, to oppose these depredations; but he was so inferior in force to the English, that he was obliged to act upon the defensive.

James in the mean time having levied an army of fifteen thousand men, with a train of artillery, appointed the lord Maxwell, warden of the West Marches of Scotland, his general, and determined to invade England on the western side of the Solway Firth. Thither the Scottish monarch repaired in person; but he soon left the field, after having conferred the chief command upon his favourite, Oliver, lord Sinclair, an upstart nobleman, who was mortally hated by all the old nobility, who, on this occasion, chose rather to sacrifice their king, their country, and their own honour, than suffer the disparagement offered to them in putting such a person over their heads: in a word, when Sinclair read his commission in the front of the army, the officers declared they would not serve under him, and the troops, following their example, threw down their arms, while all was uproar and confusion through the ranks. All the English forces in a condition to oppose the Scottish army did not amount to above five hundred, then under sir Thomas Wharton, the bastard Dacres, and Musgrave; but this handful was formed into a hovering party, to observe the motions of the Scots; and seeing them suddenly break their ranks, and fall into a general disorder, they charged them with such fury, that the Scots, having no one to head them, and thinking that the duke of Norfolk, with his whole army, was at hand, fell into an entire rout, while the English, improving the advantage the enemy's panic offered them, pursued with great ardour, and, with very little or no opposition, took the earls of Cassils and Glencairn, the lords Maxwell, Fleming, Somerville, Gray, the general Sinclair, with about two hundred gentlemen, and eight hundred common soldiers with all their baggage and artillery.

This rout, or rather defeat, happened at a place called Solway Moss, near Carlisle. James was then at Caerlevaroc, where he received the mournful intelligence of the slaughter, captivity, and dispersion of his army: this unexpected account so affected his spirits, that he betook himself to his bed. News being brought him, that his queen was delivered of a daughter, it increased his melancholy, which finished his life on the fourteenth day of December, twenty-four days after the fatal field of Solway Moss, leaving behind him his new-born daughter Mary, heiress of the Scottish throne.

The death of king James, and the birth of a daughter, heiress to a kingdom, whose friendship was of so much importance to England, gave a new turn to Henry's counsels: he wisely forbore driving the Scots to despair, by taking any severe advantages of his late victory; on the contrary, he formed a scheme for uniting the two kingdoms by means of a match between Edward, prince of Wales, and the young queen of Scotland. With this view he ordered his ministers to sound the inclinations of the Scottish prisoners on the subject, and finding them well disposed to encourage such a project, he set them at liberty, on condition that they should return to London, in case it could not be effected. Together with them, Henry sent sir Ralph Sadler, with private instructions for gaining over the government of Scotland in favour of the match; the earl of Angus and his brother also returned back to their their own country, after having lived as refugees at the English court.

The parliament of England meeting the twenty-second of January, 1543, were so well pleased with the success of the king's arms against the Scots, that they granted him a very considerable subsidy, as well for defraying his charges in the war as for his other occasions. Then they passed an act, permitting the nobility, gentry, and merchants to have English Bibles in their houses, together with certain other religious books mentioned in the statute, for the instruction of their families. This law, which was procured by the interest of Cranmer, contained a clause that mitigated the punishment of those who should be charged with heresy: but the parliament impowered his majesty to repeal or change this act as he should find it expedient.

The behaviour of Francis to Henry's ambassadors had so dissatisfied the latter, that, thinking himself sure of Scotland, from the late victory and the measures he had taken upon the death of James, he determined to enter into a league with the emperor, the mortal enemy of France, that he might convince the French monarch how impolitically he had acted in shewing so little regard to his offers. Accordingly, on the eleventh of February this year, a few days after the breaking up of the session of parliament, a treaty was concluded at London: it contained a league for England, only with what Henry held in Picardy; and on the part of Charles, for the provinces of the Low Countries under his dominion*, without any mention of Spain or Germany. The league was to this effect:

"That the emperor and the king of England should send ambassadors to the king of France, to declare to him, that by his solicitations only the Turks had invested Christendom; that therefore the two confederate monarchs exhorted him to break his alliance with the Infidels, to hold them for enemies, and renounce his correspondence with them; that they demanded, moreover, he should satisfy the damages done to Christendom by calling in those cruel enemies; that he should give over the war he had begun in several places, that the emperor might apply himself to the defence of Christendom; that he should cause the town of Muran, taken by the Turks, to be restored to king Ferdinand, and to the emperor Castro Novo, which they had besieged with the aid of twelve French galleys; that he should repair the losses the Germans had sustained by the Turkish invasion: lastly, that he should satisfy the king of England for whatever he owed him, and give him security for the payment of the hundred thousand crowns."

After these preliminaries, the two confederate monarchs agreed, that they would not make peace or truce but upon these conditions: "that Francis should pay the king of England whatever was due to him; and, for security of the annual pension, surrender into his hands the earldom of Ponthieu, Montreuil, Ardres, and Terouenne, free from all homage; for which however Henry should consent that the yearly revenues thence arising should be in lieu of the pension: moreover, that Francis should restore to the emperor the duchy of Burgundy.

"That if the king of France should delay but ten days to accept these conditions, the two confederate monarchs should proclaim war against him, with a declaration that they would never make peace till the king of England was in possession of Normandy, Guienne, and the kingdom of France; and the emperor, of Abbeville, Amiens, Bray, Corbeil, Peronne, Ham, St. Quintin, and the whole duchy of Burgundy.

"Lastly they agreed that each should take the field, and invade France with twenty-five thousand men, of whom five thousand should be cavalry: and also each of them should fit out ships, with two or three thousand armed men†."

One of Henry's chief views in this league with the emperor, was to carry his designs upon Scotland into execution; but there he found, much against his expectations, irresistible obstacles. The Scottish prisoners, upon their return home, found that unhappy country involved in the greatest confusion: the next heir to the crown (upon the untimely death of James V.) after young Mary, was James Hamilton, earl of Arran, a nobleman of a weak capacity and a peaceable disposition; he was a friend to the reformed religion, but altogether unqualified for the management of public affairs; but the friends of the new religion, which were pretty numerous in Scotland, exhorted him to claim the regency by virtue of his proximity of blood; and, thus encouraged, he resolved to demand it at the meeting of the next parliament.

But this was violently opposed by the popish faction under cardinal Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, a priest of unpopular manners and a persecuting spirit; he had been dignified by the pope, to procure him greater reverence from the people and the greater sway with his master, whom he kept firm to the see of Rome; he therefore naturally attached himself to the French interest, in opposition to the English, and was supported by the queen-mother, who was sister to the duke of Guise, and a zealous papist. Beaton had, upon the death of James, published his will (which the Scots say was forged), by which that prince left the government to him, jointly with the earls of Argyll, Huntley, and Murray, during his daughter's minority; but the nation, not bearing to see a priest at the helm of affairs, on the meeting of their parliament, in the beginning of this year, chose the earl of Arran sole regent: and the will produced by Beaton was set aside.

Sir Ralph Sadler, who had accompanied the captive noblemen from England, as Henry's envoy to the Scottish parliament, proposed to that assembly the marriage between prince Edward and their young queen. This proposal was so warmly supported by the English party in Scotland, that, after a long debate it was accepted, and the parliament appointed the earl of Angus, his brother sir William Douglas, and some other persons, to conduct the treaty of marriage and peace, which was concluded on the first day of July, importing, "that the young queen should be brought into England, as soon as she should have attained the tenth year of her age; and that in the mean time the Scottish parliament should send three hostages of distinction to reside in London till the nuptials should be completed: that the kingdom of Scotland should be still called by that name, and enjoy all its laws and lawful liberties, as they had been always justly and uninterruptedly maintained, observed, and approved of by the said kingdom of Scotland: and lastly, that the regent, the earl of Arran, should be accountable to the prince of Wales for all his intromissions of the revenues of Scotland, after deducting the necessary expences for the queen's maintenance*.

But though Henry's party had thus carried it in the parliament of Scotland for a peace with England and the proposed marriage, yet all their projects were rendered abortive by the intrigues of cardinal Beaton, who, by means of a large sum of money which he received from the clergy, who apprehended their superstition was in danger, should this event take place, gained over such a number of partizans, that the people in general exclaimed against the treaty with England as a union which would be productive of their own slavery. The English ambassador was insulted by the populace to the hazard of his life; and the regent had no longer any power to give him satisfaction, much less to send the hostages stipulated in the treaty. Sadler, foreseeing the consequence of these proceedings, summoned the prisoners to return to England according to their promise; but none of them had so much honour to perform their engagements, except Gilbert Kennedy, earl of Cassils, whose noble behaviour so pleased Henry, that he loaded him with presents, and dismissed him without ransom; at the same time he was so highly incensed at the perfidy of the other prisoners, the affront offered to his envoy, and the clamour raised by Beaton and his adherents against the English alliance, that he resolved without delay to declare war against Scotland.

Mean while the queen dowager and the cardinal, to strengthen their interest against the party of the Hamiltons, persuaded Matthew Stuart, earl of Lennox to return from France, where he had resided some time, assuring him that he should espouse the queen-dowager, and, in case of the infant Mary's death, be advanced to the throne in preference to Arran, whose legitimacy was liable to some objections. Tempted by this project, the earl of Lennox repaired to Scotland, and, on his arrival, consented to the breaking off the match between the queen and the prince of Wales, and assembled a body of men, in order to wrest the young queen from the hands of the regent, who, either unable or unwilling to contend with his enemies, proposed an accommodation, which was effected. And now the queen and the cardinal, who had gained this important point, and had no farther occasion for Lennox, wrote to the king of France to recall him into that kingdom; which coming to the earl's knowledge, as also that a conspiracy was formed against his life, in case he should continue his stay in Scotland, quitted the court suddenly, and withdrew to his castle of Dumbarton; and the following year he threw himself into the arms of the English.

During these transactions in Scotland, Henry, notwithstanding the many misfortunes he had met with in his former marriages, ventured once more to enter into that state by espousing a sixth wife, in the person of Catherine Parr, widow to Neville, lord Latimer, and daughter to sir Thomas Parr, of Kendal. The marriage was consummated on the twelfth of July. The new queen was a favourer of the reformed, but she had the mortification to behold, a very few days after the celebration of her nuptials, a fresh prosecution commenced against her own party, three of whom, Anthony Personne, a priest, Robert Testwood, a singing-man, and Henry Fulmer, a taylor, at the instigation of Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, were burned at Windsor, for reading the writings of the reformed; nor dared Catherine intercede for them. But while the bloody Gardiner, supported by his still more bloody master, was thus persecuting the reformers, his own German secretary was convicted of denying the king's supremacy, and executed. This seems to have been done with a view of Henry's continuing his character of impartial cruelty to protestants as well as papists. The rest of this year was spent in immense preparations for the ensuing campaign; and we are told, that, upon this occasion, cast pieces of iron cannon and mortars were first made in England, at Buckstead, in Suffex, by Peter Baud, Ralph Hoge, and Peter Van Colen, Flemish artificers†. On the twenty-third of December, the king, to shew his great regard for the queen, who, by her extraordinary tenderness and submission to his will, daily gained upon his affections, created her brother, the lord Parr, earl of Essex; and her uncle, sir William Parr, was made chamberlain of her household, with the title of lord Parr of Horton.

While these things passed in England, the war between the emperor and the king of France was carrying on in several places. In the beginning of the spring of this year, Francis gained some advantages in the Low Countries, where he took Landrecy, Emery, Bapanume, Maubeuge, and Luxemburgh; but Charles arriving, about the end of the summer, with a strong supply of Spanish troops, Francis, being inferior in numbers, was obliged to keep upon the defensive. This gave the emperor an opportunity to invest Landrecy, of which, however, he was forced to raise the siege, upon Francis's finding means to throw in succours; but he made himself amends by taking Cambray. At the same time Barbarossa, admiral of the Turks, coming to Marseilles with an hundred and ten Turkish gallies, found there the count d'Enghien, of the house of Bourbon, with two-and-twenty French gallies, and they both sailed together, and attacked Nice on the tenth of August, and on the twentieth became masters of the town; but the castle made so brave a defence, that the Turkish admiral, finding he lost both time and reputation before the place, retired and wintered in Provence, from whence he returned to Turkey in the beginning of the following year‡. As for Henry, during the whole campaign, he assisted the emperor only with a small body of troops, under the command of sir John Wallop, who left Calais on the twenty-second of July, and had the good fortune, after ravaging all the French lands through which they passed, to join the Imperial army while it lay, with Charles at its head, before Landrecy: but they both formed vast projects the next year, and it was resolved that both together should raise an army of ninety thousand foot and twenty thousand horse; that Henry should enter France by the way of Picardy, and Charles by that of Champagne; and that both armies should join in a certain place and march directly to the gates of Paris: but the sequel will shew us, that the emperor's views in this alliance were very different what he professed, and that at the bottom he only wanted to make Henry his dupe.

The parliament meeting on the fourteenth of January, 1544, its first act was to regulate the different degrees of those who, after the king's death, might lay claim to the succession. And here it will be necessary to observe, that the negotiation preceding the late treaty made with the emperor was attended with one difficulty: Charles demanded that Henry should own his daughter Mary as his legitimate offspring; and the king of England flatly refused to comply with his request: nevertheless he promised to assign her a rank in the succession according to the power bestowed upon him in parliament, and at last Charles was satisfied with this verbal promise; and Henry being now desirous to strengthen the friendship which had been re-established between him and the emperor, resolved to perform this promise. His parliament, servilely compliant with his will, now passed an act to settle the succession in the person of Edward, prince of Wales, and his issue; in default of whom the crown was to go to the lady Mary, but with certain conditions, to be limited by the king's letters patent, or by his last will in writing, sealed with his own hand: upon failure of her and her issue, the crown was to descend to the lady Elizabeth and her issue, with the conditions aforesaid. But the two ladies failing to perform the conditions, the succession was settled upon such person or persons as the king should appoint, by his letters patent, or his last will in writing: but in case the king left no such conditions, the ladies were to enjoy the crown absolutely. By the remaining part of this act, in case of the decease of the king's three lawful issue, leaving no issue, Henry was empowered to dispose of the crown by his will, signed with his own hand. Then follows a new oath against the bishop of Rome's authority, with penalties annexed to all who should refuse to take it or endeavour to interrupt the act of succession.

Another act of this parliament declared where, and before whom, all treason committed out of England should be tried: that the following titles should for ever be annexed to the imperial crown of England, viz. "king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith and church of England and also of Ireland, on earth the supreme head." It was likewise enacted, that nothing but the oath of twelve men, before authorized commissioners, could bring any person to his trial upon the offences comprehended in the statute of the Six Articles; and that all such presentments should be made within one year after the offence committed; that no person should be imprisoned without such indictments; and that all indictments against preachers, or readers, for such offences from the pulpit, should be within forty days. Thus the bloody statute of the Six Articles was in some measure qualified as to its penalties. By another act, the king was remitted all sums he had borrowed since the first of January, in the thirty-third year of his reign, by which all claims against him, through his iniquitous loans, was at one dash struck off. Another act provided excellently for the preservation of woods, necessary for keeping up the royal navy of England.

The parliament rose on the twenty-ninth of March, and soon after the king sent an armament to invade Scotland. The fleet amounted to near two hundred ships, and had on board a body of ten thousand men: Dudley, lord Lisle, commanded the navy; and the earl of Hertford conducted the land forces, as lieutenant-general, with the earl of Shrewsbury under him. The troops were disembarked in the neighbourhood of Leith, and, after defeating a small body which opposed them, they took that town, and then advanced to Edinburgh, the gates of which they soon forced, and the English first pillaged, and then set the town on fire, which continued burning three days. The regent earl of Arran, who had been entirely gained over by cardinal Beaton, was in no condition to resist so strong an army, and therefore retired with his forces to Stirling. The earl of Hertford directed his march eastward, and, being reinforced with six thousand men, under the command of the lord Ewers, governor of Berwick, he ravaged the whole country, burned Haddington and Dunbar, and committed many outrages. All this time, Francis, who ought to have protected his allies the Scots, whom his intrigues had led into this war, sent them only a few troops and a trifling sum of money, under de Larges and de Brosse, while the ships which carried them, with all their provisions and ammunition, fell into the hands of the English, who, on the eighteenth of May, returned to England.

Henry shewed very little policy in this sudden and violent invasion, by which he inflamed the resentment, without subduing the spirit, of the Scots; however, he put the best face he could on the disappointment, for it can be called no other, which he met with in his expedition, and his next resort was to keep the Scottish lords of his party firm to his interest. He had a fair opening for this by the application of the earl of Lenox, who was shut up in Dunbarton, but found means to send his brother, the bishop of Caithness, with proposals to Henry, at Carlisle. He accordingly met with the English commissioners, the lord Wharton and sir Robert Bowes, and in a short time it was agreed, "First that the Scottish lords should cause the pure word of God to be taught in their countries. Secondly, They should continue the king's faithful friends. Thirdly, They should take care that the queen be not secretly taken away. Fourthly, They should assist the king to seize on some castles on the borders. Henry on his part promised to send armies to Scotland both by sea and land, and to make the earl of Lenox, as soon as he could, governor of Scotland; and that he should bestow his niece, the lady Margaret Douglas, upon him. And for the performance of those articles the bishop of Caithness was left as hostage in England.

The earl of Lenox upon this agreement came to London, where it was confirmed on the twenty-sixth of June, with these additional articles:

"First, The earl of Lenox was to confirm the convention made at Carlisle, and to become Henry's servant against all who should impugn his title or authority in Scotland, or elsewhere. Secondly, condly, To surrender into Henry's hands the castle of Dunbarton, with the Isle of Bute; and to help him to win the castle of Ross. Thirdly, That the earl should assist Henry in becoming the protector of the kingdom of Scotland; that he should take care that the Scottish queen should not be carried out of Scotland; that he should do his best to deliver her into Henry's hands; that Henry should make him governor of Scotland; but that he should call no parliament, or do any acts of government, without Henry's direction."

The earl of Lenox was immediately dispatched to Dunbarton† with thirteen ships; and, in consequence of the treaty with Henry, endeavoured to persuade the governor to deliver the castle to the king of England; but he, preferring his duty to his affection for the earl, rejected all his advantageous offers; so that being obliged to withdraw, Lenox vented his rage on the isles of Arran, Bute, and Kintyre; which hostilities were revenged by the Scottish ministry on the persons and estates of the earl's friends, till a body of troops, sent from Carlisle, marched to their relief; who, in their inroads, took Jedburgh, Kelso, Coldingham, and ravaged without mercy the counties of Tiviot, Marche, and Lauderdale, compelling the inhabitants to swear allegiance to the king of England.

In the mean time the emperor called upon Henry to fulfil his engagements, in joining with him against France. On this occasion, Henry, finding that the grants of the last parliament were not sufficient for the expences of his intended expedition, took an impolitic method of increasing his finances, by raising the value of gold from forty-five to forty-eight shillings the ounce, and silver from three shillings and nine pence to four shillings; and by coining base money, not intrinsically worth above half its nominal value, which, after passing current in his reign, was cried down by Edward VI. and finally called in by queen Elizabeth.

Henry now appointed the queen regent in his absence, and the archbishop of Canterbury, with the earl of Hertford, were placed at the head of the council left to assist her, which was made up of Wriothesley (lately made a baron, and, on the death of lord Audley) chancellor, Thirlby, bishop of Westminster, Peters, secretary of state, and the queen's own uncle, lord Parr of Horton. Henry likewise provided for the peace of the several counties in his absence, by appointing proper persons to govern them.

Every thing being thus settled, Henry passed over to Calais on the eleventh of June, with thirty thousand men, and attended by the flower of the English nobility*. Soon after his arrival he was joined by the count de Buren, admiral of Flanders, with ten thousand infantry and four thousand horse, and the whole composed an army which nothing in that quarter was able to withstand; the chief force of the French army was employed on the side of Champagne, resisting the progress of the Imperialists. It had been proposed between the emperor and Henry, to join their forces together (which it was computed would amount to near one hundred thousand men) and march up directly to Paris; and the king's council in this case had advised his landing in Normandy, a province rich, defenceless, and affording him an easy passage to that metropolis. This would have reduced France (as the cardinal du Bellay observes, who was in the scene of action) to the brink of ruin; but the emperor, after amusing himself with taking Commercy and Luxemburg, formed the siege of Didier, instead of setting out on his march to join Henry. This opened Henry's eyes; he found that he had been deceived by the emperor, and therefore thought it was reasonable that he should take towns as well as Charles; and that the latter having failed in fulfilling his engagements, he would endeavour to indemnify himself by some useful conquest, therefore, instead of advancing directly to Paris, he invested the towns of Montreuil and Boulogne.

The duke of Norfolk commanded the forces before Montreuil, and the king in person headed those before Boulogne: this last place was defended by Varvin, the governor, and held out till the fourteenth of September, when it surrendered, on the garrison being allowed to march to Montreuil with its baggage. Montreuil still held out against the duke of Norfolk.

During this siege the emperor had made himself master of Didier, after an obstinate siege; and he afterwards surprized Espernay and Chateau Thierry: but the French army, under the dauphin and the duke of Orleans, being now increased to forty thousand men, two thousand gens d'armes, and as many light horse, being posted in his way to Paris, he was obliged to march towards Soissons. Finding it difficult, through a scarcity of provisions, to keep his forces together, and impracticable, for want of strong towns, to secure them to take winter quarters in the country, he hearkened to a treaty of peace proposed by the king of France, who, knowing the extremities to which Boulogne and Montreuil were reduced, and fearing that the king of England would, after the reduction of those places, advance with his army to join the emperor, was very eager to have it concluded. Charles on his part, in order to have a pretext to abandon his ally, dispatched a messenger to the English camp before Boulogne to press Henry to perform his promise, and meet him with his army and proceed to Paris. Henry, who was by this time perfectly well acquainted with the perfidy of his ally, replied, that he was too far engaged in the siege of Boulogne to raise it with honour; and that the emperor himself had first violated the convention by forming sieges.

This answer furnished Charles with the desired pretext for concluding a peace with Francis, without including his ally of England. Accordingly a treaty was concluded between these two princes, at Crespy, in the Laonnois, on the eighteenth of September, four days after the surrender of Boulogne. The principal conditions were, "That the duke of Orleans should marry Mary of Austria, the emperor's eldest daughter, or the second daughter of the king of the Romans; and that he should have with her, as a fortune, the Milanese or the

In this division marched the Welsh and Irish.

Low Countries, with the earldoms of Burgundy and Charolois, at the option of the emperor; but if he gave them Milan and Cremona until there was a son from the marriage: and then should give them the Low Countries, Francis was, for himself and heirs, to renounce for ever all pretensions upon the Milanese and Naples." Many other articles were likewise inserted, material to the history of those two princes, but not for ours, only that all their late conquests on either side were given up; and Francis promised to submit to Charles the arbitration of his differences with the king of England.

The first effect which the treaty of Crespy had, was the withdrawing, by orders from Charles, all the Imperial troops at the siege of Montreuil, under the count de Buren, which weakened the duke of Norfolk so much, that Henry sent him orders to raise that siege entirely, and to join him. This was done on the twenty-fifth of September, after the duke had laid the adjacent country waste. And Henry hearing that the dauphin was in full march with all his army, to give him battle, left a strong garrison in Boulogne, under the command of the lord-admiral Lisle, whom he made governor, and departed for England on the thirtieth of the same month, gaining a few days march upon the French, who, upon this disappointment, exerted all their efforts to retake Boulogne before the breaches were repaired, but without success. The public records inform us, that whilst these hostilities were going forward, overtures were made for a treaty between France and England, and that the earl of Hertford and sir William Paget met the French commissioners at Calais for that purpose; but the French insisting upon the restitution of Boulogne as an indispensable preliminary, the conferences were broken off.

From these and other proceedings of the French court, Henry having great reason to imagine that Francis would attempt an invasion of England next year, on his return home he put Gravesend, Tilbury, Portsmouth, Dover, and all other places on the sea-coasts liable to surprize from the French fleet, in a posture of defence.

The king had been at a very great expence in his French expedition*, and the keeping of Boulogne being likely to cost him a great deal more, to provide for this growing charge, and to replenish his exhausted Exchequer, he had recourse to the extraordinary way of a benevolence. The commissioners appointed to levy it in London, meeting in January, 1545, at Baynard's castle, found the affair liable to very great difficulties, some of the richest citizens absolutely refusing, and others excusing themselves on account of inability, through their not being paid for the corn with which they had supplied the army: in a word, there appeared a general reluctance among such as were able to advance money; and one alderman Read, who shewed himself more refractory than the rest, was, by a detestable stretch of arbitrary power, sent to serve as a soldier in the Northern Marches. This severity so intimidated the rest of the recusants, that they at length consented to the royal demand. It appears from authentic accounts, that Henry on this occasion raised upwards of seventy thousand pounds, exclusive of the cities of London and York, and the counties of Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham.

Henry's suspicion of a French invasion was shewn this year to have been well founded; for Francis had employed all the last winter and great part of this spring in making preparations for the recovery of Boulogne, and a descent on the coast of England. He had fitted out one hundred and fifty large ships of war with sixty of a smaller size, and brought twenty-five galleys from Marseilles to Havre de Grace. This fleet he sent, under the command of admiral Annebaut, to invade England; who, setting sail in July, arrived, on the eighteenth of that month, off St. Helen's in the Isle of Wight, and, after some skirmishes with a squadron of sixty English vessels that lay at Spithead, but whom he durst not follow close in shore, for want of pilots, landed on the island, which he cruelly ravaged; but his troops being repulsed by the militia of the country, they fled to their ships, which soon after set sail for France, but were again driven upon the coast of England, where they were again encountered by the English fleet, now increased to upwards of one hundred sail; both sides engaged with equal fury, but night parting them after they had fought two hours, the French got into Havre de Grace, and the English admiral (lord Lisle), steering towards Normandy, ravaged the coasts of that province, and took a great number of the French ships.

In the mean time Francis was exerting all his efforts to distress, block up, and take Boulogne, and had fitted out this great naval armament principally with a view to shut up that port; but his schemes for that purpose, though supported by a land army of two hundred thousand men, proved abortive; all that the French monarch could do, was to ravage the little territory of Oye, whence the garrison of Calais used to have their forage and some cattle for their subsistence; and this done, he retired to Amiens, dismissing his forces. The English, in this campaign acted only on the defensive; ten thousand lancequenets and four thousand horse, which had been levied in Germany, being hindered by Henry's good ally, the emperor, from passing through his territories. While the French were thus employed, the duke of Orleans died at Chateau Montier, to the unspeakable regret of his father Francis, whose peace with the emperor in a great measure depended upon the life of that young prince.

Francis seeing all his measures had miscarried, that his kingdom was exhausted, and himself threatened with a new war by the emperor, as the conditions of the treaty of Crespy were dissolved by the death of the duke of Orleans, began to be very desirous of reconciling himself to Henry: for this purpose he engaged the princes of the Smalcaldic league to offer themselves as mediators. This interposition appeared the more natural, as they were menaced by the emperor, who had entered into a negociation with the Turks, and could not be supposed to find out a better expedient for their own safety than effecting a reconciliation between the kings of France and England, and soliciting the protection of these two princes. They accordingly offered their mediation, which was accepted with great seeming cordiality, and they mediated so earnestly, that conferences for a peace between the two nations were appointed between Ardres and Guisnes: but as Henry would neither admit the Scots, with whom he was at war, to be included in the treaty, nor consent to the restitution of Boulogne, the conferences broke off without any effect; though Henry, in order to frighten Francis into a compliance, sent the bishops of Winchester and Westminster as his ambassadors to Charles, to propose terms of reconciliation with him.

On the other hand, Francis, who thought that a diversion in Scotland would be the most likely means to work upon Henry, sent the sieur de Lorges, count de Montgomeri, over thither with five thousand men, and ordered him to use his utmost endeavours to persuade the Scots to make a powerful inroad on the frontiers of England. Montgomeri arriving in Scotland, joined his troops with those of the regent, and both, making together fifteen thousand men, advanced towards the Tweed. For some days several parties passed the river, and did some damage to the English; but the French general could never persuade the Scots to venture over with the whole army; on the contrary, upon news that the earl of Hertford was advancing, at the head of twelve thousand men, they hastily retired, and presently after disbanded as usual. This was all that passed in Scotland, worthy notice, during the campaign of 1545.

The English parliament meeting on the twenty-third of November, the convocation continued for two years the subsidy given the king of six shillings in the pound: at the same time the commons suppressed, by an act, all the colleges and hospitals, and gave their lands to the king: the motive, or rather pretence of this suppression, was the abuse of these foundations, but the parliament really designed it towards the defraying the expence of the wars with France and Scotland; but this not sufficing, the commons raised him a much larger sum: and then, after passing several acts, which cannot have a place here, the parliament was prorogued, on Christmas-eve, till the fourth of November in the year following. However, before the session ended, the king came to the house in great solemnity, and, having ordered the attendance of the commons and both houses of convocation, he addressed them in a speech, which, for its curiosity we shall here insert, as handed down to us by the lord Herbert, in his Complete History.

“ Although my chancellor, for the time being, hath, before this time, used very elegantly and substantially to make answer to such orations as hath been set forth in the high court of parliament, yet is he not so able to open and set forth my mind and meaning, the secrets of my heart, in so plain and ample a manner as I myself am and can do; wherefore I, taking upon me to answer your eloquent oration, Mr. Speaker, say, that where you in the name of our well beloved commons have both praised and extolled me for the notable qualities that you have conceived to be in me, I most heartily thank you all, that you have put me in remembrance of my duty, which is to endeavour myself to obtain and get such excellent qualities and necessary virtues, as a prince or governor ought to have, of which gifts I recognize myself both bare and barren; but of such small quantities as God hath endued me withal, I render to his goodness my most humble thanks, intending, with all my will and diligence, to get and acquire to me such notable virtues and princely qualities as you have alleged to be incorporated in my person. Those thanks for your loving admonition and good counsel first remembered, I eftsoons thank you again, because that you, considering our great charge (not for our pleasure, but for our defence; not for our gain, but to our great cost) which we have lately sustained, as well in defence against our and your enemies, as for the conquest of that fortress which was to this realm most displeasing, and shall be (by God's grace) hereafter to our nation most profitable and pleasant, have freely of your own mind granted to us a certain subsidy, here in an act specified, which verily we take in good part, regarding more your kindness than the profit thereof; as he that setteth more by your loving hearts, than by your substance. Besides, this hearty kindness, I cannot a little rejoice when I consider the perfect trust and confidence which you have put in me, as men having unfeigned belief in my good doing and just proceedings for you, without my desire or request, have committed to mine order and disposition all chantries, colleges, hospitals, and other places, specified in a certain act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glory of God, and to the profit of the common wealth. Surely if I, contrary to your expectation, should suffer the ministers of the church to decay, or learning, which is so great a jewel, to be diminished, or poor and miserable people to be unrelieved, you might say that I, being put in so special a trust as I am, in this case, were no trusty friend to you, nor charitable to mine, even as a Christian; neither a lover of the public, nor yet one that feared God, to whom account must be rendered of all our doings. Doubt not, I pray you, but your expectation shall be served more godly and goodly, than you will wish or desire, as hereafter you shall plainly perceive. Now, sith I since find such success in your part towards me, I cannot chuse but love and favour you, affirming that no prince in the world favoureth his subjects more than I do, nor no subject or commons more love and obey their sovereign lord than I perceive you do, for whose defence my treasure, or (if necessity required) my person, shall not be unadventured. Yet although I wish you, and you wish me, to be in this perfect love and concord, this amity cannot continue except you, my lords temporal and my lords spiritual, and you my loving subjects, study and take pains to amend one thing, which surely is amiss and out of order, to which I most heartily require you; which is, that charity and concord is not among you, but discord and dissention beareth rule in every place. St. Paul saith to the Corinthians, in the thirteenth chapter “ Charity is gentle, charity is not envious, charity is not proud,” and so forth: in the same chapter behold then, what love and charity is amongst you when one calleth another “ heretic, anabaptist,” and he calleth him again, “ papist, hypocrite, pharisee.” Be these tokens of charity amongst you? Are these signs of fraternal love between you? No, no; I assure you, that this lack of charity among yourselves will be the hindrance and affwaging of the fervent love betwixt us. As I said before, except this wound be salved, and clearly made whole, I must judge the fault and occasion of this discord to be partly by the negligence of you, the fathers and preachers of spirituality; for if I know a man that liveth in adultery, I must judge him a lecherous and carnal carnal person: if I see a man boast and brag himself, I cannot but deem him a proud man. I hear daily, that you, of the clergy, preach one against another, without charity or discretion; some be so stiff in their old mumpsimus; others be too busy and curious in their new mumpsimus: thus all men almost be in variety and discord; a few or none preach truly and sincerely the word of God, according as they ought to do. Shall I judge you charitable persons, doing this? No, no; I cannot do so. Alas! how can the poor souls live in concord, when you preachers sow among them, in your sermons, debate and discord? Of you they look light, and you bring them to darkness. Amend these crimes, I exhort you, and set forth God's word, both by your preaching and good example given; or else I, whom God hath appointed his vicar and high minister here, will see these divisions extinct, and these enormities corrected, according to my very duty, or else I am a very unprofitable servant and untrue officer. Although, I say, the spiritual men be in some fault, that charity is not kept amongst them, yet the temporality be not clear and unspotted of malice and envy: for you rail on bishops, speak slanderously of priests, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrary to good order and Christian fraternity. If you know surely that a bishop or preacher erreth, or teacheth perverse doctrine, come and declare it to some of our council, or to us, to whom is committed by God the high authority to reform and order such causes and behaviours, and be not judges of yourselves, of your fantastical opinions and vain expositions. In such light causes you may slightly err; and although you be permitted to read the holy scriptures, and to have the word of God in your mother-tongue, you must understand, that it is licensed you so to do only to inform your own consciences, and to instruct your children and families, and not to dispute and make the scriptures a railing and taunting-stock against priests and preachers, as many light persons do. I am very sorry to know and hear how irreverently that most precious jewel, the word of God, is disputed, rhimed, sung and gangled in every alehouse or tavern, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same: and yet even I am as much sorry that the readers of the same follow it in doing so faintly and so coldly: for this I am sure, that charity was never so faint amongst you, and virtuous and godly living was never less used, nor God himself among Christians was never less revered, honoured, or served. Therefore, as I said before, be in charity one with another, like brothers; love, dread, and serve God, to which I, as your supreme head and sovereign lord, exhort and require you; and then I doubt not but that love and league which I spake of at the beginning, shall never be broken or dissolved betwixt us.

“To the making of the laws which you have now made and concluded, I exhort you the makers to be diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in the making and farthering the same, or else your labour shall be in vain, and your commonwealth nothing relieved. And now, to your petition concerning our royal assent to be given to such acts as have passed both houses, they shall be read openly that you may hear them.”

In the course of this year died Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, who had always continued in the highest degree of favour with the king, and universally beloved and esteemed by all ranks of people for his courteousness and readiness on all occasions, to assist the distressed: he was, in his heart, a friend to the reformed, but did not chuse to hazard his interest with the king by any unseasonable or violent interposition in their favour, though he let slip no opportunity of doing them service, when he found the king in a favourable disposition for such a tentative. He died on the fourth of August, and lies buried in St. George's chapel, at Windsor, near the remains of Henry VI. He had four wives: his third was Mary, daughter to Henry VII. and widow of Lewis XII. of France; he had a son by her, who died before him, and two daughters: he had two other sons by his last wife, who both died without issue.

The beginning of the campaign in the year 1546, was unfavourable for the English in France. The earl of Surry, who had been sent to command in Boulogne, instead of the lord Lisle, met with a rude check in attempting to intercept a convoy of provisions going to the fort of Outre Eau, which the French had built at the mouth of the port. This was followed by a more considerable defeat given the English, under the same general, by the marshal de Biez, who, being attacked as he was conducting a much larger convoy, routed the earl, killing about eight hundred of his men, among whom was sir Edward Poynings, and taking one hundred and twenty prisoners. The king, who did not like unfortunate generals, made William, lord Grey of Wilton, governor of Boulogne, and at the same time recalled the earl of Surry, and sent over the earl of Hertford with a body of forces, to oppose the enemy, and provide for the security of the place, which he did by erecting forts at Ambleuse and Blackness, places that the French had intended to seize and fortify, in order to cut off the communication between Calais and Boulogne. But while the war seemed to be recommencing with greater fury than ever between France and England, the Protestant princes again endeavoured to get their mediation accepted, and met with all the success they could wish.

Henry, whose animosity against Francis was not violent or personal, had sufficiently gratified his humour by the short war he had carried on against him; and having reason to apprehend, from his great increase in corpulency, and visible decay of strength, that his end was not far off, he was desirous of finishing a quarrel, which might prove dangerous to his kingdom during a minority: Francis likewise, on his part, was not averse to an accommodation with England, because, having now lost his son, the duke of Orleans, he was afraid that Charles should again attack him when he was unprovided either of men or money to make a suitable defence.

With such circumstances on both sides the two princes readily listened to the proposals of their friends, and agreed to treat at Campes, a place between Ardres and Guisnes; the plenipotentiaries for Henry were the lord Lisle, sir William Paget, and Dr. Hatton: those for Francis were the admiral Annebault, and Mr. Raymond, first president of the parliament of Rouen. After several conferences, a treaty was concluded on the seventh of June, the purport of which was to the following effect:

“ That the king of France shall pay regularly the pension due by the treaty of Moore, the thirtieth of August, 1525, confirmed by several subsequent treaties; as also the pension of salt, in a treaty of the twenty-fifth of April, 1527, valued afterwards at ten thousand crowns a year. But as Henry pretends the said pension, given in lieu of the salt, is to be perpetual, and as Francis maintains on the contrary, that it is to cease on Henry's death, it is agreed that if the disposition shall be found to be perpetual, Francis shall pay it to Henry and his successors for ever.

“ Moreover, Francis shall pay to the king of England, on the feast of St. Michael, 1554, or within a fortnight after, the sum of two millions of crowns de soleil, as well for the arrears of the pension of the ten thousand crowns, as for Henry's expence of the siege of Boulogne, undertaken solely to procure his money, in keeping and maintaining that place.

“ As to the article of the five hundred thousand crowns, which Henry presented to Francis, on condition he punctually observed the treaties; as the two kings differ in point of fact, it is agreed the dispute shall be decided by commissioners appointed on both sides, within such a time; or by four impartial lawyers, in case the commissioners end not the affair.

“ It is farther agreed, that the king of England shall keep Boulogne, with its territories (the limits whereof are settled by the treaty), till he receive whatever is due to him.

“ That when all the sums shall be paid to Henry, Boulogne shall be restored to France; and nothing that is fastened to the ground, shall be impaired or carried away.

“ That, from the date hereof to the surrender of Boulogne, neither of the two princes shall raise any fort or new fortification within the territory of Boulogne; but those already begun may be finished.”

The emperor was included by both parties in the peace: as for Scotland, Henry agreed it should be included, on condition that the Scots gave him no cause to make war upon them; and in case they did, they were to be included no otherwise than according to the treaty of April 5, 1515.
